The health of the returned and distinguished gentleman, in whose honour we are assembled, (cheers) and he happened in order to proclaim the high estimation in which we held his talents—the unqualified support we entertain for his public character and the confidence we have in the integrity of his principles and conduct—a confidence that he will still more increase, if, instead of wishing to be thought a statesman, he will be content to be himself, and to place Mr Hudson alone by the side of the Members for Durham and Northumberland, the manner of which he may justly be proud when compared with the effete and effete names, Wellington, Lincoln, Lansdowne, Aberdeen, Peel, Graham, and Gladstone. (Applause.) The formation of Mr Hudson, a system of business and commerce, which has placed the name of Sunderland in the first rank of industry, has already, and will, in the future, be productive of greater benefits to the country than the whole of the Ministers that ever held office since the days of Walpole. (Cheers.) Mr Hudson's success which has become all the envy, have become matters of European wonder for the rapidity with which they have been accomplished, and the unexampled results, and as to the opinion formed of its power, and how it is proposed to be turned to the interest of the country, he would refer to the speech of Lord Ashley, in the House of Commons, on the 11th of last month, in which he said, "I consider the railway system of this country as the most important and valuable, and also as the most dangerous, power that ever was placed in the hands of any body of men." (Cheers.) Mr Hudson's success has been unparalleled, and has been the result of his own unaided energies, and he (the Chairman) felt that he was not trespassing on the feelings of any present, when he said that the honours he had received, and the position he had attained, were not the result of any party or political influence, but were entirely attributable to the high character and estimation in which he was held for his unquestionable integrity and honour. (Applause.) He (the Chairman) was not a party man himself, and he was glad to see so many present who were not of his own political opinions, but that they had made no impression on the Arabs. Abd el Kader, who was supposed to be beyond the Tafora, had gone towards the province of the west. His son Ali had been seen with fifteen cavaliers. (Post)

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD Oct 18

Her Majesty has appointed the Rev. John Gifford Ward, M.A., formerly Fellow of the New College, to be Dean of the Cathedral Church of Lincoln.

The Rev. C. W. Bates has been presented by the Crown the Duke of Portland to the living or Rectory of Bothal, near Morpeth. Value £307

The Rev. W. Bodley has been appointed by the Archdeacon of Dorset to the vacant Vicarage of Sandy Lane. Value £85.

The Rev. C. Bailey, rector of Westmarsh at Aarse, Kent, has been appointed to the Rectory of Copford, Essex. Patron, the Lord Chancellor. Value £405

The Rev. G. Hodgson, M.A., of Magdalen College, has been appointed Minor Canon and Precentor of Durham.

The Rev. J. West, M.A., Chaplain of New College, has been appointed to the Incumbency of the new Church of the Holy Trinity, St. Sobe's, in the city.

The Rev. R. C. W. Collins M.A., of Exeter College, has been licensed by the Bishop of Hereford to the Perpetual Curacy of the new Church of Aston-le-Walls, Bishop's Wood, Herefordshire, on the estate of John Parlge Esq.

The Rev. S. J. Rigaud, late Fellow and now Tutor of Exeter College, has been appointed to examine in the Honour School of Theology next. Perpetuities for the said office of the Paris to Lyons, Lyons to Avignon, and Creil to St. Quentin, were in active progress. The papers contain a series of despatches from Algeria, which state that the Arabs were able to maintain themselves in all their positions, but that they had made no impression on the Arabs. Abd el Kader, who was supposed to be beyond the Tafora, had gone towards the province of the west. His son Ali had been seen with fifteen cavaliers. (Post)

CAMBRIDGE. Oct. 18.

The following appointments have just taken place:—

The Rev. William Henry Thorne, B.A., of Queen's College, to the Rectory of Fen Ditton, near Cambridge.

The Rev. Robert Joyce, B.A., of St. John's College, to the Perpetual Curacy of the Holy Trinity, Milton next Gravesend.

NEW CHURCH AT CARDIFF.—The Bishop of Llandaff has signified that he will consecrate the new Church of St. Mary, at Cardiff, on Thursday, the 6th of the coming month.

The report of Mr. A bany Christie, Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, having resigned his Fellowship is confirmed. This makes a third vacancy in that society within a few months. Mr Woodmason, of Dartmouth, has formally handed in his resignation of his office as Minister of the Episcopal Church at Dartmouth, and has been received into the Roman Catholic Church. It is believed that other secessions are on the point of taking place. The report of Mr. Crawley's conversion is premature.

THE REPEAL DEMONSTRATION AT SLIGO

The Demonstration in favour of Repeal took place at Sligo on Thursday (last week). The procession passing beneath innumerable triumphal arches proceeded through the town to the place of meeting which was a fine field formed into an amphitheatre by the surrounding hills. The speakers stood on the area of a platform which gave its occupants the finest possible entrance. At no time was the field literally filled, and taking every allowance for the persons who came and went during the various meetings, the highest calculation of the number present could not exceed 18 000

Mr O'Connell ascended the platform, looking remarkably vigorous and active. He was greeted with the usual congratulatory cheers and after a preliminary business went on to give the meeting its usual platform speech.

He thanked them all, with light heart and buoyant spirit, for the address which he called more grateful than he ever had deserved. How could it be otherwise, when he had conversed with two millions of his countrymen at their meetings during his progress, all then, at every town and village on his route the universal shout was for Repeal. (Cheers.) Loud was he applauded when he declared himself for Repeal, when, with hands raised up to heaven blessed him and his cause. And the countries, with all their ardour combined from their long hearts shouted their little welcomes. Cheers. He had a right to be elated by the reception he met with but the repeal of the accursed Union would satisfy no heart. Much of the Irish spirit of the Eighteenth century—the overwhelming majority of the House of Commons, and all the noble spirit of independence and nationality, and they would not to have Repeal. He a sneer was, Nolo episcopari (Great laughter). He believed this Saxon to deem that the Union was carried by force, fraud, and bribery. They would not be deceived by such men with him on this point, but were determined his assertion with shouts of scornful laughter, because they could meet him with a flat give. He could not refrain in order to show the wrongful nature of the Union to refer to the great growth in the commercial wealth and May, which he concluded he set it in comparison on the meeting the necessity of paying a fair wage a week, which seems enough, seeing that they could not live on less. Now, by the bargain Sligo by the Union Association. That coarse would expose him seriously to others, and, when facts were calmly considered in Parliament, seventy members would turn the scale. With that he left it to himself

Very loud Voice No never

Mr O'Connell. Yes, but I will tell myself.

Voice No, no!

Mr O'Connell. What were you shocked to, till I tell you my price? My price is Repeal of the Union! Remember—(cries

Mr Wilson and several gentlemen went to explain upon the pleasures of Repeal, and the benefits to be derived from it. Now, in a year were drained out of Ireland their was £550 000 a month—£125,000 a week! What a glorious thing to have spent in bread, which did not want it, but wages! Repeal would bring back the absentees, and the spirit of their fathers. Offices, or religious ascendancy he abhorred. Fifteen hundred men carried Emancipation. The Association had 1,500,000 members! (Cheers.) Any one could be equally confident of his power. He has been told from, to all treason and conviction.

Some further speeches having been made by Mr Somers, M.P., and some Roman Catholic clergymen, in support of various resolutions, and a petition against the Union adopted, the meeting separated peaceably and orderly.

At the banquet in the evening the chair was taken by Mr Somers, M.P., at which he called upon Mr O'Connell to propose the first toast. About 350 persons sat down to dinner, among whom were a large number of Roman Catholic priests and clergy.

Mr O'Connell having returned thanks proceeded to address those present. He began with the usual topic—the progress of Repeal, and commented on the change which had taken place in the tone of Government since the time Sir James Graham had said "concession to Ireland was a crime, its name." (Cheers.) Did he say so now? (Cheers.) Yes, and he had repeated that protest. Having renewed his exhortations to persist in the peaceful course they were pursuing for the success of Repeal, he concluded

"Let us then be determined to act and wait; and let not a delegate of the Repeal Association, or Old Ireland? (Cheers.) Shall our plans succeed or be defeated? As for me, I have the happy ess of knowing that I have worked for my native land—(cheers—my fatherland! the land of the Saints of sages—of heroes and of poet—the land that has lived in the chivalry of song, and has since had her fortunes told by the truthfulness of big dead opera—in fact, on which we stake the whole of our hopes—on which we place the children's name—we will scatter them to the winds. (Cheers.) Yes, peaceably, legally, constitutionally, legally, but flaxibly, determinedly, honestly, and resolutely up up for Old Ireland, or sink all—burn for Ireland!

If she be meet I stood up and cheered vociferously for some moments.

Several other speeches were made in the course of the evening, but that of Mr O'Connell formed the chief point of interest.

ATTEMPT AT ASSASSINATION.—Mr Egan, son of Denis Egan of Stroke-town, near Roscommon, a few days ago he got in a fit of passion proposed to cut his throat with a razor he ordered for this purpose by the barrister. The razor did not do even, and Mr Egan returned to at four o'clock for Stroke-town, a distance of fourteen miles. He was met by four men between Tuam and Corbally, where he reached between six and seven o'clock in the evening. He was then within four miles of his father's house when one of the men fired at him, the contents of the piece lodged in the leg of the horse and Mr Egan was driving under a low cart. The man who fired pursued; the assassin and, stabbed him with the wheels are already covered with wood. The horse appears to be pained with blood. Early next morning three men, one of whom appears respectable, were apprehended near Tuam, and Mr. Egan saw the man, but he don't know one of them.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"Euclid was beaten in Decalogue for teaching his scholars a mathematical lesson in his school whereby he showed that all the lines, both of princes and private men, tend to one centre—a doctrine to get money out of their neighbours' pockets, and into their own." —S Ident's Table Talk

In this dullest of all dull seasons the year for the lover of wonderful of high caste, when sporting pro, I—is the coffin of Mahomet—is suspended between earth and sky—the cre in of horse racing been shunned, and every case as yet a thing permitted, but to his hopes at its very climax, the terval between the Second October and Houghton Meetings at Newmarket, that a special slice of luck it is the something should fall out to stir his dead-and-alive mind. To this end we have been to Drake we will turn our Inand not we, hinting en passant that it will greatly tend to favour the stirring up of the racing season of '45 to be quaff d on the coming week

It is to all of the said sinners R yal pleasure Dr Rarle, that being asked by a pupil, how best to ensure success in his profession he replied—

Hovey u, and it's tell you a sure secret to make your fortune; see all sunday till. Rade the must have been a true turf, and the there is no other recipe. A racing man without bowels of brass is safe to come to a work course. Did the professors of the sport justice, indeed, they are not troubled with much of the weakness of human nature, called by fools and philanthropists—feeling. In the days of our fathers the turf was used as an amusement, and they bestowed vast care on the quality of their thoroughbred stock in point of honourable emulation. In these times it is a very serious business; and their sons prepare their racers either for Epsom or portable soup, according to the profit to be realised of the one or the other. In short, they "do as they like with their own," to use a coolly overworked expression, of which we are about to give a couple of instances for the reader's learning, hap; and if he chance to retain any leaven of the liberty of the times, may that it is so sombre a season, as before said, to stir his bile and do him good.

It has been the office of these columns to forward to posterity the portrait and the achievements of a steed called The Baron, that won the Derby and the Chesterwitch, and was "booked"—pretty freely—to win the Cambridgeshire stakes also. In this our defence his admirers rested generally up to last Sunday afternoon. We say generally, a few who had previously had a whisper from the lit tle bird having peppered him strongly on the late day of the Second October Meeting. Well, on the afternoon of Sunday, here were rumours abroad that the Baron had been sold—and on Monday all was clear the murder by confession of the perpetrator himself The Baron had been purchased by a gentleman of the name of S. R. Clark, Esq., on entering the Subscription Room at Tattersall's on Monday afternoon, informed the members that he had bought that celebrated animal, and had given a fortune for him; but should not start him for the Cambridge shire Handicap unless 12 000 to 1 000, in pounds sterling, were betted against him, his current price being about one half that quotation. Now, seeing that the purchaser had not a shilling one way or the other upon the race for his own establishment, and that he had given "a fortune" for the favourite, why he should do the honour of winning a stake, which will probably be worth now a ten-thousand pounds, could seem, according to the ordinary routine of business one of the oddest things in the world! But the turf furnishes us with a precedent. In the year 1836, Eis, grey to Doncaster races, was first favourite for the St Leger in this year's betting on the property, his owner, the Earl of Lichfield—one of the most pr ni nent sporting members of the Jockey Club—published at Tattersall's as his for the first that: Will what not go for the St. Leger, nor be sent to sell to the North, unless in the first instance, he can a to We five hundred pounds could be got on at two to one against him" This, it will seem, was a heavier demand than that of Mr Clark, who only asked he did for a place at the same quotation Lord Lichfield got these long odds, no horse went to Doncaster, and he won or might have won, £14 400 by the negotiation. It is, therefore, according to the debtor and creditor of it a nicety that each parties should be rewarded for these its shrewd, at there is, indeed, a sort of distinction between the cases, because Lord Lichfield did not buy Eis on the eve of an event for win on the public had backed him heavily, and his merits seemed to require to be tried by no direct testing. But in many practice be tolerated a principle, in a community associated for any purpose, it is scarce competent to us, number, or any of our to take up any subject to say that it is not our object.

It is not our object, in these short essays upon our National Sports, to advocate the system, because it the popular game that it unquestionably is and which, for that reason we have set ourselves to expose its abuses, feat thus being discredited upon that, the success of which we have at heart. The turf we especially affect, for as much as it disperses the grea est amount of money in the country of any national sport we know of. It is, therefore, with real regret—to use a mi re courteous term than the case deserves—that we see such instances as this constantly arising which must, if long allowed to go on, bring discredit and honourable men

The system of play or play betting, made a business, is the fertile source—the popular agent of almost all the chicane to which it is obnoxious. Would that it were only individually to damage the party now before us by his at this matter of the Baron and the Cambridgeshires stakes, we like it not to put the affair in its real state before the tribunal of public opinion. Wherefore it is here we have done so as "a matter of fortune" for the horse the price is said to have been £5000 with a contingent £1000 on his winning the gre ment. This virtually makes it not worth the buyer's while to run the race for the bargain. Now, by betting against him from the time he won the St. Leger, twenty times that amount would be secured to any one who, having the control, might start him or let it alone, as it had suited his book to do. Such a system of betting is a disgrace to that sport as the sanction is too strong for the stanchest of ordinary virtuous resistance? The system of "betting is a grating abscess of so large for the persons to be of any upon each and, and a invalid good can be shown for the toleration of so dangerous a temptation."

After being pulled to all intimate a point Baron has passed from Mr. G Watts possession and that of Mr E. THE CYMREIGYDDION FESTIVAL.—THE PROCESSION THROUGH ABERGAVENNY.

THE TWELFTH EISTEDDFOD OF THE ABERGAVENNY CYMREIGYDDION.

The Eisteddfod is different in its objects to the Musical Festivals of England, whose design is, generally speaking, either charity or ordinary festivity. The venerable Eisteddfod of the Welsh was, in olden time, a congress of all the poets and minstrelsy of the country, attended and presided over by the princes and nobles of the land. It was also a depository for national oral record; and, though falling infinitely short of the plans of the present Eisteddfod, the glorious Elizabeth Tudor, Queen of England, appears, as far as possible, to have imitated the customs of her Welsh ancestors, during her progresses and commemorations in England. But the similarity merely went so far as regarded the mustering of an immense host of retainers; for the pomp and pageant and mummery of the one cannot be placed on a par with the solemn ritual and high congress of the old British bards

These institutions seem to be co-existent with the name of Wales, for their name and influence are traceable to the remotest antiquity.

The objects of the Cymreigyddion (Cymreig, Welsh—dynion, men—Welshmen) or Cymreigyddion y Fenni (Cymreigyddion of Abergavenny) are the restoration of any relics of ancient Cambrian literature, and the encouragement of literature generally, including History, Science, and Poetry; the improvement of Welsh Music, more immediately in reference to the revival of the beautiful airs of antiquity—the more general use of the triple harp, the national instrument—and the encouragement of Welsh manufactures in flannels and hats. To these has been added the patronage of the fine arts; and the great prize for the next anniversary will be for a piece of sculpture.

As far as regards that portion of the literature of the Principality, which is of an historical or legendary nature, the Eisteddfodau have done much in calling out some of the greatest men in Europe. The rich virgin-combs of Welsh poetry, still sealed up from the taste of the Saxon, are immense, and it will be long, we fear, before the sweet store is fully developed.

However astounding it may appear that very difficult and chromatic music can be performed with good effect on the Welsh or triple-stringed harp, yet true it is that Parry, the celebrated blind harper of Wynnstay, and his son used to perform several of Handel's choruses in the presence of King George III. some fifty years ago. In Wales there are, even at the present period, several harpers who can play most rapid passages, in thirds and sixes, with both hands, clean and neat; and, notwithstanding all casual flats and sharps are produced by inserting a finger between two strings of the outer row, it is done with uncommon smoothness.

We believe that the Abergavenny Society is the only one which offers prizes for the best specimens of articles of Welsh manufacture—on flannels and hats.

The Abergavenny Cymreigyddion y Fenni was established in the year 1833 by the spirited tradesmen of Abergavenny, and has been supported by them ever since with an energy and talent which reflect the greatest credit upon them. The meetings are held triennially

CHORUS SINGERS.

At an early hour the arrival of carriages and parties on horseback from the hills, gave a very spirited and lively appearance to the town—which, indeed seemed all bustle and joy, in which feeling it would have been impossible not to have participated. The continued salutes of the Cannon on the Castle-hill, and the merry pealing of the bells, were amongst the first announcements of the Anniversary of the Ancient Eisteddfod. At eleven o'clock A.M., the President, Sir B Hall, Bart., M.P. (in the absence of Charles Morgan, Esq., of Ruperra, M.P., who was unfortunately detained by affliction of a domestic character), and his friends were met at the Cross, a mile from the town, on the Monmouth road, by the members and friends of the Society, when a scene of the most animated nature presented itself. A very handsome car, profusely decorated with evergreens, surmounted by a rich representation of a plume of feathers, and carrying a miniature printing press, which was worked by two lads dressed in Welsh woollen clothes, and skull caps of the same material, was drawn alongside the President's carriage, when Mr. Hopkin Morgan and Mr. James Hiley Morgan delivered the address in Welsh and English. The procession then filed down the road and through the town in the following order:—

President's Carriage, followed [illegible] Friends, in 26 Carriages.

During the march of the pro[illegible]ion, 400 cards were printed at the miniature press and distributed to the cro[illegible] and the entire affair, together with the novelty of the loom at work, caused considerable interest among those who witnessed it. Never before did we observe such a procession in Abergavenny; the road, for nearly half a mile was literally crammed with carriages and people. It seemed as though the surrounding country had sent its entire population to the Eisteddfod, while the Welsh costume gave an interesting feature of singularity to the crowded picture. The procession halted at the Cymreigyddion Hall-door.

The Hall (see Engraving) was built by Mr. Lewis. The ceiling was entirely covered with pendant evergreens, through which ever and anon hung chandeliers [illegible] ese light shed a rich lustre on the gay recherché scene. In the [illegible] rved an illuminated crown beautifully formed, while at the back of the platform a semicircle of jetting flame, inclosing a superb imitation of a [illegible], with "G. and M." in huge letters beneath; and at the lower [illegible] a harp in the same brilliant style, seemed to vie with each other in ef[illegible] tions. Flora, in short, seemed to be the presiding genius of the scene. On the walls on either side were suspended the colours of Wales as carried at the Battle of Bosworth Field, with other banners, on which were inscribed the word "Cymry," in the old Bardic characters, &c., &c., around. On the left-hand side of the platform stood a spendid Statue (see Engraving) of the ancient bard Taliesin pen Beirdd, the work of Mr. W. Jones, of Merthyr Tydvil, who had brought it 150 miles to grace the Eisteddfod of 1845. We extract the following article from the Athenæum on the sub[illegible]

"Nor must we omit to notice a striking performance by Mr. W. Jones, the Statue of "Taliesin pen Beirdd (the Prince of the Bards) wrapped in a simple [illegible]ite a monk's, bound round the waist with a rope, one arm raised high above his head, as if in denunciation, with the air and aspect of a prophet. The bard is in the act of exhorting the Clergy to retain the doctrines of the Gospel, as they had received them from the Apostolic hand, against St. Augustine with the innovations of Rome. There is a great spirit and character in this work, the composition simple, the action vigorous, and the meaning clear. We shall see it in marble."

On the opposite side of the Hall was a beautiful marble bust of Mr. Jenkins, of Dowlais.

INTERIOR OF THE CYMREIGYDDION HA[illegible] ABERGAVENNY.

At about twelve o'clock in imitation of the old custom, the Eisteddfod was opened by sound of trumpet, after which the president took his seat in the chair.

A grand chair of native (see Eisteddfod) was then placed during the meeting had in the name of which the Eisteddfod is put was so famous; but the name is to be restored.

The Prince then took his seat in the Bardic chair.

Some "Hard words" were used by Ens Fach and Dryw Fach with six-male singers. (Long continue.)

The Rev. T. Price then rose, and was greeted with a round of applause. He said he considered it a great honour on this occasion of their Institution. The Eisteddfod must be considered as both a literary and a national institution. It was one of the most ancient institutions in the land, and had existed for many centuries. It was the only institution of the kind now in existence in Europe. It was a literary institution, and had been for many years the only literary institution in the country. It was also a national institution, and had been so from the earliest period of the history of the country. It had been established by the Princes of Wales, and had been encouraged by the Princes of Wales, and had been encouraged by the Princes of Wales, and had been encouraged

THE THEATRES

HAYMARKET.

There is a fashion in theatric affairs, as in other things. A new piece of that class of pieces in question is struck—a new dormant chord in the heart of the play going public is awakened, and this reaction is visible in all the theatres, from the highest to the lowest. At the two patent houses, some of the finest specimens of the legitimate of the age are to be seen; at the Adelphi theatre, and the minor theatres, the same thing is done, but in a somewhat different style. Each of the minor houses has its forte in the stuff it serves out for the delectation of the playgoers. At the Surrey, the melo-drame is the order of the day; at the Victoria, the New Cross Road, and the Britannia, the Ratcliffe Highway, are the only things in request; and so on with the rest. Each of them, a high order of play have been selected. Sometimes all the heroes must be of another age, at another time, and in another country; sometimes they only remember where some particular place was recorded, or where some remarkable observation was made, just in time for the "rightful heir" or the Richardian drama to come in to the assistance of their own. At others "Don Cæsar de Bazan," or any other similar creation of the Lemaitre rôles, can alone be tolerated. And now after the drama has been in such a trance that one was almost tempted to believe that, with other dear, departed friends, it had left the Sadler's Wells department of our organization, she starts up again, at the Princess' and Nymarket in all her pristine vigour; and Messrs. Macready and Anderson, whom no one had known any thing of for two or three years, except that they had gone to America and come back again, have once more large letters on the placards, and constitute in their own persons the "great attraction" to bring "full nights" of their managements.

Mr Anderson appeared at the Haymarket on Monday evening, as Claude Melnotte, in Bulwer's play of "The Lady of Lyons;" Miss Helen Faucit coming forth on the same evening in her original character of Pauline. "The Lady of Lyons" is a play which contains all the elements of popularity. It is admirably constructed in a dramatic point of view: the course of its incidents never appear to outrage romance, in a dramatic point of view also; the emotions of its chief ters are natural ones, and there is built a culminating interest, which prevents the action from ever flagging. However beautifull a play may be written, situation, if popular, is necessary, which is also present in this. Although Mr Anders on's is a simple one, Claude Melnotte was upon the whole, a most praise worthy performance. We cannot however get it the meed of unqualified approbation. Physically, he had great advantages to assist him in interpreting the character effe rively; but, where acting alone was concerned, his assumption was less calculated to lay hold of the public taste as an effective artist; and we were too often reminded that Mr. Anderson had not studied this advice sufficiently. His acting was too gay a rep ; indeed, at the conclusion of the first act, some in stage was quite tiresome and his absence from the parapets. The general impression, however, was most decidedly favourable, as the hearty manner in which he was cheered, at the conclusion of the play, proved. The excellence of Miss Helen Faucit's acting, in Pauline Deschappelles, is too well known to require any fresh eulogium. In our opinion, it is the very best character she plays; and she never appeared in it to greater advantage than on Monday. She was loudly applauded throughout, and a shower of bouquets assailed her when she appeared before the curtain, at the end of the piece. The house was very well attended.

PRINCESS'.

We remember some two years ago, a reckless comedy was produced at the Haymarket—whether it was "Grand pas Quo" or "Monsieur Mercadet" we decisely recollect, nor we believe to the latter—in which Mr Farren had to say, "Formerly we took torts and injures from the French; now we only take forces!" and the readiness with which the audience seized upon the point, and appreciated it to the full, was a fair proof of its aptitude. And very true it was. There is no class to whom a war between England and France would be a more dreadful affair, than the dramatic authors. Farce and comedy for Farren to revive at the present day, almost forestalls the pieces themselves. The whole of our modern lite theatres live upon their ingenuity—at least with exceptions few and far between; and the productions of the old and figure-dramas, so that is a have not, so changed—time their parents would hardly recognise them. Indeed we are on taxes if the piece of "seeing is white"—a thoroughly English one—could be produced at present, it would be found to be identical with "Le Caporal et la Payse" of the Paris stage. We have already noticed one success in adaptation of "Le Vieux Garçon Dauphin" at the Lyceum, under the title of "Next Door;" and now we have to announce another produced on Tuesday evening, at the Princess', as "Jack o' Both Sides," Mr Oxberry sustaining the character played, by Mr. Wigan, and Miss Louisa Stanley appearing in the place of Miss Vallers. The incidents are nearly the same. A little difference has been made in adapting the peculiarities of the different parts to the Princess' company, and this has been well used. We may stigmatise some pantomimic dancing as especially successful.

We are asked on for some good first piece—be it opera, drama, or other wise at the house, to combat the rivalry of the attraction when Mr. Macready does not play. With every department in the theatre, both in the stage and about it, so well filled, no great difficulty can exist in carrying this out.

ADELPHI.

The Adelphi has made a great hit in the production of a burletta from the indefatigable pen of Mr Selby, called "Flunking a Tartar, or Magic and Modern upon," This, as the name imply ses, is in a degradation of the grand ballet, in which Carlotta Grisi has been turning the heads of all the Parisian population, at the Academie Royale, termed "Le Diable à Quatre"—a play the theatre to be crowded every evening, and bringing together a number of artists as players to form the queue, who have dined in and about the Rue Lepelletier, on purpose to be in time "Le Diable à Quatre," is founded on the farce of "The Devil to Pay" which, in its turn was altered from an old play, "The Devil of a Wife," first produced in 1686. The character of Nell, originally played by Mrs. Clive and Mrs. Jordan is the principal role of the ballet, and many of the melodies of the old play are preserved.

The Adelphi piece, although an adaptation, is not altogether a ballet. Mr Selby has written some humorous dialogue to it; and some very attractive songs are distributed amongst the ch racters. It is scarcely necessary to describe the plot, but this is the outline. Count Crack-mountain, Mr. Bradbury, has a daughter, Countess Miss Woulger, and opposite to his chateau, is that of Mazourka (Mr. Wright,) a drunken basket maker, and Mazourka Maid-one Christie, his wife, who is passionately addicted to dancing. To read a proper lesson to all parties the two wives are unmarried, and made to exchange places, and the main incidents of the piece rise out of this change of position. Jean (Mr Minyard), a villager, and Jeane (Miss Rose) caught carry on a rustic wide-pack of courtship. Mr Selby is an effective dancing master, in breeches of rose coloured satin and pink shoes; and Mr. Paul Bedford is a mighty hunter, being no less a person than Kickershaw, the Count's first valet. These, with the aid of a corps of pretty girls and active pantomimists, effect the representation of the most amusing specimen we have seen for some time.

Jones is ready to much to praise in this piece that we scarcely know where to beg it. Place aux dames! Madame Celeste's impersonation of the twinkling footed Mazourka was admirable. Her broken English, which we do not generally admire, gave a droll quaintness to several bits of the song, to the fit put into her mouth, and her dancing was unexceptionable. She was loudly applauded in a new Mazurka, from the publican ballet; as was also a pas de deux with Mr. Wright. Miss Woulger's Countess was a very attractive Countess, and played with immitable spirit in the scene where she finds herself changed to the basket in her's wife. She sang a fine parody on Anne Bolleyn's song in "The Enchantress," called "Woman's Tongue." Mrs Keeley Chapman fairly took us by surprise, with her very clever dancing, of which she had a great deal to accomplish. Mr. Minyard, also, is equally entitled to praise. His manliness of Perrot throughout the piece was perfect and his pantomime of the highest order. He is a very valuable member of the Company. Mr. Wright was no unhigh final as Mazourka, and his music for a reckoning wife, which he was constantly calling to his aid, in the songs of Doctor Fudge, produced roars of laughter. Mr. Paul Bedford had a very facetious part to play, which he sang admirably, and Mr Selby made the most of the dancing man of, quite a prominent character by the excellence of his acting.

The piece has been gorgeously put upon the stage, and the mechanical effects are novel. Some of them are exceedingly beautiful especially the dream in which the second act. The change of the two wives to each other's house, burnt away on their couches by sylphs, is also cleverly managed, as is the last scene of a conservatory, decorated for a ball, exceeding any thing we ever witnessed at the Adelphi. We should not omit to mention in these clever persons who danced a "Pas de cinq-tet" in this scene.

The curtain fell amidst very good cheering, and received the compliment of several of the appl use bestowed upon it. It will run along time. On Wednesday evening, when we were present, the house was crowded to inconvenience long before the commencement.

The music, arranged by Mr Alfred Mellon, we presume from the original is also attractive. There is one passage, however, which runs through the piece, and always makes you look out for good tune, which is never found—only you don't, and that's all. This is somewhat tantalizing.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The amusing, and not comedy, of "Is She a Woman? has been revived at this theatre, and acted every evening this week with great success. It has been well got up in the stage.

Mr Balfe has arrived in town from Paris. Signor Costa, after a tour in Germany has also returned to London. It is rumoured that the Philharmonic Council have nominated him to the post of Conductor for all the Concerts of the ensuing season; such an appointment, should it be accepted by the distinguished Maestro would tend to elevate the character of the Society. Letters from Paris mention that Moriani has completely failed at the Italian Opera. His fine acting could not reconcile the French critics to the utter dissolution of voice and bad style of vocalization. Persiani's star was in the ascendant; her singing is stated to be more exquisite than ever and her intonation perfect.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED

MRS FRY.

Elizabeth Fry, a philanthropist, whose whole life was devoted to alleviating the human misery consequent on poverty and sin, was the third daughter of John Gurney, of Earlham Hall, in the county of Norfolk, a member of the Society of Friends.

The family of Gurney—now represented by Hudson Gurney, Esq of Keswick in Norfolk—is of ancient and distinguished lineage. Hugh Gournay, a Norman Baron, Lord of Gournay and Le Bray, came with William the Conqueror, and founded the house in England among the tenants of the Conqueror, and founded the house in England among the tenants of the Conqueror, and founded the house in England among the tenants of HUTCHISON'S MARKET, ALDGATE.

THE HUTCHISON MARKET.

This new metropolitan Market has just been completed upon ground, the freehold property of Andrew Kennedy Hutchison, Esq., in the rear of Aldgate Church. Part of the site was formerly occupied by meanly-built premises, in a sad state of dilapidation, and partly by two old mansions, which had been for many years untenanted. The property was intersected by a narrow alley, much infested by persons of bad character; and the entire locality bore that aspect of squalid poverty, which causes the passenger to shudder, as he reflects upon the extremes of wealth and want which are to be witnessed in this vast metropolis.

Happily, this accumulation of antiquated inconvenience has been swept away; and on its site have been constructed a commodious market-place, a respectable tavern, and between 40 and 50 dwelling-houses. The market is intended for the convenience of the Jewish population of the district, who consume a considerable quantity of fish. The building will likewise afford a comfortable shelter and place of business, at very moderate rates, to those persons whose little trade is at present carried on in the streets. The tavern is also intended for the use of the Jews, who often find it difficult to procure this kind of accommodation: the house is handsomely fitted up, and contains a splendid room, with paneled and enriched ceiling, Ionic pilasters, &c., adapted for the celebration of wedding festivities, which, among the Jews, last several days.

The Market, Tavern, and houses have been erected from the designs of Mr. Arthur Ashpitel, of Old Broad-street, within twelve months. The Tavern was, indeed, built and licensed within three months. It occupies the place of "the Old House in Gravel Lane," engraved in No. 136 of our Journal. Tradition relates this house to have been built by the Earl of Essex, the unfortunate favourite of Queen Elizabeth; whence it was always commonly called "the Palace," the sign now given to the Tavern. Strype's account, (in his Edition of Stowe) is as follows:—

"In ancient times, on both sides of this Lane [i.e. Petticoat Lane], were hedge-rows and elm-trees, with pleasant fields to walk in, insomuch that some gentlemen of the Court and City built their houses here for air. Here was an house on the west side, a good way in the Lane, [the house in question], which, when I was a boy, was commonly called the Spanish Ambassador's House, who in King James I.'s reign dwelt here, and he was the famous Count Gondomar."—Vol. 1, part 2; page 28. Edit. 1720.

Mr. Ashpitel tried all in his power to keep up the old mansion, but it was too far gone to decay. However, Mr. C. J. Richardson, the author of the splendid work on "Elizabethan Architecture," made careful drawings of every part before it was touched, and intends to publish them.

NEW BAPTIST CHAPEL, AT LEICESTER.

This spacious Building has just been completed in Belvoir street, Leicester, for the Particular Baptist Church and congregation hitherto assembling in Harvey lane Meeting House—a place famous as the theatre of the early ministrations of Dr. Carey, and as the scene for so many years of the pastoral labours of the eloquent Robert Hall. During the time of Mr. Hall's ministry, the Harvey-lane Chapel had repeatedly undergone enlargements to accommodate the increasing numbers who were attracted, no more by the brilliancy of his intellect, than by the genuine piety and christian zeal of that talented divine. Since that time, not only have these augmented numbers been sustained by his successor, the Rev. J. P. Mursell, but even still further extent of ground and building, obtained at considerable cost, have proved inadequate to the full accommodation of all who were anxious to attend. It was, accordingly, resolved to erect a still more commodious building, where, if possible, ample room should be afforded for its stated hearers, and for free seats to the public, and the eligible and central site in Belvoir street was fixed upon.

The new Chapel is from the design of Mr. Joseph Hansom, Architect of the Birmingham Town Hall. It is circular in plan, with galleries and the other fittings peculiar to that religious body. The mode in which the light is admitted, though somewhat novel as applied to places of worship, is found to be highly efficient, and to produce a very agreeable effect. The disposition of the seats leaves but little room for preference. The main Chapel will accommodate about 1,500 persons. There are also a Lecture-room and School-room. Dr. Harris has observed that he never saw a Chapel so beautiful; never met with one so easy to speak in; nor one in which the congregation presented so beautiful a prospect as this did, from its architectural arrangements.

The Chapel was opened for public worship on the 15th inst. The services were commenced by a prayer meeting at seven o'clock in the morning, at which a large proportion of the congregation were present. At eleven o'clock, the congregation again assembled, when the chapel was densely crowded in every part. Arrangements had been made by the Midland Railway Directors for special trains from the stations on their line, the result of which was manifest in the vast audience now congregated, amongst whom were visitors from all parts of Leicestershire, from the surrounding counties, and even from Yorkshire, &c. &c. The Rev. J. P. Mursell having performed the introductory part of the service by prayer, &c., Dr. Harris, President of Cheshunt College, and author of "Mammon," ascended the pulpit, and delivered a most eloquent discourse from the words of the 17th verse of the 7th chapter of Job.

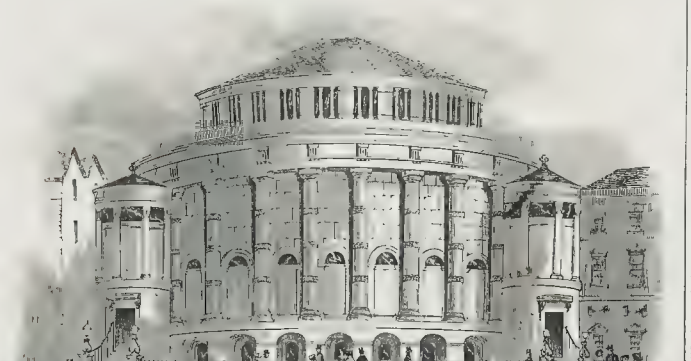
A collection having been made, which amounted to £112, the Rev. T. Mays, of Wigston, Independent minister, concluded the morning's service with a most impressive prayer.

In the afternoon, a public dinner was provided in the New Hall, by Mr. Beeson, of the Railway inn, to which upwards of three hundred ladies and gentlemen sat down. Dr. Legge having asked a blessing, the repast, which was a cold but excellent one, was served up in good style and with the politest attention by the manager. After the cloth was drawn,

Mr. Mursell addressed the meeting, and briefly recapitulated the reasons which had more immediately led to the erection of the new Chapel, and read a list of subscriptions by the congregation, from which it appeared that £2,600 had been already subscribed. It was calculated that the new edifice would cost a trifle over £6,000. Mr. Mursell urged on those present to continue their liberality, and he had no doubt that £1,000 more would be raised by the opening services.

The meeting was subsequently addressed by Drs. Harris, Cox, and Legge; the Rev. J. Edwards, of Nottingham; E. Stevenson, of Loughborough; J. Toller, of Harborough, &c.

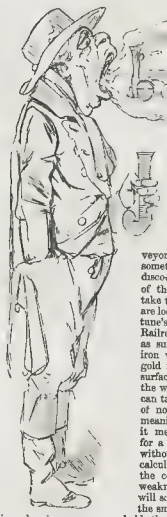
In the evening, an admirable and appropriate sermon was preached by Dr. Cox, from the words, "This is none other than the House of God, and this is the gate of Heaven." The Chapel was again full, and, lighted up with gas, presented a brilliant appearance. Upwards of £50 was collected at the close of the service. The total of collections was £760. It is computed that at the principal service upwards of 3,000 persons were present, and many hundreds could not obtain entrance.



NEW BAPTIST CHAPEL, LEICESTER.

RAILWAY MANIA.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.



JOHN BULL, with open mouth, is ready to swallow any quantity of Railroad; and everybody sees, through the aid of his heated imagination, the heaps of gold collected in the Railway sacks, to be ordered into his own individual cellars like coals, if he only choose to bestir himself. The Surveyor's pole appears to be turned into something like an ancient divining rod, to discover the hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth, and all for those who will take the trouble to write for Shares, which are looked upon by all as checks upon Fortune's-wheel, payable at sight. The Demon Railroad—for such he surely is, and will as surely play the devil—has waved his iron wand, and all the hitherto hidden gold in the universe has sprung to the surface. Each imagines that the rest of the world is gone mad, and that he alone can take the advantage. The simple man of no business does not know even the meaning of one premium. He knows that it means getting something. He writes for a hundred Shares in any Railroad, without, even if he have the power, calculating what they will come to, or the consequences of an early call. This weakness has affected all classes, and will soon show itself most fatally amongst the smaller tradesmen, clerks and domestics, who, in some cases, hold their shares, and squander their little all in the first deposit of £2 or £2 12s. 6d. per share, whilst the scrip remains stationary at one premium. Another call comes like a thunder clap upon them, when they resort to any means to meet it, in the hope of recovering something; but their ignorance of the thing in which they deal must inevitably shipwreck them, as the light when it does break, must show. Many a trusted man is now fast approaching the breakers. Very few can win the thousands spoken so confidently of, and how many must finally be ruined to make the successful leviathan.

Yet every day discovers some new tempting mine of wealth in the shape of a railway. It is now perfectly understood that people shall no longer walk; that railways shall lift their feet from the mud. The days of golashes and clogs are passing away. We shall soon, like a bird, soar high above the earth—from east to west—from north to south—upon the crowns of palm-like columns—and all for a few pence! The world henceforth has made up its mind to be in a hurry. Ladies may soon go themselves to India for their shawls; to France for their gloves; and buy their ostrich feathers of the bird itself, without even looking up their tea caddies, so short will be the trip. We know not how soon, and really it is a very feasible idea, we may see "the Round the World Railroad"—Mail trains there and back the same day. If Captain Cook could see us now, I think he would feel rather contemptible, and wish his Voyages Round the World out of print. Things are done better by the Cooks of the present day.

The earth, at least that part available for Railways, is now nearly all used up, and the wide awake ones have laid down their sleepers and taken possession of the mud with a Parliamentary writ; so scarce, indeed, has it become, that that small portion which is spread so thin over our bridges is put up to auction at so much a barrow-full, and companies are fighting furiously for the bridges to carry them over. Hungerford Suspension-bridge has been coquetting between two companies for some time, but is at last doomed to tremble beneath the chariot of the universal conqueror—Steam. Waterloo-bridge remains firm, with a story look upon the aspirants for its possession, determined only to favour the highest bidder. Its friends now begin to look upon the Spendthrift with complacency, in hopes that they may recover some of the money lent him for years, without any chance of a return. The twining Railway, which, at first, turned politely out of the way of a gentleman's villa or a nobleman's park, is quite outré. The Direct, and nothing but the Direct, will any longer do: without consideration for anybody, straight a-head goes the surveyor, with his theodolite, and, in a few weeks, whiz! comes the engine; and, if you stand in the way, to expostulate in favour of your kitchen-garden, make up your mind to scaldings.

Surveyors, by the by, are now getting exceedingly scarce; they are advertised for at their own prices; whilst advertising masters promise to perfect gentlemen in the art of surveying, in twelve lessons, for twenty guineas. Everybody is sorry he is not a surveyor. Under these circumstances, juvenile surveyors are set to work, and have a man to carry the chain, and a chair for them to reach the sight of the theodolite—all the full-grown ones having been used up many months ago.

The fillers of the earth begin to tremble as they see their household and farming men swarm off to the Rail, and even fear that, when the harvest does arrive, the hands will be found wanting to gather it in—for the Ploughman sees nothing but imaginary Railroad Lines as he follows the plough, and, discontented, turns from his task. The Shepherd, who formerly dozed in the grazing grounds, in the midst of his flock—but with much less rumination than any of the sheep—now starts up, and listens to the low, wailing whistle of the train, and drives his charge down to the Station, where they are placed in the vans, and are whistled to town in the most polite society; he and his mate, the ploughman, look wistfully, as the train vanishes, and their ambition is stirred; their strength is at a premium—the pay, on the Railroad, being so much greater than what they have ever received. The Shepherd throws down his crook without hesitation—the Ploughman kicks the clods of his native fields from his heels—and the Railroad has them.

Father Thames is also to be robbed of the rich argosies that have floated for centuries so proudly upon his bosom, and he will be henceforth cheated out of his many little perquisites which he has contrived to take entirely to himself in his little traps, like the Goodwin Sands, &c., for Mr. Railroad says he will do for him; that he, with his all-powerful Lines, will walk down to Portsmouth, and fish the richly-laden vessels out of the sea—take them in his arms, run over the land, and pop them safe in dock basins in the heart of London; and if he says he'll do it, he will, and Old Thames must retire from business.

Mr. Railroad has, in the most impudent manner, walked into the midst of the Stock Exchange, where the Old Woman of Threadneedle-street, did her little money affairs, so that the noise might not disturb her in her own house, seized upon the Clerks called Stockbrokers, turned all the legitimate business out of doors, and compelled them to work his ends, and, in fact, has turned it into a Railway Office; the old name is kept up, and the busy bees inside call themselves Stock-brokers, which is a very curious feature in the case; but it must be supposed that the aforesaid Mr. Railroad has dipped into the Act upon Gambling-houses, &c., and thinks it as well to keep up the ancient title of the place, and be civil to the old woman, Mrs. Bank; there is no doubt that he will, in a short time, boldly put up Railway Central Office, and entirely abolish the form and title of the old place; the sneaking way in which this is done, may be perceived from her endeavouring to paste his name over every conceivable thing—as you may see the "Railway Coffee House" some miles from anything of the sort—Railway Caps—Railway Newspapers—Railway Omnibuses—Railway Cabs—Railway Spectacles—and even Railway Trousers, which, I think, can only be made for fast men: but, in fact, everything, to be anything, must in some way claim a relationship to the great Leviathan.

Very little is known by the public generally of the way in which the before-mentioned slaves of the Railroad, called Stockbrokers, cook this staple commodity of the day. The tremendous influx of business has caused a great alteration in the manner and customs of the "House." The letters from country correspondents, anxious to have a slight taste of the rich cake so full of plums, are beyond belief enormous (for immense transactions take place between London, Liverpool, Leeds, Manchester, &c. &c.)

Very early attendance at the office is necessary, that the work for the day may be properly arranged before entering the "House," which is opened as ten o'clock strikes; the Broker's Clerk then enters to check, as it is called, the bargains of the previous day, many of which being for the account (the "Account" means a future day, fixed by the Committee of the "House," generally at a period of fourteen days, that is to say, two accounts per month), numberless errors would arise, but for the precaution; this operation lasts for about half an hour, when a rattle is sprung by the porter of the Establishment, and the business of the day commences. Many-tongued Babel is nothing to the noise and confusion that ensues, in which it would seem impossible to transact business of so much monetary importance. The Brokers rush into the "House," calling at the top of their voices the names of the different Share Companies in which they may have orders to execute; they are answered by the Jobber who may choose to deal in those particular Railways, and who makes the Broker a price, as it is called; that is, he names two prices; say, for instance, £1 to £1 10s per share, in 50 or 100; these terms are not expressed as sterling, but as one to a half. The Broker has the option to declare whether he buys or sells; if the former, the high price is understood, and vice versa; the next thing to be declared or arranged is, if the transaction be for money or the account, on which fixed account-day the buyer or seller must complete his bargain. Now it often happens that a party has bought or sold what he can neither pay for nor deliver; in that case he must undo the bargain by reversing the operation on or before the before-mentioned fixed day, making a profit or paying a loss; sometimes it happens that from a delay on the part of the Broker's employer, the operation cannot take place in the regular way—in that case the Broker appointed for the House by the Committee, is employed to sell the Shares or buy, something after the style of an auctioneer; the difference is made good by the party who neglects his part of the transaction. The badgery and baiting during these announcements are strange, the Brokers larking and whooping like a herd of schoolboys; this chaos is kept up until three o'clock, when, according to the new regulations brought on by the press of business in the Railways, the House closes, and the Brokers retire to their private offices to write to all their anxious country correspondents, which keeps them at work until a late hour at night.

Notwithstanding the close of actual business, the purlieus of the "House" are filled by knots of men with anxious faces, of all grades and appearances; the guileless farmer in his brown old top-boots, is held by the button-hole by some shabby lynx-eyed Stag, who paints a golden picture to wheedle the sovereigns out of his pocket, and then leans gloomily against the wall, pondering upon the makings of others and his own ruin; some with flushed faces, smelling of sherry, and eating a Leman's biscuit, rush by, grinning with success; the Alarmists look on, shaking their heads, and prophesying an overwhelming ruin, but still tremble and speculate; for the spirit of gain and desire for money has become a madness. The bombshell must soon burst, but all still rush in, though conscious of the shortening of the fusée, and snatch the gold from amidst the threatening sparks.

Accounts from St. Petersburgh state, that it is shortly expected the feeble boundary line between Russia and the kingdom of Poland will be abolished, and Poland will thus be fully incorporated with the great empire. On the 1st of January, 1846, the Custom-house boundary between Russia and Poland will cease to exist, so that Polish produce may enter Russia, duty free, and Russian goods may in like manner pass into Poland. The traffic of both countries will thereby be mutually benefitted.

Letters from Genoa, of the 10th of October, state that Don Carlos and the Princess of Beira, arrived there on the 9th from Nice, accompanied by their two sons, who are officers in the Sardinian army. The Carlist General Ellio is also at Genoa. The passport, given by the Sardinian Government to Don Carlos, gives him the title of "Majesty," and he is always addressed by the Government officers and the public functionaries in the Sardinian States as a crowned head. The Grand Duchess Helena left Genoa on the 7th to meet the Empress of Russia at the lake of Como.

SCENE FROM THE "LADY OF LYONS"

Our Illustration this week is taken from the First Scene of the Second Act of "The Lady of Lyons," which we have noticed elsewhere, as produced on Monday evening at the Haymarket. Claude Melnotte (Mr. Anderson), pretending to be the Prince of Como, is speaking to Pauline (Miss Helen Faucit) of his imaginary Palace, as follows:—

Melnotte. Nay, dearest, nay: if thou would'st have me paint
The home to which, could Love fulfil its prayers,
This hand would lead thee, listen! a deep vale
Shut out by Alpine hills from the rude world
Near a clear lake, margin'd by fruits of gold
And whispering myrtles: g'assing softest skies
As cloudless, save with rare and roseate shadows,
As I would have thy fate.
Pauline. My own dear love!
Melnotte. A palace, lifting to eternal summer
Its marble walls, from out a glossy bower
Of coolest foliage, musical with birds,
Whose songs should syllable thy name! At noon
We'd sit beneath the arching vines, and wonder
Why Earth could be unhappy, while the Heavens
Still left us youth and love! We'd have no friends
That were not lovers, no ambition, save
To excel the n all in love; we'd read no books
That were not tales of love—that we might smile
To think how poorly eloquence of words
Translates the poetry of hearts like ours!
And when night came, amidst the breathless Heavens
We'd guess what star should be our home, when love
Becomes immortal; while the perfumed light
Stole through the mists of alabaster lamps,
And every air was heavy with the sighs
Of orange groves, and music from sweet lutes,
And murmurs of low fountains that gush forth
I' the midst of roses! Dost thou like the picture?
Pauline. Oh! as the bee upon the flower, I hang Upon the honey of thy eloquent tongue!
Am I not blest? And if I love too wildly,
Who would not love these like Pauline?

MUSIC.

THE FAIRY OAK; A ROMANTIC OPERA, IN TWO ACTS. BY H. C. COAPE, ESQ., THE MUSIC BY HENRY FORBES.

It is the custom of French and German critics to attend at least two, if not three representations of a new opera, before a definitive judgment be pronounced on its merits or demerits. It is, indeed, impossible to arrive at an impartial conclusion on the first hearing of a work that may have cost the composer years of toil; and a general view of the whole, but no fixed point of observation, can only be attained. Critics in this country are too apt to decide hastily from the impressions of a first night, regardless, perhaps, of their particular temperament on the occasion, and of the exhaustion produced by earnest watching, and the heated atmosphere of a crowded house. With the limited rencarnals in English lyrical establishments, an extra degree of indulgence ought to be extended to the composers, especially if they are beginners. With every disposition to welcome the advent of a fresh talent in the musical market, we are constrained, after listening twice to "The Fairy Oak," to agree with the general verdict of condemnation pronounced by our contemporaries—but with this qualification, that if the libretto had not been so flat and feeble, the success of Mr. Forbes would have been less equivocal. As it is, the opera fills a gap, and will last until Mr. Wallace, in the ensuing month, tries his fortune with the public. The manager has been charged with filling his house on Saturday last with claqueurs, to insure "The Fairy Oak's" triumph; but on the second performance, last Monday, the audience was numerous, although less in numbers, and bestowed quite as much applause, minus the hissing of the opening evening. It is a curious fact, that the agitation emanated, as we remarked, principally from members of what is called the "Young England Musical Party," whose want of generosity will recoil on them, perhaps, most disagreeably when they enter the field.

"The Fairy Oak" stands now in this position: it has been universally con

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

We have received accounts from Janina, capital of Albania, of the 2d inst. They are since those from Malta, the latest from that country. It tranquil as ever. The Suliotes were the Sultan's authority is often contested, is completely pacified, and has submitted to the conscription, from which it was exempt up to the present time. The two principal chiefs of Albania, Vrioni and Tebrim Bey, have evacuated to furnish the Turkish army with 10,000 recruits for this year. The Seraskier who commands the province has assembled a considerable force, to enforce the execution of this measure. The Albanians, who furnish every year to the Ottoman Empire the most complete set of volunteer corps, whose indiscipline and thirst for plunder have been the scourge of the Christian populations of the Levant.

A letter from Carlsruhe, announces the gratifying intelligence that the Zollverein tariff is at length finished, and will speedily be made public. The writer is a good German, and seems to grudge us our advantages, for he says the duties on British manufactures are not raised at all, except only on a few article of the least importance; indeed, only on one or two trifling things, as I recollect.

Letters from Athens, received at Ancona, state that the Russian Ambassador had placed dispatches in the hands of the Greek Government, by which its attention is called to the danger which threatens it, and what threatens the King, from the number of Albanians in the capital. The disturbances at Messenia had subsided the insurgent bands had dispersed and of the three chiefs two were made prisoners & conveyed to Napoli di Romania.

Letters from Ichaboe to February last, announce that the stock of guano upon that island is exhausted Ichaboe, at that period, was every where laid bare to the prime ice granatic rock of which it is formed, and under which it is evidently the opinion that any deposit could be found. A letter from a highly respectable shipmaster, who left Ichaboe for the Cape of Good Hope, in ballast, says there is literally no guano left on Ichaboe, except a small quantity of such rubbish, mixed with sand, as is entirely unfit for shipment.

It appears that the potato pestilence has made fearful ravages in Prince Edward's Island, and that the grain harvest has been also unpropitious

The Courrier Francais says:—"The corporation of hairdressers and barbers of Zurich, have sent a petition to the Federal Directory of Switzerland, in which they demand the abolition of the Sunday morning visits of the Parisian hairdressers-em, who, under the denomination of artistes en chevaux have established themselves at Zurich in order to avoid the rules which prohibit any artisan from working in that canton who has not obtained from the free dom of the company. The Directory, it is said will deliberate up in this petition during the approaching sitting. The French hairdressers have presented the members of the Council with a memorial in which they defend their interests with an enormous wig, and seem perfectly satisfied of the success of their cause."

The King of Sweden and his Royal Highness Prince Gustavus of Sweden have arrived at Stockholm, from Christiana. The Crown Prince and the Prince Gustavus and Oscar repair shortly to the Upsala University for the winter

The Gazette of the Upper Rhine says, in a letter from Freyburg, "the authorities of this district have given orders, and directed the gendarmes to arrest the rat rouer Rouge, if he should come into that district, and deliver him up to the Swiss frontier."

The Manchester Guardian mentions the death of a man from hydrophobia, caused by the bite of a dog eight or nine months ago. He was a married man and 27 years of age.

It is reported that a duel took place some days ago in Eimbeck (Hanover), between an officer and a Dr. Bussenius, one of the most celebrated practitioners in the place. Dr. Bussenius was the challenger, & a shot through the head by his adversary, who died immediately. The doctor died two days afterwards. The cause of the duel is at present unknown.

The Duchess de Berry is prolonging her visit to the Imperial Family at the Court of Austria; Prince Metternich gave a superb Be at his villa at the con-tem-cement of last week, when the D chess de Berry, Prince Metternich, Prince Esterhazy and the Swedish and Neapolitan Ministers of the Imperial family of Austria honored the noble Prince with their presence.

Letters from various parts of Germany speak of a financial crisis as inevitable, and state that several failures to a large amount are ex cete At Leipsic some failures have already been announced, but the amount is not stated

A Vienna letter of the 11th inst., states that the Emperor of Russia arrived unexpectedly by the railroad on the preceding day at Olmutz, and immediately went on to Prague for the Lake of Como. His Majesty is expected to remain six weeks in Italy. Count Nesselrode, who is take g the same journey, arrived at Vienna on the 13th, and was to proceed in the evening of the 14th. The Grand Duchess Helena is, contrary to all expectation, about to return into Russia She is to arrive on the 23rd at Vienna where she will stay some days.

The Augsburgh Gazette states from Berlin, that the King of Prussia has received from Queen Victoria a letter of thanks, for the kind reception that she met with in the Rhenish provinces.

THE MARKET

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday Morning). Since Monday the arrivals of English wheat are moderate for the season of the year, and the supplies of foreign are very limited. The weather has been favorable for the progress of the harvest, and the samples are of good quality. The millers resume to purchase extremely low terms. The supply of Flour is very limited, and the demand is not active, but prices are well supported. Barley and Oats are in fair request, at full prices.

THE PANIC.

The recent suspension of the full activity of Railway speculation, during which discretion has been invoked to temper a zeal that was somewhat passing the bounds of discretion,—though it has excited a degree of alarm as to the soundness of all undertakings of the kind, will not in reality affect any that are practicable, required, and remunerative. The good have for a short time been involved in the discredit thrown upon the bad; but the reviving and healthy breeze of public opinion begins to separate the wheat from the chaff. There is not the slightest apprehension that the progress of Railway enterprise can be checked. We are committed to it as a nation, and cannot stop short in our progress till the system has worked its destined changes. No great social revolution, once commenced, can be left unperfected—its natural tendency is onward: slight checks there may be, but to retrograde is out of the question. Among civilised nations, at least, the index on the dial of human improvement never goes backward: the rate of progress may be fast or slow; but in either case it is certain. A great part of the traffic of this Empire is now carried on by means of Railways, and the whole of it soon must be so. The new era has commenced; and that it should give rise to new forms and phases of speculations with which men, not being yet made familiar, are apt to be easily alarmed, is not a matter of wonder. We still walk in the twilight of a new day, and scarcely see clearly all that lies before us; but it will ere long begin to take a more distinct shape, and we shall better appreciate the magnitude of our task, its purpose, and our means of executing it. We shall soon learn to consider,

All that we have done but earnest of the things that we shall do.

The main lines of communication between the great centres of trade and population are now, or very shortly will be, Railroads; if it is found, from experience of their advantages, that all the branches that do or can feed them should be Railroads also, not only will the means be readily found to construct them, but there will be no power of preventing their construction: so much of the late apprehension as seems to have been founded on doubts of our ability to execute all that has been proposed, we hold to have been needless. We cannot do it all at once, but we shall do all that, and much more, in due season. It is the nature of speculation to anticipate the future: some are as sanguine as others are timid; and where the commercial system has been fully developed, there are always hundreds of a needy and active class who have stepped beyond the sometimes dubiously drawn line that separates the speculator from the knave. These are ever ready to take advantage of a movement; but their very assumption of the name, forms, and functions of a Company for constructing a Railway, shows the tendency of the spirit of enterprise in the present generation. Nothing worthless is ever imitated. If the undertakings already completed had not fully answered the expectations formed of them—and if the genuine schemes now projected had not every probability of doing the same—we should not have had hundreds of Companies formed ostensibly for constructing a line, but really only to issue shares at a premium, for the benefit of directors and committee-men. When this sort of counterfeit and spurious speculation had reached such a height as to provoke a scrutiny, and the public were called on—rather too indiscriminately—to pause, it was natural that the good should be confounded with the bad, and the market, consequently, suffer a transient panic. But the progress of Railways will not be affected by it; they will be wanted—must be made, and as to our means of doing it, a few words on that point may not, at the present time, be quite thrown away.

The doubt that has been raised of our ability, as a nation, to pay the cost of the projected lines, is formed in forgetfulness of what we have in former times done for far less commendable purposes. In about a century we have incurred the greatest portion of a National Debt of eight hundred millions; it was raised by the people and lent to the Government, on the pledge that the public revenues—continually augmented for the purpose by new taxes—would be applied to paying the interest on it. How was the principal spent? Nearly all of it in a great Continental war, the first object of which was to destroy the power of Napoleon, which we of all the nations of Europe had the least reason to dread; and the second, the Restoration of the Elder Branch of the Bourbons, whose imbecility and folly, when they were restored, undid in less than fifteen years all that had been done for them, and caused their second expulsion in favour of the Younger Branch, in the person of a man of capacity, who knew his age and nation, and how to rule both. We did not go to war for Charles the Tenth, as we had done for Louis the Eighteenth, though, on the principle of legitimacy, we had as fair an opportunity; but times and opinions had changed in the interval; we had begun to see that a national movement is seldom quite causeless, and that on the whole a people are themselves the best judges of their political condition; we know, too, that if they are not, they would, from the dislike of being dictated to by a foreign power, prefer a Nero of their own choosing, to a Trajan forced on them by others. So in 1830 we left the French to settle the Government as they pleased—as we should, probably, to-morrow, were the Dynasty of July to merge into a Republic; but, to prevent this, some twenty-five years before, we thought fit to spend hundreds of millions. Where did they all come from? Patriotism, or hatred of the French, intense as they were at that time, would never have extracted them from the pockets of the people; it was the guarantee of four and five per cent. interest given by the Government, which we now pay, and shall continue to pay, the labour and industry of all future generations being mortgaged to meet it. Provided that national faith was pledged for the interest, who cared or inquired how the capital was spent? It went as money always goes in war; the pay of armies and fleets, the hire of foreign mercenaries, immense subsidies to greedy Continental Powers, who, although their very existence depended on it, would never move a battalion without the money from us in advance, and sometimes even when they got it, refused to move at all. Lord Malmesbury's correspondence has informed the people of some transactions of this kind not a little edifying as to the honour and honesty of some of our allies in that war. We spent our millions in purchasing slaughter, famine, disease, and destruction, either for ourselves or our foes, with little return, except that of lists of killed and wounded. We speak of the expenditure of material wealth, and, of course, speak without reference to such immaterial things as glory and national pride; we spent much, we struggled hard, we suffered greatly, and in a few years Napoleon went down to the dust, as he must have done had we left him to run the mad career unopposed, and the huckstering, mean-spirited Monarchies of Europe to defend themselves, as they ought to have done, unpaid. Thus were hundreds of millions lost, as if they had been thrown into the sea; they are gone—they are represented by nothing but national credit. Cannot the nation who thus for a whole generation poured out her treasures by millions, and the blood of her children by thousands, raise the same means after a peace of thirty years, during which an untiring industry has gathered almost the wealth of the world into her lap in boundless accumulation? And how different the purposes to which this wealth will be applied. The money will be spent, literally, in "bringing the ends of the earth together," in conquering distance and time. It will be represented by constructions and works, triumphs of human power and skill, compared with which the vaunted Pyramids of Egypt are merely monstrous accumulations of stone, heaped up as if the race of men had once been a sort of human ant, without the insect's foresight and purpose in its toil. They will stand for ages, smoothing the path of commerce, levelling the hill, piercing the mountain, giving to man the fabled car of the enchanter, and verifying the saying of the monarch-sage, that "many shall go to and fro, and knowledge be increased." They will exist for centuries, the source of comfort and convenience to many generations, grander and more glorious than many battles, which are forgotten ere the blood shed in them has sank into the earth, and fall into oblivion long before nature draws over the sad relics of destruction, the veil of her fertility with which she hastens mercifully to conceal the havoc of man. The expenditure of one war is more than enough to overthrow many of these motives of intellect; while the process of their construction is the means of diffusing employment, comfort, and content among whole hosts of our labouring population, the money returning again into the circulation of the country. We have hitherto had no experience of the effects of a great national expenditure made at home and among ourselves; we have spent our thousands only in social improvements, and in undertakings connected with science and art, while we have lavished our millions in foreign wars, that brought us triumphs indeed, but left no visible or tangible results behind them. We are beginning to reverse this, and spend the millions at home, and so extraordinary is the effect of what has already been accomplished, that the proposal to do more appears to some impossible. But it will be done, and that without difficulty; the accumulations of the people will be as profitably and safely invested in them, as if lent to a Government as stakes with which to play the game of ambition.

The returns of the lines completed will furnish further means to carry out the lines proposed; and, vast as the projects of the future seem, the difficulties will vanish as the time approaches to grapple with them. Prudence must not be cast away; but with that to guide us, there is nothing to alarm. As long as society and science feel the necessity of travel and traffic will exist; the men and merchandise that traversed the deserts in the days of Solomon will continue to do so when railroads shall have paved the shifting sands with a path of iron, and the camel may be numbered among the animals extinct. Wherever men congregate, there will be ways to and from each other; and, as the road of the half-civilised Gaul and Briton was succeeded by the paved way of the Roman conqueror, as the hunting path of the savage disappears before the road of the settler, so will the imperfect channel of traffic yield in time to the more advanced system of communication. In carrying this into effect, there will be many errors; and some controlling and directing power will have to be created, that shall direct the energy that may else be wasted. But any attempt to set a fixed bound or limit beyond which it may not extend will be as futile as the attempts made by Elizabeth and James I. to check the extension of London; the growth of which at that period began to alarm the statesmen of the day. The principle now at work must be followed out to its full application; and though there may be some embarrassment from the number of schemes, and some doubt as to the characters of the men projecting them, still the people have discrimination enough to decide between them. Those that stand the ordeal of examination will certainly be completed; and though they alone may seem gigantic in their proportions, England, with her wealth and energy applied in one great national effort, will be found fully equal to the task.

STATUE OF HER MAJESTY.

On Tuesday, the first anniversary of the opening of the New Royal Exchange was very appropriately commemorated by the inauguration of the marble Statue of her Majesty, placed in the centre of the Merchants' area. The statue is cut from one block of fine white marble, and is from the chisel of Mr. Lough, one of our most eminent sculptors: it is of colossal size, and placed upon a stone pedestal. A great cr wd of persons thronged the area during the morning, evidently in expectation that the ceremonial would be attended with some display. In this they were disappointed, however; for, beyond five or six members of the Gresham Committee, who arrived at three o'clock, no demonstration whatever took place. When the covering in which the statue had been enveloped was removed, the crowd evinced their loyalty by three cheers; and, after devoting a few minutes to an inspection of the work, most of them retired. After the ceremony, the Gresham Committee dined at the Albion, to commemorate the anniversary of the opening of the Exchange. The superb service of gold plate, made for Messrs. Staples, the proprietors of the tavern, for her Majesty's table when the ceremony took place last year, was on this occasion brought into requisition, and the entertainment was of the first-rate order. Mr. Richard Lambert Jones was in the chair; and the evening was passed with the utmost conviviality.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers contain an account of some important movements on the part of General Lamoricière against Abd el Kader. The first account was comprised in the following telegraphic despatch, dated Perpignan, October 23:—

"THE GENERAL COMMANDING THE 21ST MILITARY DIVISION TO THE MARSHAL, MINISTER OF WAR.

"The Labrador, after having landed the troops which she conveyed to Oran, left that place on the 21st, and arrived at Fort Vendres this afternoon. ‖ "General Lamoricière was actively engaged with the enemy during the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th. Abd-el-Kader, with 3000 cavalry, remained a spectator. On the 13th, seeing a defile forced, he fled. The insurgents, driven to the sea coast, surrendered at discretion. Colonel Gery has been successful against the Kabyles, in the environs of Macsara. General de Bourjolly and Colonel Saint Arnaud had effected a junction, and were waiting for reinforcements to act. Bou-Maza, with 800 cavalry, attacked, on the 15th, a tribe under the wall of Montagnam. Lieut.-Col. Mellinet, with the force of the garrison that remained disposable, drove him off. In the night of the 15th, three tribes of the sub-division of Oran abandoned our cause; these are the first of this sub-division. The 700 men embarked at Port Vendres, in the Labrador, are the first troops from France arrived at Oran; their arrival has produced the best effect, and will contribute to keep from the tribes what have not yet revolted."

Subsequently, the French Government published, in the official journals, the despatch of General Lamoricière, describing the operations effected by him. This despatch, which is dated Oran, October 22, does not add very materially to the information given by telegraph. It appears that on the 13th he attacked the Kabyles in their mountains, and made himself master of a very difficult defile, which the natives do not appear to have defended with any vigour. For the two following days a sort of running fight was kept up, in which Abd el Kader, who was in sight during the first day, and at the head of 2800 cavalry, did not take part. The General says that, instead of fighting, the Emir retreated, amidst the jeering and hooting of allies whom he had induced to rise in his favour, and then sacrificed at the moment when they were fighting his battle. The fact, however, probably is, that Abd el Kader was induced to retreat because the country, which is very mountainous, was unfit for cavalry movements. At all events, Abd-el-Kader escaped with his cavalry untouched. The remaining tribes were hemmed in by the French troops in an angle, having the sea on one side, the river Tafna on the other, and the French army in front; and, finding that they had no chance of escape, they surrendered at discretion. We are left in the dark as to the exact number of prisoners, but they appear to be principally composed of the peaceable inhabitants of the country, and so little do their future attempts at attack alarm General Lamoricière, that he contents himself with ordering them to remain at large in the mountains of the Trara tribe, where they surrendered, until such time as the plain becomes more tranquil. General Lamoricière takes great credit to himself for not having put the whole of these native tribes to death after they had surrendered as prisoners of war. "My infantry," says he, "would have had ample vengeance for this insurrection; but, with the present exasperated feelings of our troops, would this vengeance not be perhaps too severe?" The Journal des Débats praises the humanity and moderation of the General, which, it says, in this instance, makes the French character contrast nobly with that of the barbarians of Africa

The Gazette concludes with an eulogium on the troops engaged, and with a mention of the persons who had most distinguished themselves. General Lamoricière encloses a letter from M. Courby de Cognord, chef-d'escadron of the 2d Hussars, who was supposed to have been killed on the affair of the 23rd ult., but who, after having been severely wounded, was taken prisoner. His letter, giving an account of the affair in question, was sent to General Lamoricière by Abd-el-Kader.

The list of prisoners is altogether 96, all more or less wounded. Some of them had received as many as six or seven wounds. It will be seen the letter in question, which M. Desterne is dead, and that the account of his having been decapitated by Abd-el Kader for his exhorting the men in the marabout to hold out was an invention. The letter of M. Courby de Cognord is followed by a report from Gen. de Bar, dated Algiers, 14th, but containing no new facts. There is also a report from General Thierry, dated Oran, 20th, giving a résumé of the proceedings in that province, and particularly the operations of General Lamoricière. General Thierry states that Abd-el-Kader, who, after the first combat, had ceased to take any part in the fighting, left in the midst of the second engagement amidst the hisses and imprecations of the Arabs who witnessed his flight.

On the 8th of October, according to other advices, about 2000 Kabyles attacked the forts of Gigelly. They were repulsed, with some loss, by the French garrison, which made a general sortie. An attack is also stated to have been made by the Arabs on Cherchell.

The papers now state that Marshal Soult will remain the nominal President of the Council for a short time longer, but that he will not resume the direction of affairs.

The Paris Bourse was again on Tuesday much agitated. "Rarely was it and the precincts in such crowd assembled, anxiety in every countenance," says a private letter. "Business commenced under a feeling of despondency, which sent down securities of every description. About half-past 2 o'clock, however, a reaction commenced, which continued up to the termination of business.

"For this favourable change no political information or cause is assigned."

Last Saturday evening the King of the French received the Austrian Ambassador, Lord Brougham, and General Sebastiani. The Courrier de Narrelles states, that Mr. Leader, the member for Westminster, is waiting at Cannes the arrival of Lord Brougham, who was expected in a few days.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 9th of October give an awful account of the condition of Greece. The first instance of the present state of things is the following:—About three months ago, a gentleman of the name of Agalenti, after a long law-suit, procured a sentence from the tribunals of Athens, granting him the possession of an estate in the north of Greece, which he had originally purchased of a Turk in conformity with the law established by the protecting powers of Greece. Taking with him some law officers, he proceeded to the spot, when the peasants at once seized on him, deliberately murdered him, and cut off his head, all of which they themselves described in letters written to the capital; and one of these letters was directed to the King.

Last week (say these letters), a band of the Albanian soldiers, the amnestied brigands with whom M. Coletti has overrun the capital, to keep the population from rising against him, and to prevent the King from escaping from his trammels, proceeded during the night to one of their marauding excursions to the mountain districts, as is their usual practice, they visited an estate called Tchourka, next to that of Leosia, belonging to Mr. George Finlay, the woodcut height of which, we have mentioned, have been entirely laid bare by incendiary fires this summer, and which the proprietor would as soon think of visiting, though only at a distance of ten miles from Athens, as he would of walking into a den of tigers. The Albanians were soon attracted by the sound of bells, which warned them of the vicinity of a flock of sheep; and it appears that a child, either from being asleep, or hidden from fear of the Albanians, fortunately escaped their observation. The aged shepherd tending this flock was now accosted by the brigands, and abruptly desired to slay and skin a sheep, which, after some hesitation, he consented to do.

This done, a fire lighted, and the sheep placed before it on a wooden spit raised up between two stools, as in the usual custom, the shepherd was told by the Albanians to deliver up his Sunday money. In vain did the poor old man declare that he possessed nothing; they deliberately tied him to a young tree, which they now formed into a huge spit, and, placing him before the crackling and fierce fire opposite his cruel tormentors, commenced roasting him. The aged shepherd, finding that the unfortunate sufferer to divulge to his torturers the existence of all his little hoard under the roots of a tree in the neighbourhood. Removing him from the fire, but leaving him still tied to the spit, some of the party now went in search of the booty which they found, but, not being satisfied with the amount, on their return they announced to their victim that he must either have more to them, or submit to further roasting. The wretched man was then again placed before the fire, and, the sheep being by this time done to their satisfaction, they sat down to their repast. Having eaten their fill of the poor old man's flesh, these Albanians, not willing to leave his supper to turn the spit, seems to have inconvenienced them, as they at last chucked him away from the fire, and eventually took their departure. The non arrival of the flock at the village at which it was expected, alarmed the peasants, some of whom arrived during the night at the scene of this dreadful occurrence, and found the shepherd still alive, his body half roasted, and his limbs falling off. Medical aid was now sought for, and, fortunately, a practitioner among the peasants and lower orders, reached the scene in time to take down in writing from the dying lips of the sufferer, in the presence of the assembled people, this painful recital.

An awful murder was a few weeks back committed at the village of Kakosaleski, situated on the frontiers of Attica and Thebes. The murderer, a desperate gang, were secured and brought to Athens. These men, being set at liberty by Theodore Grivas, proceeded to the above-named village, where in the night they succeeded in gaining possession of the persons of four shepherds who had been most active against them. They broiled on enormous fire—stripped their victims, smeared their bodies with grease, scewed them to stakes, and roasted them alive! One of the victims, by name Nassos, being a stout man, initially expired; he was the father of eight children, and the other three are also since dead. The village of Kakosaleski belongs to M. Lanierre, a French gentleman, and his report of the dreadful deed now lies on M. Piscatory's table.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Gambria has arrived at Liverpool after a rapid passage of nine days and a few hours from New York, bringing news of the Great Britain steamer having reached New York on the morning of the 15th ult.

The Hibernia steamer reached Halifax on the 17th.

The Congress having briefly assembled, adjourned.

The money market at New York on the 15th was steady.

The Canada papers contain an account of a serious fire at Montreal, on the 4th ult. The fire originated in a building on Queen street, occupied as a coffee manufactory and confectioner's shop, and, before it could be confined had there been decision and power to demolish a few small wooden buildings in the vicinity. The fire spread rapidly from building to building, over nearly the entire block between Queen-street on the east, to Prince-street on the south, from Wellington-street east, to Gabriel-street west, one house at the corner of Queen and Gabriel-streets, and part of a building at the corner of Queen and Wellington-streets were saved in a damaged condition; the part of the one at the corner of Wellington and Queen-street was cut in two, and the burning end severed from the other. The fire crossed Prince street, and proceeded in a line through to Nazareth-street, where it crossed Nazareth-street, burning one or more buildings on the south side of that street; two or three were blown up to arrest the fire. The buildings consumed were many of them of a rather ordinary kind, occupied by families in the humbler walks of life; the distress and privation, therefore, caused by this fire are great. There were a nail factory and a casting shop, several grocery and tavern stands, dwellings occupied by numerous poor families, a building where church service has been held during the summer; also, a handsome Methodist Church and parsonage, several fine stone and brick stores and dwellings, and a fair amount of property destroyed. Happily there were no accidents or loss of life.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The express which left Alexandria viâ Trieste to test the superiority of the communication through Germany over that across France reached London yesterday (Friday), bringing accounts from Bombay to the 1st of October. They do not, however, contain anything of importance.

Tranquillity prevailed in India.

From Scinde we learn that the arrangements of that province were continuing on the most pacific manner as before.

The affairs at Lahore continued to be as embarrassed as ever.

The Governor General left Calcutta on the 22nd of September for the upper provinces, with an army of 32,000 infantry, 6000 cavalry, and 140 guns, on the confines of the Punjaub. Some severe fighting, or perhaps decided negotiations were expected.

The three surveyors of the East India Railway Company, Messrs. Collett, Duncan, and Romaine, were about to proceed towards the Soane river, under the directions of Mr. Stephenson. Mr. Simms is already quite sanguine on the subject of an Indian railway, and seems to anticipate no serious obstacles.

The news from China comes down to the 15th of July, but contains nothing remarkable.

COMMERCIAL.—The letters from Bombay of the 1st ult. states that the market for cotton fabrics, and twists and yarns has been active, with advance in prices on some numbers of the latter. Cottons of all descriptions have been realising very full, and encouraging prices. The metal market has been unusually quiet. Holders continue firm, and prices consequently have not receded. Imports this fortnight have been exceedingly limited, and the same may be said of exports

The appearance of a defective monsoon seems likely to be realized, for the fall of rain during the past fortnight, has been slight and partial The fall will be much below the average, and that will prove detrimental to the crops on this side of India, and, as a necessary consequence, injurious to the trade in British goods, is, we fear, beyond question.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.

In part of our impression last week, we announced the death of Mr. Boteler. Notice was given to the Coroner, who directed the inquest to be held on Friday afternoon. Sir Isaac Morley and James Murgatroyd, Esqrs., two of the Directors of the Company, accompanied by their solicitor, witnesses, &c., proceeded to Woodlesford, by special train, to attend at the inquest. Upon the jury being impanelled, Sir Isaac Morley said the Company courted public inquiry, and, he had instructed every person who could throw the least light on the transaction to attend the Coroner's court, and they should be brought from the remotest part of the kingdom, regardless of the expense. After this, the Coroner and jury proceeded to view the body of the late lamented gentleman. After the jury had returned, the Coroner said, the most searching investigation would be gone into, and, for that purpose, to afford time for the necessary witnesses, he should adjourn the inquest until Monday morning.

Mr. Sangster, the solicitor, at Leeds, attended on behalf of the family of the deceased; Mr. J. A. Ikin, town clerk of Leeds, on behalf of police sergeant Stubbs, whose leg, it will be remembered, was broken by the accident; and Mr. Palfreyman, solicitor, of Sheffield, on behalf of Thomas Wheatley, the driver of the assistant engine, which ran into the train, and whose conduct was likely to be handled by the inquiry.

Three Directors of the Midland Company, Sir Isaac Morley, Mr. John Houldsworth, and Mr. Hutchinson, entered the room shortly after the inquiry proceeded.

On the opening of the proceedings Mr. Macaulay said he had the honour to appear for the Midland Company, and stated that the company were desirous of affording the fullest and amplest investigation, and that they had given orders to their servants to render every possible assistance in facilitating the inquiry.

John Porter, a railway guard, after giving an account of the accident similar to that which has appeared, said: After the concussion, I found the buffers of the last carriage on the train on the top of the engine buffers. One of the second-class carriage buffers—the off buffer, was driven through the back panel of the first-class carriage, which was in advance of it, and which was the eighth carriage in the train. The first class carriage referred to, was the one in which Mr. Boteler was seated. The next carriage was the mail van, which was broken. A waggon was also broken in a couple. The last carriage in the train, the second class, was also damaged, especially at the end which struck against the first-class carriage. On opening the door of the eighth carriage, I found Mr. Boteler, sitting on the right hand side of the carriage going from Derby to Leeds, with his back towards the engine. The buffer had jammed his legs against the seat. We were a long time before we could get him out. I cannot say exactly how long we were, but we might have been more than half an hour. We had to remove the damaged parts of the carriage from the inside. Both Mr. Boteler's legs were broken below the knee. He spoke to me. He said a good deal about his luggage, and desired us to take care of it. That was after we had placed him on the bank upon some cushions. He lost a deal of blood. We had a surgeon in the train who attended to him. I think it was Mr. Chorley, of Leeds. We placed cushions in a van, and put Mr. Boteler on them. I asked the surgeon to ride with him, and he did so. It was about five o'clock when we were on the platform at Normanton. We had to wait very short time to the place where the accident occurred. When the pilot engine ran into us we were proceeding at the rate of about eight or ten miles an hour. It was a fair morning, but there was a fog on the ground. The line side, which retarded our progress considerably. I do not know whether the moon was shining or not. I cannot say whether it were twilight or not. It did not rain. It was a very dense morning. We had, besides to our last carriage, attached to the rear, forming the points of a triangle. They were red lights. We have no permanent lights besides those three. We have hand lamps as signals, which we use to stop with. Those lights are red, green, and white. The red light means "to stop;" the green, "caution;" and the white, "to show us clear—to go on." We had used these hand-lamps, before the accident occurred, from the guard's van, which was on the off

THE RAILWAY SHAREHOLDER'S POCKET-BOOK AND ALMANACK, FOR 1846. D. Bogue.

This well-timed publication, in addition to the usual Pocket-book matter, contains a list of authorized Railways, a Diary for entering the sale or purchase of Railway Shares, and Tables for calculating the value of Shares and Commission, which may also serve the purpose of a Ready Reckoner in general transactions. The Work must prove extensively useful to every one engaged in the Railway Share-market.

MR. ALDERMAN SCALES AND HIS CREDITORS.—On Saturday, at the COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, Mr. Scales, the well-known ex-Alderman, came up in custody on his interim order. His schedule set forth his debts to be £61,810 7s. 4d., whilst his credits were stated to amount to £6,471 3s. After some discussion, the insolvent was liberated.

SIR R. PEEL AND MR. HUDSON.—It is stated that Sir R. Peel will "raise the first sod" of the Trent Valley Railway in a field near Tamworth next week. The spade to be used on this occasion is in size and shape a regular navigator's spade, highly finished, with polished maple handle, and on the blade Sir R. Peel's coat of arms, inlaid with gold. The strap of the spade are beautifully etched. It is enclosed in a rosewood case, lined with blue ultramarine velvet. On the lid is a silver name plate, with the inscription, "Sir Robert Peel, Bart., M.P., Drayton Manor."—The Newcastle Journal states that Mr. George Hudson, M.P., has been honoured with an invitation to spend a few days with Sir Robert at Drayton Manor.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.—On Tuesday the installation of Lord Lyttelton, as Principal of Queen's College, in the room of Dr. Johnstone, who has resigned the office in consequence of his great age, took place at the Town Hall, Birmingham. There was a very full attendance of the friends and supporters of the College—the Students and their connections, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Lord Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Beckham, Dr. Booth, Thomas Phillips, Esq., the Mayor of Birmingham, D. Malins, Esq., the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, and W. Lundo Cox, Esq., F.R.S., Dean of the Faculty, were amongst the most distinguished of the guests. Lord Lyttelton was duly installed into the chair

SERIOUS CHARGE OF MUTINY.—The steamer Cambria has brought to Liverpool seven seamen, in irons, part of the crew of the British barque Champlain, belonging to Cork, who had been given up by the United States authorities, under the treaty with that country, for examination in England, upon a charge of aggravated mutiny, and of attempting to sink the vessel they were navigating. On the arrival of the steamer, the prisoners were given into the charge of Captain Bevis, R.N., who forthwith handed them over to the civil authorities, and on Tuesday, the charge against them were investigated before Mr. Rushton, the stipendiary magistrate. The names of the prisoners are Thomas Sheazel, John Cockiestan, Hermann Hincker, Henry Matthews, Thomas Boyle, Job M'Cann, and Henry William Matthews. The depositions taken before the British Consul for the state of Maine and the authorities of the United States, were produced. They were most voluminous; but only one witness was examined, namely, the steward. The history is this —A few days after the prisoners had shipped with Captain Featon, there arose a scarcity of seamen in St. John's, and wages advanced considerably. They could not persuade the captain to release them from the terms of their articles, and, therefore, it is said that they conspired to compel him to put them ashore after they had been a few days at sea. The first mutinous symptom was shown by the prisoners commanding one of their body—Hincker—to put the ship about, and steer a course quite opposite to that directed by the captain. The captain, however, succeeded in causing the vessel to keep the right course, and then it was accidentally discovered that the vessel was making water. On the the prisoners in a body refused to work. It is said an augur was found upon one of them, and that with this augur they kept continually boring holes, until, at one time, there was eight and a half feet of water in the hold. Being in danger, the prisoners just pumped sufficiently to keep the ship afloat, then they "knocked off." This conduct was repeated for several hours. At last, a brig hove in sight. The captain immediately hoisted signals of distress, which were, fortunately, observed, and boats sent to the relief of the Champlain. The two captains communicated, and the result was, that the seven prisoners, after a long struggle, were placed in irons, and conveyed to the first port, which happened to be on the coast of Maine.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT BIRMINGHAM.—On Tuesday evening, about seven o'clock, as Mr. Simmons, secretary to the Birmingham Fire Insurance Company, with Mr. Mills, was proceeding down Suffolk-street, Birmingham, in his gig, the horse started off with great violence, when the two gentlemen were thrown out, and Mr Simmons was unfortunately killed upon the spot.

FIRE AT NORTHFLEET.—On Saturday evening last, a fire broke out on the farm of Mr. Smith, an extensive farmer at Northfleet Green, where all the stock of grain, outhouses, &c., in fact, everything but the dwelling-house, and the cattle (which were driven away), was destroyed. It is believed the owner is insured.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

WILLIAM FULLER BOTELER, ESQ., Q.C.

Mr. Boteler, whose death has occurred under such melancholy circumstances, was the representative of a family of very ancient standing in the county of Kent, for so far back as the commencement of the 15th century, one of his ancestors sat in Parliament for Sandwich. The learned gentleman's father, William Boteler, Esq., of Eastry, F.S.A., married twice; the first wife was Sarah, daughter of Thomas Fuller, Esq., of Statenborough, and by her he had an only son, Mr. William Fuller Boteler, whose decease we record: by his second wife, Mary, daughter of John Harvey, Esq., Captain R.N., he left several children.

Mr. Fuller Boteler was born on the 5th January, 1777, and called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, the 23rd November, 1804. For many years he enjoyed considerable practice in the Court of Chancery; he was a Queen's Counsel, Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, Recorder of the City of Canterbury, and Steward of the town of Fordwich. About twelve months ago, he received the appointment of Commissioner of the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, on the removal of Mr. Baker Bere to Exeter, and since resided at Oulton, in Yorkshire, where his gentlemanly courtesy, kindness of disposition, and able discharge of his public duties gained for him general esteem and respect. He married, in 1808, Charlotte, daughter of the late James Leigh Joynes, Esq., of Mount Pleasant, near Gravesend, and has left, besides several daughters, two sons: the elder, William, M.A., follows his father's profession; and the younger, Richard, is a Member of St. John's College, Cambridge.

The injuries Mr. Boteler received from the collision on the Midland Railway were of too serious a nature to permit the slightest hope of recovery. On Monday evening, the 24th ult., the ill-fated gentleman suffered amputation of one of his legs with the greatest fortitude and resignation, but the consequent exhaustion proved fatal; he gradually sank until death terminated his sufferings on the Thursday morning following.

GEORGE BASEVI, ESQ.

Mr. Basevi, the eminent architect, celebrated as the designer of Belgrave-square and of the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, was killed on the 16th ult. by an accidental fall from the west tower of Ely Cathedral. The unfortunate gentleman, whose death is much deplored, received his education at Dr. Burney's school at Greenwich, and entered the office of the late Sir John Soane in 1810. With that distinguished master he passed nearly six years, becoming in the interval a student of the Royal Academy, and in 1816, after the completion of his articles, proceeded to the Continent, where, in Italy and Greece, he pursued his studies and improved his taste and knowledge. In 1819 he returned to England, and commenced practice on his own account, his first works being the church at Stockport and Mr. Ricardo's mansion at Gunninghill. Many subsequent undertakings, exhibiting great classical acquirement, tended to elevate him to a high rank amongst his contemporaries, and the Conservative Club, which he executed in conjunction with Mr. Sydney Smirke, has further served to establish his professional reputation. Among his minor works, we may mention St. Saviour's Church, Hans-place, Chelsea; Pelham-crescent, and several other ranges of buildings at Brompton. Mr. Basevi was from its foundation a Member of the Institute of Architects, and at one time filled the Vice-President's chair. He was also a Fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He has left a widow and eight children to deplore his untimely end.

SIR MATTHEW TIERNEY, BART.

This distinguished physician, whose death occurred on Tuesday, at Brighton, was the eldest son of John Tierney, Esq., of Ballyscandlon, in the county of Limerick, and had, at the time of his decease, completed his sixty-eighth year. Having early adopted the medical profession, he attained considerable practice, was appointed Physician in Ordinary to King George IV. and Physician to the Household at Brighton, and created a Baronet in 1818, obtaining a second patent in 1834, extending the limitation to his brother, Edward Tierney, Esq., of Fitzwilliam-square, Dublin, a Crown Solicitor for Ireland. Sir Matthew enjoyed for many years the personal friendship of George IV. and William IV., and received, as a special mark of the latter Monarch's regard, the Knight-Commandership of the Royal Guelphic Order of Hanover. He married, in 1808, Harriett Mary, daughter of the late Henry Jones, Esq., of Bloomsbury-square, but had no issue.

LINCOLN'S INN NEW HALL AND LIBRARY.

Precisely a twelvemonth since we illustrated, in our journal, the inauguration of the New Royal Exchange, by her Majesty in person; and this day we have the gratification of recording graphically in our pages the taste and courtesy of the Sovereign in gracing with her presence the opening of another splendid architectural ornament to our metropolis, in the New Hall and Library just completed for the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn. The Royal and civic pageant of last year was of truly national interest; for, to a nation of high commercial character, an Exchange possesses attractions beyond architectural splendour: it guides us by a "long trail of light" to the mainspring of our national prosperity. There is a kindred interest attached to the new buildings at Lincoln's Inn, storied as are their walls and windows with some of the brightest names in our Legal History during the long vista of Five Centuries, the period from which dates the establishment of the Society.

Before we proceed to describe the new edifice, we shall glance at the locality in olden time.

Lincoln's Inn, the next in importance to the Inner and Middle Temple, occupies great portion of the west side of Chancery Lane, the "New Street" of Stow, and subsequently, styled "Chancellor's Lane." The Inn was named from its having been the site of the palace of Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln and constable of Chester, who died there in the year 1310; into whose hands the ground passed by virtue of a grant from King Edward I. of the old friars' house juxta Oldbourne. The Earl of Lincoln assigned the ground formerly occupied by these friars, and his own mansion, Chichester House, to certain professors of the law, who, adding to the space thus obtained the greater part of that belonging to the see of Chichester, built there an Inn of Court for the study of the laws of England. That part of the Inn which belonged to the bishopric was leased to the Society until 28 Henry VIII., when the Bishop of Chichester granted the inheritance to Francis Sullard, and his brother Eustace, both students, the survivor of whom, (20 Elizabeth,) sold the fee to the Benchers for £620.

One of the oldest portions extant of the Inn is the fine Gateway, or Gatehouse Tower, in Chancery Lane: this was the work of the early part of the 16th century, having been completed 9 Hen. VIII., and almost entirely at the charge of Sir Thomas Lovell, a member of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and a Knight of the Garter: the arms of this worthy adorn the Gatehouse, on which also are placed those of the Lacys. The Hall was commenced in 1506; but has been repeatedly altered and modernised. The bricks and tiles used in the building of this Gateway, and of the Hall, were made from clay dug from a piece of ground, then called Coneygarth, lying on the west side of the Inn adjoining to Lincoln's Inn Fields; and the site of the New Hall and Library, hereafter to be described.

There is an interesting and authentic tradition connected with the erection of Lincoln's Inn, which must not be omitted: its garden-wall was, in part, built by Ben Jonson. Mr. Charles Knight, in his delightful paper, "Ben Jonson in London," thus relates the circumstance:—

In the map of London, according to the survey of Aggas, in 1560, Chancery Lane presents to us only a few scattered houses at the ends which connect it with Fleet-street and Holborn. Nearly the whole of the eastern side exhibits one large inclosed garden; whilst the western has a corresponding portion of greater length, containing a smaller inclosure, that of Lincoln's Inn. In the reign of Elizabeth, when the military spirit of the owners of the soil displayed itself on the battle-field of the Court of Chancery, and the law was fast rising into the most thriving of professions, Chancery Lane would of necessity partake more than an equal share of the common improvements of London. The garden of Lincoln's Inn was a pleasant place, with its formal walks and shady avenues; and the reverend Benchers would naturally desire that the eye of the vulgar passenger should look not upon their solemn musings, nor upon their frequent mirth. And so they built a wall in Chancery Lane to shut out the garden. Upon that wall laboured with his own hands the most illustrious of bricklayers, Benjamin Jonson. "His mother, after his father's death, married a bricklayer, and it is generally said that he wrought some time with his father-in-law, and particularly on the garden-wall of Lincoln's Inn, next to Chancery Lane." This is Aubrey's account: and there can be no doubt of the fact of Jonson's early occupation.—"Knight's London," vol. I., p. 365.)

The next important building in Lincoln's Inn is the Chapel, built for the Society by Inigo Jones: it is of heavy, tasteless design, raised upon huge pillars and arches, once used as a promenade; but now inclosed, as a place of interment for the Benchers. The windows of the Chapel, however, contain some very fine specimens of painted glass.

Next is New-square, which Ralph describes as "one of the neatest squares in town;" adding, "though it is imperfect on one side, yet that very defect produces a beauty, by giving a prospect to the gardens, which fill the space to abundantly more advantage. I may safely add, that no area anywhere is kept in better order, either for cleanliness or beauty by day, or illuminations and decorum by night: the fountain in the middle is a very pretty decoration, and if it was still kept playing, as it was some years ago, it would preserve its name with more propriety, and give greater pleasure into the bargain." This fountain, designed by Inigo Jones, has long been removed; and within the last twelve months, the area has been inclosed and planted with shrubs. At the North-east corner of this Square is the Vice-Chancellor's Court, which scarcely rises above "Carpenters' Gothic." The Hall of Lincoln's Inn is a fine room, though smaller than, and by no means so handsome as, the Halls of the Inner and Middle Temple. It is used for the sittings of the Lord Chancellor out of term-time, and has hitherto been employed for the usual commons of the Society during term.

Next in order of date are the Stone Buildings, from the design of Sir Robert Taylor, which are only part of a noble plan for rebuilding the whole Inn, about fifty years since. It consisted of a northern pavilion, with a portico, and a centre; to which has just been added a pavilion at the south end, according to Sir R. Taylor's design.

PLAN OF LINCOLN'S INN BUILDINGS.

We have not space to glance at the distinguished members of the Inn. Among the most famous of them were Sir Matthew Hale, Prynne, and others, of whom we shall speak hereafter. Erskine was a member, and his statue is placed in the Hall: his coat of arms decorates the walls, together with the escutcheons of Spencer Perceval, Canning, Lyndhurst, Brougham, and other eminent lawyers.

Lincoln's Inn was never behind the Temple in its masques, revels, Christmasings; nor were dancing and singing merely permitted at this Inn, but insisted upon; for, by an order made Feb. 6, 7 James I., "the under-barristers were by decimation put out of commons, for example's sake, because the whole Bar were offended by their not dancing on the Candlemas-day preceding, according to that ancient order of the Society, when the Judges were present;" and a threat, that if the like fault were repeated, they should be fined, or disbarred. "The King of the Cockneys" and "Jack Straw" ruled over the festivities: but they and their adherents were swept away in the time of Elizabeth; when also, the men of this Inn appear to have been rather "topping the mode," so that it was deemed proper to curtail the grand banquets, to limit the number of characters represented at them, to prohibit long hair and lace ruffs; and the wearing of cloaks, swords, and spurs, at the balls. Pepys has left us an account of Christmas, 1661, when Charles II. "visited Lincoln's Inn, to see the revels there; there being, according to an old custome, a prince and all his nobles, and other matters of sport and charge." This must have been a glorious Christmas: "Charles II.'s presence, the attendance of Clarendon, Ormond, and Shaftesbury, and the performance at the revels of Hale, Ley, and Denham: Prynne standing by, and gloomily looking on."—(Knight's London).

It is now time to speak of the Gardens, quaintly described by Ralph, as "far from being admirable, but, then, they are convenient; and considering their situation, cannot be esteemed too much. There is something hospitable, too, in laying them open to public use; and while we share in their pleasures, we have no title to arraign their taste. Their finest feature is the terrace walk, whence you obtain a fine view of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the most extensive square in Europe, comprising in its area, 10 acres of land. This Square was first enclosed about the year 1736, when Sir Joseph Jekyl, then Master of the Rolls, rode over in 'the Fields,' and hurt his hip; this led to the putting up of iron rails; before which time, as the Gentleman's Magazine, it was a receptacle for rude fellows to air horses, and many robberies were committed in it.

The Society of Lincoln's Inn have long studied to maintain the architectural character of this beautiful area; for, at the desire of the Benchers and Students, the Privy Council, about the year 1609, directed a mandate to certain Magistrates of Middlesex, stating it to be the King's express pleasure that the erection of new buildings should be restrained; and ordering the said justices to apprehend and commit to gaol any offenders, and bring them before the Privy Council, to answer the charges: but this curious mandate was not in force many years.

THE NEW BUILDINGS,

the gardens. Their erection originated in the great inconvenience from the old Dining-hall being used as the Lord Chancellor's Court, and also from its not being sufficiently commodious in itself. The Benchers, therefore, determined to erect an entirely new and distinct building, comprising not only a Dining-hall upon a much more extensive scale; but a spacious Library, Benchers' rooms, &c. They, accordingly, selected for their architect, Philip Hardwick, Esq, F.R.S., the architect of Goldsmiths' Hall, the London and Birmingham Railway Terminus, at Euston-square, and many other fine structures. The first stone of the new edifice at Lincoln's Inn was laid April 20, 1843, by the then Treasurer, the Right Hon. Vice-Chancellor Bruce; and the extensive pile was completed, externally, within eighteen months, notwithstanding the greatest care was bestowed upon the works.

Mr. Hardwick, (who has been materially assisted in the design by his son,) has adopted the style of the early part of the 16th century, or the reign of Henry VIII., of which we have many fine examples. Of some, the architects have judiciously availed themselves, as well as of some celebrated Continental specimens. The style, it will be perceived, is coeval with that of the Gatehouse in Chancery Lane already noticed; and the new Buildings occupy the precise spot whence was dug the clay used in making bricks for the old entrance. By courtesy of the publisher of that valuable work, the Companion to the Almanac, we are enabled to present the annexed ground-plan, which will materially assist the reader in understanding the disposition of the several apartments. First, however, we shall describe the Exterior.

THE ENTRANCE GATEWAY AND WEST FRONT.

The Gateway is situated at the southern end of the plan, in a line with the Western Front. It is an embattled arch, flanked by two octagonal piers, surmounted with cupolas, the whole beautifully executed in brick and stone; adjoining is a neat lodge of brick, with stone finishings. There are a centre and two side entrances, the massive oak doors of the former receding into the piers. The entire West Front forms a very conspicuous object from Lincoln's Inn Fields, from which it is screened by a low wall. The whole building extends upwards of 230 feet from North to South, in a direct line, but not in uniform range; it being, conformably with the arrangement of the interior, broken up externally into three principal masses, whereby are obtained considerable play of outline, and pleasing diversity of composition. The three main divisions just mentioned, consist of the Hall at the South end; the Library at the North; while the intermediate portion comprises the Drawing-rooms and the Vestibule. At the North-west angle is an octagonal turret, of considerable elevation.

THE NORTH END

is entirely occupied by the Library, which is placed transversely to the rest of the plan, its length being in the direction of East to West.

THE EAST OR GARDEN FRONT

is, however, by far the most picturesque in effect; the line is less uniform than in the Western front side; besides which, it is set off in contrast with the classic insipidity of Stone Buildings on the opposite side of the Garden. Another advantage is from this front showing its elevation upon a wide parapeted terrace, disposed architecturally with projecting and inclosed flights of steps, which greatly contribute to the picturesqueness and variety, more especially as there is some difference in their respective arrangements. This terrace serves the further purpose of screening the basement offices, which, though sunk below ground with regard to the terrace itself, are very little below the general level of the adjoining garden; consequently, the terrace answers to a raised mound thrown up against the basement areas. True it is that we miss many "tall ancestral trees," which have been cleared away for the court, beneath from the gardens in which Bickerstaff (Tatler, No. 100) delighted to walk, being privileged to do so by the Benchers, "who had grown old" with him. Hereafter we hope to see this loss made up by the whole area being laid out in a fine architectural garden of the period of the building. We delight in its wide and level terraces, its rich stone balustrades, connected by broad flights of stone steps—its clipped evergreen hedges, its embowered alleys, its formal yet intricate parterres, full of curious knots of flowers, its lively and musical fountains, its steep slopes of velvet turf, &c.

THE KITCHEN.

From New Square, the entire pile shows itself to peculiar advantage; more especially with its square massive brick towers, lofty gable, and large storied window, lighting the Great Hall. In the Eastern Tower is one of the principal entrances, above which is a clock and canopy, in appropriate decorated style. Still, we regard this end as the least effective of the architect's design.

THE SOUTHERN END,

Our three exterior views, taken a few days since, will, however, convey a much better idea of the picturesque variety of the whole building than a page of descriptive details. These views may be relied on for graphic accuracy; whereas, every view hitherto published is incorrect, the embellishments and accessories having been materially altered in the progress of the building. The Great Hall bears a Louvre, or Lantern, tastefully enriched, and gilt, yet distinguished by lightness and elegance. The several gables are characteristically ornamented; that at the south being surmounted by a niche, in which is a statue of Queen Victoria. Nor, in the bristling of the roof, must be forgotten the chimney-shafts—those windpipes of hospitality—which are richly ornamented throughout. The material of the building is red brick, intermixed with darker-coloured bricks; the handsome finishings being of warm-tinted stone. The towers at the South end are chequered with dark bricks, and thus correspond with the old Entrance Gateway in Chancery Lane.

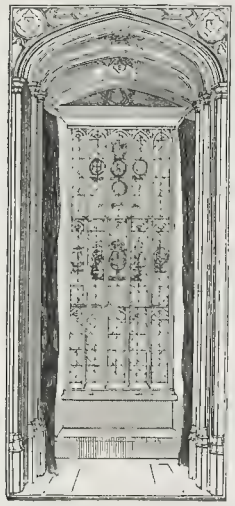
THE INTERIOR.

We now proceed to describe the Interior of this noble pile, for the arrangement of which the reader is referred to the accompanying Plan. The Basement is principally occupied by Offices, if we except the Benchers' Room, a handsome but low bay-windowed chamber beneath the Council Room: this apartment has a richly-ornamented ceiling. Among the Offices ranks pre-eminent the Kitchen, at the south end of the plan. This is a large and lofty apartment, with a stone vaulted roof, supported by columns; and a huge projecting fire-place. It is admirably arranged throughout; and in extent and convenience ranks with the old cryptal kitchens of our forefathers, and the spacious appointments of the modern club-house. An excellent view is obtained of this apartment from a window at the termination of the basement lobby.

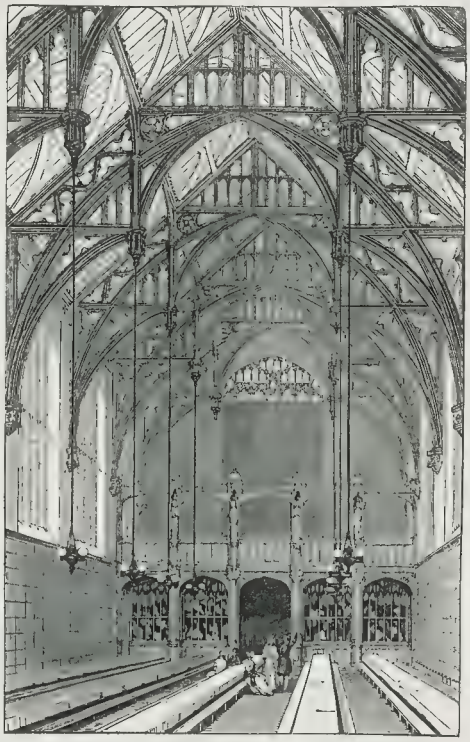
LINCOLN'S INN NEW BUILDINGS.

THE DINING-HALL.

This noble apartment is elevated on the basement story, being an exception to the usual plan of placing this room upon the ground floor: in this respect it resembles the Hall at Raby Castle. The common entrance to the Lincoln's Inn Hall is at the south, or lower end of it, through an oaken screen, beneath the gallery. "And," says a contemporary, "even before it is entered, or if access into it cannot be obtained at all, a clear though not a satisfying view of it may be enjoyed through the screen itself, the latter consisting of open compartments, each of which is filled in with a single sheet of plate-glass. Whether it be entered from this, or the upper end upon the dais, the coup d'œil is highly impressive and splendid." One of our Illustrations represents this southern end, with the gallery and screen: in the latter are niches to be filled by statues in wood, two of which will be those of Archbishops Thiroton and Usher.



THE WESTERN ORIEL, IN THE GREAT HALL.



THE GREAT HALL, SOUTH END.

The main dimensions of the Hall are one hundred and twenty by forty-five feet, increased at the north end to sixty feet, by two spacious oriels at the extremities of the dais, which cause that part of the Hall to become a kind of transept. In point of length, therefore, it falls considerably short of both St. George's Hall, at Windsor Castle; and the Dining Hall of Christ's Hospital, Newgate-street; whose respective lengths are 200 and 187; but then, it exceeds them in breadth, the first of them very considerably; St. George's being only 54 feet wide, (consequently, partaking more of the character of a gallery than of a hall in its proportions), while the breadth of the second is 40 feet, which is narrow in comparison with the length. In magnitude and spaciousness of a different kind—namely, that of loftiness, it excels both; its extreme height to the ridge of the roof being 64 feet, or 34 feet more than that of the Windsor Hall, and 17 more than that of Christ's Hospital. Nor is it in the effect of mere loftiness that it excels them, for it does so infinitely more in the magnificence of its fine open timber roof of oak, which produces a powerful degree of character as well as magnificence, and is complete climax. This roof resembles those of Crosby and Westminster Halls, and especially of the latter, in having two arches supporting the larger one; one of the former springing from the wall, and the other from a horizontal beam resting on the crown of the lower arch: the apex of the large arch also supports a beam, whence king and queen posts carry the gable. The brackets, whence spring the large arches, are from Crosby Hall. The pendents are, in character, like those of the Divinity School, at Oxford, or perhaps, more like those at Hampton Court; both fine specimens of the Tudor roof. "The top beam of the hall" is a noble toast, and of ten may it resound through the magnificent apartment at Lincoln's Inn! It is admirably lit by six large windows on each side, beneath which is oak paneling extending to the floor: the fenestration, or rather the arrangement of these windows, contributes very materially to symmetry of design, and beauty of ensemble. There are, too, the large and lofty window at the south end; and the double bays, at the dais, which are somewhat rare; Crosby Hall, Trinity Hall (Cambridge), and many other halls, have a bay on one side of the dais only. In several large Halls, too, there are windows only on one side, nor is there any large end window to complete the vista. The upper halves of the windows of the Hall are filled with arms; and the lower halves bear the initials of Lincoln's Inn—L. I.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1845.

RUSSIA is the most imposing of all the European Powers. This is true in the double sense of the term—the equivocal as well as the generally-accepted meaning. It finds its account in this; a vague belief in its vast resources, in its overwhelming military strength, and even, in some degree, in its naval supremacy, assists its diplomacy. Men have taken its own assertions for granted, and permitted it to assume an influence in the affairs of Europe to which its real power and strength by no means entitle it. Russia, in fact, has elevated herself, or, what is better, has got others to elevate her into the bugbear or scarecrow of the civilised world. But with all the care she takes to repress and smother the truth in her own dominions, and prevent its circulation abroad, facts are perpetually occurring which let out the true state of things; and travellers who can go a little deeper than the mere surface of diplomatic dinners, imperial attentions, and official politeness, have pretty well exposed the hollowness and pretence of the Russian Government, which in most of things to which the true strength of a state consists must be pronounced altogether deficient. At the moment when the disasters of the Russian army in the Caucasus are drawing attention and criticism to her military powers, with the effect of dissipating many of the exaggerated notions with respect to it which were common at no very remote period and are very prevalent still, it may be useful to state a few facts connected with another branch of her power—her fleet and fortifications. This we are enabled to do by a paper lately published in the Journal des Débats, communicated by M. Hommaire de Hell, author of " Travels in Southern Russia, the Caucasus, and the Coasts of the Caspian Sea." He describes at some length the works constructed by the Emperor at Sebastopol. It was a favourite project; the place was intended to be made the chief port of the Black Sea; the expenditure of money has been lavish; but what are the results? It is stated that docks, fortifications, and batteries are alike badly constructed, and, for their purposes, are complete failures! The universal and almost incredible venality and corruption of the Russian officials, from the highest to the lowest, have defeated the intentions of the Emperor, and the works of Sebastopol stand as witnesses of the apparent power and real weakness of the Autocrat. The bad morale of the instruments he works with perpetually defeats him.

In 1830 and 1831, when the Revolution of July threatened to overturn more than one of the European Governments, some articles appeared in the French and English journals, on the military and naval power of Russia, as she was considered the probable ally of legitimacy and absolute power in Europe in any general struggle. In those articles it was demonstrated that the attack and destruction of the Russian fleet in the port of Sebastopol was not only possible, but easy to a well-armed squadron. The Emperor took the alarm, and the works were commenced. They are constructed on an enormous scale, and have, like many other things in Russia, an "imposing" appearance; but the eye of the skilled military engineer detects faults and blunders so great and so numerous as to deprive them of the greatest part of their efficiency. The defences of the place consist of four forts, containing eleven batteries. Each of the four is built in three stages, the number of cannon that bristle from each fort being not less than from 250 to 300. They appear truly formidable at first sight, but the real defensive power is far from corresponding with it. It might almost be supposed they were intended rather to astonish the eye in time of peace than to defy an attack during war. Military critics say that the construction of the batteries in this triple tier of guns is of itself vicious; even in the lowest tier the guns are not placed sufficiently level with the surface of the water, notwithstanding there is no rise or fall of tide. The interior arrangements are equally opposed to the rules of military architecture. Each stage is formed by a suite of casemated chambers communicating with each other. They are all so narrow, and the ventilation has been so little attended to, that the smoke of a few discharges would render the working of the guns difficult, if not impossible! But a greater defect than this is visible throughout the whole construction, one which endangers the existence of the whole of the works. The material employed is a coarse, friable, calcareous stone, and the masonry is so carelessly executed, that it is doubtful whether the batteries would stand at all under the tremendous recoil of three hundred pieces of artillery! They would certainly be dangerously shaken; the few trials that have been made from Fort Constantine prove that the opinion is well founded; a few discharges sufficed to rend the walls, in several places, in large cracks!

In the construction of the Docks, similar, if not grosser errors, have been committed. The same fragile material has been employed in the work, though so little calculated to withstand the action of water. The angles only of the walls are of granite. Another strange oversight should be mentioned. The water of the port swarms with a destructive worm, that commits such ravages on the bottoms of the vessels laid up in it, as sometimes to render a ship unserviceable in two or three years. To escape this source of mischief, the engineers thought it would be better to supply the enclosed docks with fresh water, by turning into them the little river Tchernoi-Retchka, which emptied itself into the principal creek of the harbour. Three aqueducts and two tunnels were constructed at an enormous expense, and when the works for this purpose were nearly completed, the engineers were confounded by the discovery that it was precisely the muddy water of the river that most abounded with the devouring worm whose ravages they had taken such pains to prevent! They were, in fact, brought down into the harbour by the river itself. The tunnels and aqueducts were so much labour thrown away.

The description given of the fleet, of which Sebastopol serves as the "harbour of refuge," contains another exposure of the official immorality that pervades every department of the Russian Government, and exhibits the cause why so much undertaken by the chief authority proves such a signal failure. Despotism itself, though armed with power and wealth, and wielding the knout or sending to Siberia at its own caprice, contends in vain with corruption, when that corruption is universal. We give the passage in the words of the writer himself:—" Like everything else in Russia, the ships of war dazzle and astonish at first sight, but cannot stand a minute examination. From what is notorious of administrative venality here, it is easy to imagine that such malversation must affect the arsenal as much as any other department. In vain the Government lavishes its money, and orders the purchase of the best materials the forests and factories can produce; all its efforts are neutralised by the dishonesty and avarice of its officers. Thus the vessels are generally constructed of worthless materials, and there is no description of pillage and embezzlement which is not carried on while they are being built and fitted out. All the ships are ready to be worn out a single voyage has, in some cases, sufficed to damage them seriously, and render them unserviceable." This is but one witness added to many others who have described the prevalence of this rottenness in the whole Russian system. Great pretence, and little reality, is always discoverable. The official reports of the numbers of regiments and battalions are always falsified; the nominal strength always far exceeds the real. Throughout the Empire all is hollowness and deception. The law, the civil service, the police, the army—all are conducted on the same system; the pay is wretchedly small, and the officials make it up by plunder and peculation, at which it is difficult to conceive that the supreme authority is not wilfully blind, from the impossibility of changing what has become the tone of the public mind. As long as the pompous pretences and official humbug of Russian employés are credited by foreigners, without inquiry, it answers its purpose, and Russia is considered a Great Power. But any collision proves that it is weakness in disguise. When the under-manned regiments, that figure so grandly in a return—plundered, as the men are, in their pay, clothing, and food, with a hospital service of which the very medicines and bedding are often sold, instead of used—are led by officers who have no zeal, as they are commanded by Generals whose plunders show they have no talent, it needs but little perception to trace the causes that have enabled a handful of men to defy for years the whole power of the Empire, and, in the last campaign, to defeat them, with loss and disgrace almost unexampled in military annals. If this has been effected by a small mountain tribe, close on the frontier of Russia, with small means and little wealth, at a time when all the strength of Russia could be brought against them, what have the rich, powerful, well-disciplined nations of Europe to fear from this great northern imposter? The hard winter of 1812, and the madness of Napoleon in exposing his army to it, gave to Russia a share in the downfall of the French Emperor in which the elements did far more than her arms; but it elevated her military reputation to a pitch altogether undeserved. Her forces had no part in the last and decisive conflict of Waterloo, though they marched with the Allies to Paris. She has never gained an inch on the territory of Europe, except by chicanery and fraud, as in the gigantic crime of the partition of Poland; in another direction a mere mountain tribe, hardly to be called a power at all, can hold her in check. What has Europe to fear from such an unmanageable mass as the Empire of Russia presents? Yet we have seen French speculations of the probability of the Cossack again ravaging the banks of the Seine! But the more that is known of Russia the more contemptible (as an aggressive power) she will appear. And such is the amount of misconception that was created on this subject, that those who have the slightest means are bound to take every opportunity of dispelling it.

DINNER TO SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH.—A public dinner was given on Wednesday, at the Bridge-house Hotel, London-bridge, to Sir Wm. Molesworth, M.P., in celebration of his return as member of Parliament for the borough of Southwark. The chair was entered by Alderman Sir Emanuel Cooper, Esq., the chairman: W. D. Christie, Esq., M.P.; C. Ellis, Esq.; W. Wilson, Esq.; and other gentlemen. The hon. baronet was received with repeated rounds of cheers, and seemed perfectly recovered from the effects of his late indisposition. J. Bright, Esq., M.P., entered the room about half-past seven, having just arrived by train from Manchester, and was received with rounds of applause. On the removal of the cloth, the usual loyal toasts were given from the chair and duly responded to. The Chairman then, in a highly eulogistic strain, proposed the health of their own representative, which was most cordially responded to, and Sir William in his speech of thanks in return, entered into a statement of his political principles. The other principal speakers were Mr. Bright and Mr. Christie.

The Frankfort Gazette states that the Grand Duke Nicholas, the heir to the throne of Russia, had arrived at Botzen, in the Tyrol, on his way to Italy, to join the Emperor.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, left the Castle this morning, shortly after nine o'clock, in a close travelling carriage and four, for the Slough station, and proceeded thence, in the State carriage of the Great Western Railway Company, to town, in order to honour with her presence the Opening of the New Hall at Lincoln's Inn. In the suite of her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Prince were the Earl of Jersey and Lady Mary Sackville West, the Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, the Hon. Miss Stanley, the Earl of Hardwicke, Captain the Hon. Nelson Hood, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Sir Edward Sutton of the Royal Household. Her Majesty was escorted to Slough by a detachment of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Georgiana Bathurst, took her departure from the Castle this morning, for Gloucester House, Piccadilly; calling upon the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore, to take leave before proceeding to town. The Earl and Countess of Clarendon also left the Castle, this morning, for the metropolis. The infant Royal Family were taken out this morning, and again in the afternoon, for their usual airings. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort arrived at the Castle this evening from town, attended as upon their departure by their respective suites. There will be no dinner party at the Castle this evening.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by Baron Knesebeck, arrived at Hanover on a visit to the King in the early part of last week, from Berlin, in order to be present to act as sponsor in person for the infant Hereditary Prince, and was to remain there about a week after the baptismal solemnity, when the Royal Duke was to go to New Strelitz, where the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary are staying with the Grand Duke and the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz. His Royal Highness was to leave Hanover for home from Germany.

RETURN OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON TO TOWN.—The Duke of Wellington arrived at Apsley House on Wednesday from Walmer Castle, accompanied by Lord Charles Wellesley. Lord Charles Wellesley has gone on a visit to the Right Hon. Henry Pierrepont, at Conholt Park, near Andover.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—We regret to state that the Premier is suffering from an attack of gout in the feet, which prevented the Right Hon. Baronet being present at the opening of the new Hall and Library, Lincoln's-inn, by her Majesty on Thursday. Sir James Graham and several of the Cabinet Ministers visited Sir Robert Peel early on Thursday morning at the Right Hon. Baronet's residence in Whitehall gardens.

THE DUKE OF LORD MONTAGE.—Shelley Castle was expired on Thursday evening last, at a quarter before ten o'clock, at the town residence of the family, Hamilton-place, in the 69th year of his age. He was uncle to the present Duke of Buccleuch.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—The Gallery was re-opened to the public on Monday morning, having been closed since the 11th of September last.

NEW BRANCH GENERAL POST-OFFICE.—Several houses on the south side of Piccadilly, near St. James's Church, have been sold for the purpose of immediately being razed to the ground, on the site of which is to be erected a capacious new Branch General Post-office, the one at Charing Cross, from the extreme increase of business, being found to be considerably too small for the transaction of public business, and it is to be removed into Piccadilly.

ABOLITION OF SUNDAY TOLLS.—The Southwark "Sunday" toll-bars are now in course of being pulled down. Workmen are engaged upon those at Bermondsey Church and Deckhead. These bars were the last existing Sunday tolls in England.

THE NEW STREET OF FLEET-STREET.—It is stated officially that the thoroughfare of Fleet street and Temple-bar will be opened on Wednesday next, after being closed for upwards of one month. The cost of the sewer when completed will be upwards of £20,000.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—It appears from the table of the mortality in the metropolis, published by the authority of the Registrar General, that the number of deaths in the week ended on Saturday last, was 774; of which number 395 were males, and 379 females. The deaths in the week have been 161 less than in the corresponding week of last year, and 246 less than the weekly average of the autumns of the last five years. The number of births during the past week was 1265.

COUNTRY NEWS.

FATAL AND ALARMING FIRE AT GRAVESEND.

Early on Sunday morning last, a fire broke out in High street, Gravesend, at the house of Mr. King, the Black Horse, and that house, together with five others in front, and three in the rear, were speedily reduced to a heap of ruins.

Thomas Mee, a watchman in the employ of Mr. Wombwell, whose menagerie was then in the fair held last week at Gravesend, was burned to death

It appears that the first alarm was given to a man named Calcraft, a lodger, who, while in bed, smelt a strong smell of fire. He immediately got up, and then he perceived that the lower part of the house was in flames He directly shouted "Fire" as loud as he was able, and in another moment he heard some of the parties stirring in the rooms over head. Mrs. King, the wife of the occupier of the house, instantly threw up the sash of her bedroom window and jumped into the street. The poor creature was considerably injured by her fall, but she was conveyed to the Five Bells Tap, where every attention was paid to her, and we are glad to state that she has sustained no serious contusions. Another man, named James Ford, who was working at Mr. Simmons's, the black maker, and who was a lodger at the Black Horse, was so alarmed that he jumped out of the third floor window, and was taken to the workhouse:—He states that he was awakened by Thomas Mee, the man who is lost in the ruins, who aroused him by calling out, "For God's sake get up, as the house is on fire, and I can't tell how we are to get out, as the flames are coming up stairs." Ford jumped out of bed, and upon opening the door and looking down the staircase, he saw the flames mounting with the most frightful rapidity, but thinking it would be better if he could get into the floor below, he and Thomas Mee attempted to descend the stairs, but this they could not do, the flames were so powerful, so he jumped back to enter into the bedroom again, and jump after him into the street, as there appeared no other chance of escape. Ford, having jumped out, saw no more of Mee, nor has he since been seen or heard of. A servant girl was saved, by being taken through a side window into an adjoining house. Several other parties escaped over the roof. Cleveland, one of the Gravesend fire police, states that when he arrived at the scene, the inmates of the premises were all asleep, and the screams of the people in the house were heartrending. He obtained the engine ladders, and clambered into the first floor of the Catherine Wheel public house, for the purpose of rendering any assistance to the sufferers. He got upon the landing just in time to rescue the servant of Mr. King, who was standing at a window. He then went on to the gutter of the Catherine Wheel, and, after he had got out the boys mentioned in the last account, he assisted to get out the girl, which ran in a stream at his feet, and compelled him to quit the spot. At this moment a man named Aldridge came to his assistance, and succeeded in saving another female, in a similar manner. They then ran along the parapet, and Aldridge saved himself by sliding down a piece of iron used as a stay to the stack of chimneys, by which he was badly burned, and he now lies at the Five Bells.

Search was made for the body of the unfortunate watchman, Mee, during the whole of Monday, but only a small bone of an arm was found, supposed to be a portion of the poor fellow. It is said that an Italian is also missing, who was lodging at the Black Horse at the time of the fire.

At the time the fire broke out, there were, as Mrs. King states, 26 persons, including children, in the house. Mrs King was badly hurt. Mr. King, the landlord of the Black Horse, was not at home. He is but partially insured, and his loss, it is said, is little less than ruinous to him. How the fire originated is doubtful, but there are no strong reasons for believing that it was in the smoking-room. The policeman states that when he first discovered it, the flame was issuing from a window on the first floor. The loss is variously estimated, but it would appear to be about £10,000.

WARWICKSHIRE.—The writ for the election of a representative for the northern division of this county, in the room of the late Sir John Mordaunt, Bart., arrived on Friday (last week) and the nomination is fixed for Wednesday the 5th of November. Lord Brooke is at present the only candidate; and it is thought that the noble lord will be returned without opposition.

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM SOIREE.—The annual soirée or literary meeting of the members and friends of this Institution was held on Thursday evening (last week), in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. The interest manifested by the people of this locality was, perhaps, greater than on any former occasion. Tickets were issued for 3,000 persons, but the demand far exceeded that number; and on the day before the meeting as much as three guineas were offered for tickets which originally cost 7s. 6d. The directors had provided ample accommodation for the company, and the attraction offered was of a high character. The great lion of the day was to have been Mr Charles Dickens; and, next to him, Mr Eugene Sue and M. Thiers: but from various causes those gentlemen were absent. Mr. Sergeant Talfourd was announced to take the chair on the occasion, and addressed the meeting for nearly 50 minutes on the advantages of such institutions, and on the progress made by that of Manchester. Mr. Mark Philips, Mr. F. Stone, Mr. Douglas Jerrold, Mr. M. Gibbs, and Mr. C. Dickens also addressed the meeting in succession.

MEETING OF THE ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE AT MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the League took place at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. It is computed that nearly 7,000 persons were present. Mr. G. Wilson, the Chairman of the League, presided. Mr. Cobden addressed the meeting, and after contending that famine stood Ireland in the face, said the only thing to be done was to open every port, and admit corn instead of the whole world to feed the people. Mr. Cobden strongly urged Sir R. Peel to adopt this course. He then observed upon Railway speculation; and in allusion to Mr. Hudson, called him the "King of Spades." Mr. Cobden spoke very confidently of the coming Repeal of the Corn Laws. After a speech from Mr. Henry Ashworth, Mr. Bright, M.P. addressed the meeting at great length. He emphatically urged the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and concluded thus:—"We war not with any right of any man—we war with a law which all men are beginning to doubt, and which most intelligent and good men hate. We want to substitute for that law the original character by which men have a right to live and to earn, and to enjoy the fruits of their earnings. 'And God said, Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be given.' Was the Scripture written only for our first parents? Was it intended only for those who should inhabit that, to us, most distant land, or was it not an universal gift and benediction? Was it not given by inspiration that mankind, till the end of time, till the world should be wrapped in flame, should trust in Him who gave that promise: and if we thus believe, how dreadful our abandonment of God—how awful the crime—not less than even that of those who made the Corn Laws—if we step back from that duty, if we fail in the work we have set ourselves, which is to abolish by the law that restricts the bounty of Providence, and to establish the original and heaven-given law which will give plenty to all the earth!" (Cheers.) A vote of thanks was carried, with loud cheers, to the gentlemen who addressed the meeting; also to the chairman; after which the meeting separated.

LAMENTABLE FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE AT NORTHWICH (CHESHIRE).—On Sunday morning, about half-past three, a fire broke out in the farm buildings of Mr. Furber, a farmer, at Shipbrooke, about three miles from Northwich, which ended, we regret to say, in the deaths of three children, and the destruction of the whole of the barns, stables, and other outbuildings on one side of the premises, with the hay, straw, and grain, the whole of the produce of the late harvest, and implements of husbandry.

IRELAND.

REPEAL DINNER AT RATHKEALE.

On Wednesday (last week) the Repealers of the village of Rathkeale and the adjoining parishes entertained, at dinner, Mr. W. S. O'Brien. There was a procession in the early part of the day. When the procession arrived at its destination, Mr. Ferguson, barrister, was voted to a chair, from whence he recited the deeds of Brien the Brave in a manner worthy of the ancient Irish bards. Then Father Collins moved a vote of confidence in Mr. O'Brien, which was carried amidst thunders of applause.

Mr. O'Brien then delivered a speech, and a petition to Parliament was adopted.

Mr O'Connell then rose, and expressed his delight at the glorious display of feeling around him in favour of Mr. O'Brien, in all of which he participated. "I came here," continued Mr. O'Connell, "to pay him this day that tribute; and here now you are cheerily and heartily joining with me in paying it to him. (Cheers.) But it will not do merely to shout—you must secure him a new representative in every future Parliament, whether it may be for a time in London—and it shall only be for a time there—(cheers)—and when it is restored to Ireland in the Parliament in College-green. (Cheers.) His person must be as triumphant as are his political services. (Cheers.) This county must be, as it is, proud of having such a representative—(cheers); and I call upon you to pledge yourselves to me when you go home to-night and in your conversation the ensuing week, to let it be each other how every man can be registered that is not so, and to send us the names to the Repeal Wardens, or to the parish priest, if he be kind enough to receive them. This is working. This is showing gratitude. I will tell you the inquiry I will make when I next address a meeting in the county of Limerick—I will ask whether there is a single man in any parish that is not registered. I think the man will be degraded, and miserable, and ungrateful wretch, that does not register for Smith O'Brien." (Cheers.)

Dr. Gray next addressed the meeting, after which it separated

The dinner took place in a small room in Thomas street, and covers were laid for about 200. Father Synan, Catholic curate of Rathkeale, presided.

The toast of the evening brought on his legs Mr. Smith O'Brien, who began his speech by a history of his early political struggles, and thus proceeded:—"I am now in your neighbourhood, and I am glad of the circumstance, that there was no hope of just or useful measures for Ireland from the Imperial Parliament, and that to the legislative independence of my country, and to that alone, I should look for the attainment of these blessings. This was the dream of my existence—for it I have lived, and I trust the time may never arrive when it will be necessary for me to tell you that for it I will die. (Tremendous cheering, which continued for several minutes.) You have called it a dream, but it was no dream as far as regards its realisation. (Hear).

The next toast was "Daniel O'Connell and the Repeal of the Union."

Mr. O'Connell responded, and said—I tell England that the connection is severed if the day arrives that the cruelty and oppression, and above all the absentee drain can no longer be endured. (Hear, hear.) That absentee pecuniary drain can be cured by nothing but the Repeal of the Union. (Hear, hear.) There are remedies almost for every other grievance—there is none for the absentee drain but Repeal of the Union and a domestic Parliament. (Hear, hear.) There is another point on which we are struggling now that is to augment the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; the concentration of the governmental power in England has given the Minister authority to an extent that is unlimited in its nature; the Minister is everything, the Queen or Monarch is nothing. (Hear, hear.) The Queen has no real power; amusement she enjoys—trips of pleasure, and matters of that sort, that most respected lady certainly may enjoy, but practical power she has none. (Hear, hear.) I want the people of England to understand, and I am now addressing them from Ireland. You think that I am addressing you (laughter); but I am really talking to the people of England, and I tell the people of England the concentration of so much power as the Crown has in the hands of the Minister—that Minister domineers over the Queen; whoever the majority of the Commons chooses to make Minister, is the real monarch of the day. He may permit the Queen to have such enjoyments as amuse her side of the other, would augment her own authority. (Hear, hear.) So the Repeal of the Union is a Royalist phrase for restoring the prerogatives of the Crown, restrained by Parliamentary authority, but self-acting with a responsible Minister, and with a Parliament to obey, but not a usurpation, as at the present moment. The third thing we are asking for is the happiness of Ireland. (Cheers.) The honest and learned gentleman concluded with the "Great, glorious, and free" couplet.

Several other toasts were drunk, and at eleven o'clock the company separated.

FREE IMPORTATION OF CORN.—A report has been circulated at Dublin, which appears to be at least premature, that a Treasury order had been received at the Dublin Custom-house, "for the admission of foreign corn DUTY FREE on and after the 1st of November."

THE POTATO DISEASE—GOVERNMENT COMMISSION.—A letter from Dublin, dated Monday, says:—In the reports received this day there is conclusive evidence of the spread of the disease in Kerry and other counties, which were considered quite free from the pestilence at the close of [illegible] In the above part of the country unvisited by the blight; but some counties the loss is much greater than in others—in Fermanagh and Longford, for instance, and generally upon limestone soils, or where lime has been used as manure. On log soils, the potato crop has been much less affected than in rich heavy lands. Taken altogether, the present crop is tremendous, amounting, according to the most careful calculations, and allowing much for exaggerated alarm, to fully one third of the entire crop. But the worst feature in the calamity is, the uncertainty that still exists—and the continued accounts of new losses. On the other hand, it appears certain that the disease has been checked by the use of lime or other alkali, or by merely removing the potatoes to dry outhouses, and other simple precautions. All accounts concur in describing the apple potatoes—the latest in ripening, and the description which keeps sound to the latest period—as nearly all destroyed. The apple potato, however, is consumed chiefly by the wealthier classes, and is not near so extensively grown as other kinds. Cup potatoes, which are greatly used by the humbler classes throughout the year, have suffered less than any others. But lampers, the most inferior, and forming the food of the poor in many places, are affected to a ruinous extent. The Government Commissioners, consisting of Professors Kane, Lindley, and Playfair, have held a public sitting at the Dublin Society House, and received a variety of communications, generally to this effect.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Count Cassini, the last of the name, a member of the Academy of Sciences, formerly director of the Royal Observatory of Paris, Chevalier of the order of St. Louis, and of the Legion of Honour, died on the 18th inst. at his chateau of Thury-sous-Clermont (Oise), aged 90.

The Leipsic Gazette says that the King of Wurtemberg, having arrived at Ulm, the municipal council went to pay their respects. His Majesty inquired why they had granted to the Abbé Ronge and the German Catholics the use of the cathedral, observing that what had taken place at Stuttgart ought to have served them as an example. The Mayor replied that he had imagined it to be the only means of maintaining order, and that as Ulm the sympathy for German Catholicism was still stronger than at Stuttgard, where the civil and military authorities had not been able to agree on the subject. The King replied that, as long as German Catholicism was in its germ, and it was impossible to say whether it would be consolidated, he did not with his concessions to be considered as an acknowledgment. It is because the liberty of conscience was established in Wurtemberg that his Majesty was desirous that his Roman Catholic subjects should not be injured

Mr. John Deas Thomson, who was lately convicted of extensive depredations at the Cape, died there early in August. "From the time of his arrival at the South Convict Station," writes a correspondent of the South African, "he appeared to turn his attention to religion, and the necessity of a preparation for another world." His wife is at present in England, en favouring to procure a mitigation of his punishment.

The Universal German Gazette denies that the news from Italy is of so satisfactory a character as has been represented. The attempt at Rimini was by no means of an isolated character, but was attached to a general movement. The Augsburg Gazette publishes a letter from Rome, of the 14th instant, saying that the state prisons contain no less than 7000 prisoners, among whom are members of many distinguished families.

Letters from the Sandwich Islands to the 20th May, state that Queen Pomare still remained at Raetea, blockaded by French forces, and one of her chiefs, who aided in the assassination of some Frenchmen, had been shot by the French authorities. The Legislative Council of the Sandwich Islands, consisting of a House of Nobles and a House of Representatives, was convened on the 20th of May. The opening of the Council was conducted with all the formality of the opening of the British Parliament. Guns were fired from the forts, and the foreign vessels responded. The King's speech is in imitation of that of the Kings of Europe.

A letter from Milan of the 15th ult., says:—"The short visit made by the Emperor Nicholas to our city has been attended with a disastrous occurrence. Yesterday, Marshal Radetski wished to entertain his Majesty with a review; most of the troops of the garrison being still on the ground between Breschia and Verona, where the autumnal manœuvres are yearly practised, the Marshal hastily called in and collected 4000 infantry and 1000 cavalry. Unfortunately, in the precipitation with which this measure was taken some of the soldiers had distributed to them ball cartridges. Consequently, at the first fire several persons were wounded. The number is not known, but we have learnt that four were carried to the hospital in the town, and that one of them is since dead."

The Emperor of Russia, accompanied by the Empress and the Grand Duchess Olga, whom he joined at Milan, reached Genoa on the 10th. The Emperor entered the town in the costume of a Russian General officer, with diamond and gold epaulettes, and a casque à la Romaine. His handsome figure and face were themes of general admiration. The Empress at his side evinced by her air of suffering, how much her health needed amendment, although the climate of Italy has already been of some service to her. The Imperial Family alighted at the Palace Durazzo, the residence of Charles Albert, the King of Sardinia, who left it for the Palace of the Doges, that he might offer it to his guests. On the 21st, the Imperial Family embarked, accompanied by their suite, for Palermo, on board several Russian frigates which were waiting to receive them.

The ratifications of the treaty of amity and commerce, concluded on the 24th October, 1844, between the Plenipotentiaries of the King of the French and the Emperor of China, were exchanged on the 25th of August last, at Taiphani, near the Bogue, in the palace of the Mandarin Admiral, who commands the Chinese force in the Canton River.

According to letters from Mexico of the 3rd September, the peace of the city had not been disturbed, notwithstanding the daily rumours of conspiracies being formed among the troops. General Paredes had published a proclamation to his troops friendly to the Government. The dispute between the French Minister and the Mexican Government had ended unfavourably, and the Minister received his passport on the 8th August. The city was then quiet, and the Tariff Commission were actively engaged in forming a scale of duties.

A German paper announces an ordinance from the authority, that the question of the marriage of the Queen of Spain, as also that of her sister, is to be definitively settled. Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg is to be the Royal consort of Isabella II., and the Duke de Montpensier the husband of the Infanta Luisa.

The Leipsic fair just over has been an excellent one, except for woollens and hogs' bristles. Very extensive business has been done in cloths of all descriptions, at higher prices than those which ruled last year. The produce of the Zollverein manufactures, as well as articles of luxury and fashion, were in great demand. Leather sold freely, and at advanced prices.

A letter from Rome of the 18th of October mentions that the Governor of Bologna is still unsafe in consequence of the conspiracies. The state prisons were filled with 7000 prisoners, many of them of the first families. The Papal Government contemplates a new loan, to which fact the decline in the Roman Stock was attributed.

A letter from Munich, dated the 23rd of October, contains the following:—"The Abbés Ronge and Doniat, who had left us for Constance, have just made an excursion to Switzerland. They have received a public ovation among the Baden people and Swiss on the frontier, and at one moment a disturbance was dreaded. When Ronge began to preach from a pulpit erected on the frontier, the auditors on both sides were on the Swiss territory warmly applauded him, whilst those on the Baden side of the frontier received his sermon with cries and hisses. Tranquility was, however, not further disturbed."

According to a letter from Rome, of the 14th ult., some more refugees from the Papal States had entered Tuscany, and another demand had been made by the Papal Government for their extradition; but this, like the first demand, had been rejected by the Grand Duke.

The French Minister of Marine having been applied to by the Chamber of Commerce of Havre to send out a vessel in search of Captain Hyenne and the twelve men of the Angelena, who were captured in the Mariyave Islands, has returned an answer that he has already dispatched orders to the Governor of the French establishments in Oceana, to send a vessel to ascertain whether the men were still alive, and, if so, to deliver them from their captivity. If, on the other hand, it was found that they had been put to death, the crime thus perpetrated was to be forthwith avenged.

An extract of a letter from Rome of the 18th ult., states that, at a Congress of the Cardinals, under the Presidency of Monsignour Lambruschini, Secretary of State, it was resolved that a new loan shall be raised to enable more Swiss regiments, which proceedings were intended to put foreign force to ten thousand men. The Swiss were to replace the native troops in all the chief towns of the Roman States.

A letter from Berlin, Oct. 23, says:—"Yesterday a deputation of four of the chief merchants of this place had an audience of the Minister of State, the head of the bank, to request him to alleviate the financial crisis which pressed on the market. The Minister, it is said, received their demand very favourably, and promised to advance 3,000,000 of thalers, but only at the rate of 5000 at a time. He stated, at the same time, that the Bank had already advanced or discounted not less than 23,000,000 thalers."

The hostility towards the Abbé Ronge and his doctrines is very strong in some parts of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg. On the 18th ult. a notice was issued at Ellwangen, that there would be a shooting match on the following day, and that the effigy of Ronge would be set up as the target. The police, however, interfered to prevent this scandalous manifestation of religious hatred.

The Correctional Tribune of Perpignan has just decided in the case of Mdlle. Rabie, governess, accused of having signed the Marquise's name in his house, for his own private use, that the law never intended to exact penalties for a person's having a few foreign clears in his possession for his own consumption. It accordingly dismissed the complaint, and ordered the cigars to be restored.

Prince de Polignac, ex-Minister of Charles X., arrived on Monday week at Nancy, where the deplorable state of his health has hitherto detained him. Prince de Polignac, who has slighted at the Hotel de France, with his family and a chaplain, has come from Germany, and is repairing to Paris. The Princess has left Nancy for the capital.

From a Stockholm letter, of the 14th October, we learn that the prevalent disease in the potatoes has made its appearance in only a very few parts of Sweden; but, as the crop in general was scanty, the Government had issued an interdict against the exportation of potatoes from the 1st of November till the end of September in the next year.

POSTCRIPTS.

THE OPENING OF THE NEW HALL, LINCOLN'S INN.

The following is a copy of the Address presented by the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn to her Majesty, on Thursday (see p. 289).

"TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"The humble Address of the Treasurer and Masters of the Bench, the Barristers, and Fellows of the Society of Lincoln's Inn.

"MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY.—We, your Majesty's faithful subjects, the Treasurer and Masters of the Bench, the Barristers and Fellows of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, entreat your Majesty's permission humbly to testify the joy and gratitude inspired by your august presence.

"An edifice in which, under such happy auspices, we are for the first time assembled, is adorned with memorials of many servants of the Crown, eminent for their talents, their learning, and their integrity. To the services, as recorded in history, of these our distinguished predecessors, we appeal, in all humility, for our justification in aspiring to receive your Majesty beneath this roof.

"Two centuries have passed away since the Inns of Court were so honoured by the presence of the reigning Prince. We cannot, therefore, but feel deeply grateful for a mark so conspicuous of your Majesty's condescension, and of your gracious regard for the profession of the law.

"It is our earnest desire to deserve this proof of your Majesty's favour by a zealous execution of the trust reposed in us, to guard and maintain the dignity of the Bar of England.

"In our endeavours to this end we shall but follow in the course which it has been your Majesty's Royal pleasure to pursue. Signally has your Majesty fostered the independence of the bar, and the purity of the bench, by distributing the honours which you have graciously bestowed on the profession among the members of all parties in the state.

"Permit us, then, most Gracious Sovereign, to offer to your Majesty our sincere congratulations on the great amendments of the law which have been effected since your Majesty's accession to the Throne, throughout many portions of your vast empire.

"The pure glory of these labours will be dear to your Majesty's Royal heart, for it arises from the welfare of your subjects.

"That your Majesty may long reign over a loyal, prosperous, and contented people, is our devout and fervent prayer to Almighty God."

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER.

"I receive with cordial satisfaction this dutiful address.

"My beloved Consort and I have accepted, with pleasure, your invitation; for I recognise the services rendered to the Crown, at various periods of our history, by distinguished members of this Society; and I gladly testify my respect for the profession of the law, by which I am aided in administering justice, and in maintaining the prerogatives of the Crown and the rights of my people.

"I congratulate you on the completion of this noble edifice; it is worthy of the memory of your predecessors, and of the station which you occupy in connection with the Bar of England.

"I sincerely hope that learning long may flourish, and that virtue and talent may rise to eminence within these walls."

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council, the first since the close of the last sessions, was held yesterday, (Friday) at the private residence of Sir Robert Peel in Whitehall gardens. The Duke of Wellington and the other Cabinet Ministers in town were present. Sir James Graham had a long interview with the right hon. baronet previous to the ministers assembling.

MOVING OF HER MAJESTY TO OSBORNE HOUSE.—HER Majesty and the Prince Consort are expected to pay a visit to Osborne House early in the ensuing week, for the purpose of inspecting the improvements and embellishments which have been some time in progress at the Royal marine villa. No precise period has yet been named for her Majesty's contemplated tour of visits.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty Queen Adelaide arrived on Monday at Witley Court, Worcestershire, from London. Her Majesty, on Wednesday, honoured Miss Peel, of Wareley, with a visit.

THE SOUTH EASTERN AND LEEDS AND THE MIDLAND RAILWAYS.—It is now positively stated that the negociations for a treaty of alliance between Mr. Hudson and the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company have been brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

THE ALLEGED PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—A writ of error has been allowed in the celebrated cause, Howard v. Gossett, Ex.

THE ADMIRALTY MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.—Dispatches have been received at the Admiralty from Commodore Fairfax Moresby, to the effect that the ships have had only one trial, which has been in a light wind, and that their relative positions are as follow:—Superb first, Canopus second, Rodney third, and Albion last.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF REAY AND REAY, WINE MERCHANTS.—In the last Bankruptcy Court, yesterday, the bankrupt, John Reay, came up to pass his last examination. The bankrupt carried on business on a most extensive scale as a wine-merchant, in Mark lane, City, and failed for a large amount, upwards of £200,000. The official assignee now reported to the Court that the bankrupt had given every possible information, and had rendered what he, the official assignee, considered the best accounts in his power, and did not consider that any advantage would be gained by any further adjournment. The solicitor to the trade assignee said that after the report of the official assignee he should not make any opposition to the bankrupt passing. The Learned Commissioner asked whether any creditor wished to oppose, and, no one answering, the bankrupt was declared to have passed.

THE LATE RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—At the CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, yesterday (Friday), Gurrell, who on the previous day had pleaded guilty, was arraigned on a fresh indictment, for stealing from the Great Western Railway. On being called to plead, guilty or not guilty, he answered—Guilty. He then said that he wished to withdraw the plea of not guilty, which he entered yesterday, and to plead guilty to all the indictments. The prisoner was then removed from the dock.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—On Tuesday, the Duke of Dalmatia presented to the King in Council at the Tuileries the Commissioners appointed for directing the erection of the monument to the memory of the late Duke of Orleans. The Marshal is the President, the General Baron Tupinier, Director of the Navy now in Paris; General Jacquemmot, Commandant of the National Guard of the Seine, with his staff; the general officers of the National Guards of Paris and the banlieue, the colonels and lieutenant-colonels of the different legions; the Prefect of the Seine; the Prefect of Police; all the general and superior officers in the War Office and the navy; and other military and civil functionaries, "assisted" on the occasion. An appropriate address was presented to his Majesty by the Duke of Dalmatia, along with the minutes of the inauguration of the statue; on receiving which, the King immediately delivered it to the Comte de Paris, saying, "My dear child, I cannot do better than give this to you. You will keep it as a precious testimony of the feeling of confidence and affection which the army entertained for your poor father." His Majesty then turned to Marshal Soult and made a most gracious reply to the address, in which he thanked the distinguished persons there present for the demonstrations of which they had surrounded the statue of his deceased son. In the course of the same day his Majesty, in the presence of his family and his Ministers, delivered to the Duke of Aumale the Insignia of the Grand Order of the Golden Fleece, conferred upon the Prince by the Queen of Spain. The Spanish Chargé d'Affaires was present on the occasion.

THE VACANT BANKRUPTCY COMMISSIONERSHIP.—It is rumoured in legal circles that Mr. Sergeant Manning is likely to succeed to the Commissionership in Bankruptcy, vacant by the lamented decease of Mr. Boteler, Q.C.

REMARKABLE CIRCUMSTANCE.—On Sunday afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Hill, incumbent of St. Barnabas, Dale-square, after preaching the Anniversary Sermon for the "St. Barnabas Sunday and Infant Schools" (containing nearly 1,000 children), baptized no less than 445 children and adults, introduced by the visitors of the District Visiting Society.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT PETWORTH.—A son of Mr. Death, aged between three and four years, was killed on Sunday morning last, by being thrown from a gig. Mr. Death had slighted for the purpose of opening a gate, when the horse started off in a trot, and Mr. Death, in trying to get on the step, missed his footing, and was thrown down by the wheel. The horse went off in a full gallop; and the poor little fellow was, about a quarter of a mile off, thrown on his head, the wheel also passing over it. Mr. Death, on coming up, raised him in his arms, in which he expired before he could get him to the nearest cottage. An inquest was held on the body on Monday, before J. L. Ellis, Esq., Coroner, when a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

LINCOLN'S INN NEW BUILDINGS.

Lawyers who were Members of Lincoln's Inn; all which arms have been removed from the windows of the Old Hall.

The West Oriel (which we have engraved) bears the arms of Charles II., James II., and Prince Rupert, who were all Members of Lincoln's Inn. Also, the arms of Ralph Neville, Bishop of Chichester; of Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, (from whom the Inn is named); of William de Haverhyil, (Treasurer to Henry III.); and of Edward Suiliard; both of whom were the former owners of the land on which the Inn is built. Under the above are the arms of the Society—Azure, fifteen fers de Molines or; on a Canton of the second, a lion rampant purpure.

In the Side Windows are emblazoned the arms of all the most distinguished Members of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, from the year 1450, down to the present time, chronologically arranged. This list also includes Chancellors, Masters of the Rolls, Vice-Chancellors, Judges, Chancellors of the Exchequer, and Speakers of the House of Commons, who have been Members of Lincoln's Inn; together with the names of James Duke of Monmouth; George Monk, Duke of Albemarle, Archbishop Usher, Archbishop Tillotson, the Earl of Mar, and other distinguished personages.

The arrangement of the Hall is upon the plan in the olden time, when "the lords of manours did eat in their great gothicque halls, at the high table, or oreille, the folk at the side tables." The tables and benches throughout are of oak, of design corresponding with the style of the Hall; as are the lamps suspended from the lofty roof; these, too, are richly gilt and emblazoned in the fashion of the period. The state chair prepared for Her Majesty on Thursday last, is covered with crimson velvet, and has affixed to it aback and canopy covered with crimson cloth; upon the former are emblazoned the Royal arms of the Tudor period, and the latter is richly embroidered with gold lace. We have engraved this sumptuous specimen of the upholsterer's art, in an adjoining column. High above the dais hangs Hogarth's mediocre picture of "Paul preaching before Felix." From the dais you pass by a noble doorway into the

THE LIBRARY.

THE VESTIBULE.

Here, the vaulted ceiling over the stairs has the fan-tracery to be observed in the cloisters of St. Stephen's, Westminster, in Henry VII.'s chapel, &c. The porch has a plain ribbed and vaulted ceiling, reminding one of the cloisters at New College, Oxford, in springing from the walls, without brackets or corbels to support the arches. But, the most interesting, piquant, and scenic bit is the centre of this Vestibule, forming an octagon, with open arches carried up as a clerestory, or spacious Lantern, with windows on its sides, partially filled with painted glass; the bosses, &c., on the roof, too, are superbly emblazoned. This reminds one of the Octagon between the nave and choir of Ely Cathedral. To the right of the Vestibule is the Council Room, c, in the plan; and the Drawing Room, d. Each of these rooms is 31 by 24 feet, exclusive of bay. The ceiling is of paneled deal, stained, and highly polished in admirable imitation of oak. We have engraved the chimney-piece of the Drawing Room. The paneling of oak, above which hang some finely-painted portraits of distinguished Members of the Inn. In the Council Room are, likewise, several paintings, and engraved portraits. The furniture is of the finest British oak; the carpets of fine Scotch manufacture, in excellent imitation of the Tournay fabric: the pattern, crimson mullions on a dark ground, relieved with a border of flowers and scroll-work. The curtains are of plain crimson cloth upon an oaken pole; extra drapery being quite out of keeping with the Tudor age.

Returning to the Vestibule, we pass to the door of next in importance to the Great Hall, both for its size and architectural character. It is 80 feet in length by 40 feet in width, and 48 feet high; and terminates at each end, (East and West) in a lofty, spacious, and deeply-recessed oriel, whose window forms three sides of an octagon; while the other two sides, or embrasure in the thickness of the walls, are richly adorned with shafts, panels, mouldings, &c. The same, or even an increased degree of decoration is bestowed upon the ceilings, which are framed in by an arch, forming the head of the general recess. The windows themselves are of unusually rich design for their kind, their heads being filled in with tracery; and (to say nothing of the painted glass and the emblazonments), the mode here adopted for the glazing generally is singularly tasteful and happy in effect. Instead of being of the usual lozenge form, the quarrels consist of small circles, or paterœ of moulded glass and their interstices, whe[illegible]y the appearance becomes that of delicate network; and, diapering also, the light is in some degree refracted, in consequence of the surface of the glass being embossed. Besides these two beautiful windows, there are three others on the north

Matthew Hale, and some thousands of volumes, principally on law and history, to which additions are continually made from the funds of the Society. Here, too, are preserved several volumes of MS. in Selden's handwriting, and a tolerably extensive collection on legal subjects bequeathed by Mr. Sergeant Maynard, Mr. Coxe, and Mr. S. Hill.

The Throne upon which Her Majesty received the Address from the Society was covered with crimson velvet; and the draperies were of of the Royal Members of the Society; of the noble founder of the Inn; of the original possessors of the site; and of the Society.

The constructive details present fine specimens [illegible] and metal work, with the nicest attention to [illegible] the building. To the Clerk of the Works, Mr [illegible] which the Architect's design has been realized, especial mention is due. In the metal-work this is especially traceable: the stoves and their appurtenances, door hinges, locks, handles, nay, even the key-escutcheons of the offices, being designed in keeping with the architecture.

The same attention has been paid to the design and execution of the cabinet-work and upholstery, by Mr. Caldecott, of Great Russell-street; it is traceable, from the superbly embroidered state chairs and draperies to the ordinary table; and the effect is harmoni[illegible] racteristic throughout.

Altogether, we rarely remember to have seen an edifice of our time, which has given such general satisfaction to the profession and to the public. It is, unquestionably, a most picturesque addition to our metropolitan architecture

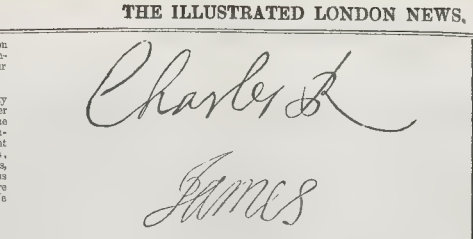
Among the treasured Memorials of the Society is "the AdmissionBook," in which each Member subscribes his name on being admitted into the Society. It contains the signatures of all Members from the reign of Elizabeth to the present time. In the year 1671, on the 29th of February, Charles II., accompanied by his brother James, and Prince Rupert, and attended by a numerous suite, became Members of the Society, and were right sumptuously entertained in the Hall. We have copied the three Royal signatures.



OPENING OF THE HALL AND LIBRARY BY HER MAJESTY.

On Thursday, Her Majesty, accompanied by His Royal Highness Prince Albert, opened the new Buildings.

The Judges, Lord Campbell, and most of the Benchers arrived shortly after 11 o'clock.

The battalion of the Coldstream Guards arrived before 12 o'clock, preceded by their splendid band, and took their station in front of the Hall. Shortly after this hour the carriages of most of the Cabinet Ministers, and of those who had received tickets of admission, began to arrive in rapid succession

The crowd was very great in Lincoln's Inn Fields, Great Queen street, and Long acre, and along the line of road which the Royal cortège passed from Buckingham Palace.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the lords and ladies of the household, arrived at Lincoln's Inn, in four of the Royal carriages, shortly before half past one o'clock. The Queen and her illustrious Consort were loudly cheered by the assembled thousands of her loyal subjects. Her Majesty looked remarkably well, and frequently bowed as the Royal carriage passed slowly to the Hall.

Her Majesty was escorted by a detachment of the 1st Regiment of Horse Guards. The regulations of police were excellent, and deserve the highest praise. No confusion whatever occurred.

On her Majesty's arrival, the bands of the Coldstream Guards and the Horse Guards played the National Anthem, which was responded to by loud huzzas from thousands of voices.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, on alighting at the Iron gate, were received by the Treasurer, the Sub-Treasurer, the Benchers, and the Chief Officers of the building, who attended the Queen through the centre avenue of the Hall. The scene on Her Majesty's entrance, was very impressive; the whole of the company in the body of the Hall (Barristers in their forensic costume), and the ladies in the gallery, rising to receive the Royal visitors. The applause was most enthusiastic, as her Majesty passed up the Hall, through the central doorway by the Vestibule to the Council Room, or returing room. The Treasurer, the Visitors, and Benchers remained in the West Drawing Room until her Majesty left her retiring room. The Treasurer then conducted her Majesty and Prince Albert to the Library, accompanied by the Visitors and Benchers

The Queen being seated on the Chair of State with his Royal Highness Prince Albert on her left hand, the Treasurer, accompanied by the Benchers and the Deputation of Barristers and Students, then approached the Chair, and read the Address from the Society, and the Treasurer presented the same to her Majesty on his knee.

The Benchers, and the Deputation of the Barristers and Students, and the Architect then passed before the Queen, the name of each being announced by the Treasurer.

The ancient book recording the names of the illustrious visitors to the Inn was presented to her Majesty, who inscribed her name therein.

The Queen was pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood upon the Treasurer, John Augustus Simpkinson, Esq., Q.C.

After the ceremony in the Library, the Treasurer again conducted the Queen through the Vestibule to the centre of the hall at the north end of the Hall, and placed her Majesty under the Canopy of State, with Prince Albert on her right hand, and, at her Majesty's bidding, the Treasurer took his seat on her left. All the visitors and Benchers took their respective places.

The Band, arranged at the back of the screen, under the Gallery, played the National Anthem on the entrance of the Queen into the Hall. Grace was then said

At the grand banquet covers were laid for 500 guests; the head table was furnished by Mr. Gunter for 80; the other tables for 420 were supplied by the regular cook to the Society. The following is the Bill of Fare for the Royal table —

After the Second Grace, the Treasurer, by permission of the Queen, gave "The Health of her Majesty." Then followed "His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the newly-elected Bencher;" "The Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family."

Prince Albert then gave "The Health of the Ancient and Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn."

The Queen then retired from the Hall, the Treasurer conducting her Majesty to the West Drawing-room, followed by the Visitors and Benchers.

The Royal carriages were then announced, and the Treasurer conducted the Queen and Prince Albert again through the Central Avenue of the Hall to the Porch, and from thence to the Iron Gate; the Visitors and Benchers following

Meanwhile the Barristers and Students remained in the Hall; and "the Health of the Ladies in the Gallery" was proposed by Mr. Forster, and most enthusiastically responded to.

After the departure of Her Majesty, the Benchers returned to the Hall; and Lord Campbell proposed the health of the Treasurer, whom he announced to have received the honour of Knighthood. The Ladies then descended from the Gallery, and passed up the Hall; and shortly after, the Company broke up.

Among the more distinguished guests were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Cottenham, Lord Campbell, the Vice Chancellors, the Speaker of the House of Commons, &c. &c.

Her Majesty wore a white lace dress; a superbly embroidered shawl; and a light blue bonnet and feather. Prince Albert wore during the repast, and on his leaving the Hall, a Field Marshal's uniform, and over it his Bencher's gown.

On Her Majesty quitting the Hall, a Barrister threw his gown in the royal path, and another learned gentleman threw a white handkerchief; the Queen paused for a moment, then smiled, and passed over the impromptu carpetting.

MUSIC.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The Second Concert, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Horsley, a promising composer and pianist, was better organised than the opening one. Out of ten pieces in the programme, eight were native compositions—the two exceptions being Beethoven's "Trio in D," No. 1, Op. 70, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, executed by Miss Binfield Williams, Mr. Thirlwall, and Mr. W. L. Phillips; and "Quintet in E flat," No. 1, Op. 4, for Two Violins, Two Tenors, and Violoncello, played by Messrs. J. Banister, Newsham, Hill, Weiske, and W. L. Phillips, of the same glorious composer. The other instrumental works were, a "MS. Quartet in G Minor," by Mr. H. Graves, a violinist and member of the Committee; and Sterndale Bennett's charming "Chamber Trio," for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, performed by Messrs. W. Rea, Thirlwall, and W. L. Phillips. Mr. Graves' "Quartet" is far too Violin, Tenor, and Violoncello, and is fashioned after the forms of Haydn—a short scherzo being, perhaps, the most striking movement. It is a creditable production as regards the mechanical laws of harmony, but is destitute of melodious invention The gem of the evening, after Beethoven, was Bennett's elegant trio. The opening movement, and the serenade, are replete with phases of passion, and delicate shades of sentiment, whilst the finale is full of fire and character, beautifully proportioned, and everywhere worked with sparkling effects. It was well played, although we missed the sensitiveness of expression so peculiar to the composer's own touch.

The vocal selection comprised two songs by Miss Lyon, "Ye Spotted Snakes;" the veteran Horsley's "See the Chariot at Hand;" a prettyish canzonet, "When I dream that you Love me," sung by Mr. Wrighton; a clever song by Mr. Macfarren, "The Way to woo Love;" and six glees and madrigals, which concluded the entertainment. Mr. Bennett, Mr. Bennett, "Talk of him that's far away," and "Gentle Zephyr." The two latter were more remarkable for their Schubertish accompaniments, than for original melody.

The next Concert will be on Tuesday week. Some means should be adopted for better ventilating the rooms—the heat being insupportable.

THE AMPHONIC SOCIETY.

We are glad to find that Choral Societies are on the increase in London, as they tend to advance the knowledge of music, and to improve the [illegible] of masters. The first performance of the "Amphionics," which [illegible] did to emulate the example of the "Melophonics," the "Harmonic Union," &c., &c., [illegible] metropolis at Blagrove's Concert Rooms, in Mortimer street, [illegible] Messrs. and Mr. Jacob Mauser, their conductor. The choral selections were from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Winter, and Rossini, relieved by some solo and glees.

MUSIC IN GERMANY AND ITALY.

We have received the following letter from a Correspondent, who is making a musical [illegible]—

In the capital, as in other great cities, there are separate publics for different kinds of music—the aristocracy for the Italians, the connoscenta (and these are numerous) for the Philharmonic Concerts, and the masses for popular Operas, and all for Waltz [illegible]. Balfe is the favourite musical deity with the population at [illegible] Strauss and Lanner are given; and by the military and dance bands, Balfe's melodies are everywhere the reign. The return of Standigl to Vienna, from singing at the English Musical Festivals, was the occasion of a Serenade being given at the Leopoldstadt new summer garden, which consisted of a [illegible] band, and the orchestra and chorus of the Porn Theatre. Until late [illegible] years, Standigl had, after to passed through all the phases of his professional life, from chorus singer, until he obtained permanent engagement, as first bass, at £300 per ann um at the Körthenen Theatre, for nine months' season of German operas, the theatre open every night. The Management, however, refusing to augment the sum in renewing the engagement, induced Standigl to go to a suburban theatre, now considered the second in lyrical rank in Vienna, although by far the largest, called the Vien Theatre, at which place his pay is more than double, perhaps treble, what was offered by the manager of the first theatre fly some persons, it is thought that the Vien manager will be unable to make money by such an expensive engagement, but the few nights he has already sung, in Balfe's popular opera, "Rahmenschinder" (the Four Sons of Aymon), and in "Norma," have been crowded, and a prosperous season is expected. Thalberg is here, and announced a Concert to be given on Sunday, the 26th inst. Berlioz, the great French composer, who married Miss Smithson, the English actress, is coming; as also David—the Ode Desert Symphony David. Liszt will be here in January. Parish Alvars, our countryman, the harpist, is to give a Concert next month, with a new harp concerto, and new Pianoforte Concerto, the latter to be played by a first-rate artist—Pirkhet, whose talent, two seasons since, was lost to the public, amidst the phalanx of that remarkable season in London. Mendelssohn is not expected here at present to find. I am promised to hear several new works, but I will not concede Mendelssohn for anything Ella, of her Majesty's Theatre, and Director of the "Musical Union," is also here; the press has taken up the objects of that "Union" in most flattering terms. Chelard, the composer; Pixis, the great pianist, Czerny, and other celebrated musicians, have become honorary members of the "Musical Union." Czerny—whom the London rumours killed by "report last summer"—is well and as industrious as ever, having already published Op. 800, and hopes, he says, to complete his 1000! This amiable artist is the founder of the modern Executive School, and he numbers amongst his pupils the most brilliant pianists of the age—Liszt, Thalberg, &c., and a host of well-known names. Moscheles, notwithstanding his glowing letter to the "Musical World," failed completely here last season. Strodtz, in his last edition of Beethoven's life, handles Moscheles severely for the hodge-podge the latter made of that work. Schindler denies that Moscheles is quite ignorant of the "traditions" of Beethoven, the latter having studied my manuscripts with him. Madame Albertazzi, the vocalist, is here, and intends giving a concert. The Sisters Milanollo, the violinists, will [illegible] Vienna, from whence, in twenty-two concerts, they took away about 1,000 two pound notes. Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" will be performed by a thousand persons on the 13th of next month. Genius in dramatic composition [illegible] a premium, and an effective opera, the managers are only too content to accept, in the absence of creative talent."

The Athenæum publishes an interesting correspondence from Italy, relative to the state of music in that country during the "fat season." As regards the church compositions, the writer declares that he had encountered "much sound and not flashy, but frivolity; nothing, however, which the most Catholic lover of art could admit as meriting the name. The corruption of taste seemed to have reached its lowest depth at Venice, Padua, in Florence, and Genoa, "the clanking was detestable perpetually below pitch and coarsely enunciated." In the theatres, the corn spondent, as no first rate companies were playing, was doomed to listen to the pitiless hacking and picking he gives of them. Of "Don Procopio," written by Signor Florvanni (no younger, he says:—"Duller and meaner music it was never yet my lot to hear; nor a less finished and more vulgar representation to see." The amount of freshness of ideas which the work combined, may be judged from the fact, that the buffo baritone sang from Balfe's "Sons of Rochelle," which was introduced, sounded absolutely a marvel of novelty. Soprano, tenore, baritone, and bass bawled lustily. At Florence, he saw Coccia's "Clotilde," which was "tame and imitative." Signora Valtoria, the prima donna, had a young extensive voice, with a fair notion of singing, and Signor Frizzi was a clever buffo actor.

At Genoa the writer saw an "insipid" performance of Donizetti's "Don [illegible]. Though the singers were painstaking the orchestra was slovenly [illegible] artlessness of accent." The Genoese journals were loud in praise of La Sentini, the prima donna. He did not hear her; but [illegible] who can believe in an Italian journal? The peculiar tact of an which its poets are marketable is better known to many of the singers than the scala exercise." La Nina Barroni is vaunted as having the finest voice in Italy: and La Parodi is recommended to managers on the strength of Madame Pasta having appeared with her at her [illegible] nor music in request was Signor Unanue. "I have heard," he [illegible] ass nor baritone talked about: those I have myself listened to [illegible] above mediocrity. They shout one and all, and the audiences roar applause. Verdi's star was in the ascendant as a composer." There is no stirring [illegible] originality. Nabucco, or "I Due Foscari." [illegible] who has yet appeared. He has picturesque feeling for instrumentation, and a certain share of fresh melody. Of English singers in Italy we find the annexed mention:—

"The young Irish lady, Miss Hayes, whose success at Marseilles I believe genuine, on reliable musical authority, has been captured for two years by Signor Merelli, the great Milan manager. This long engagement is a pretty sure speculation for one who farms so many theatres; since what will not please at La Scala may be good enough for Como, or Varese, or Udine, or even Bellinzo, which have their little operas and their little furore; but the task-work it entails on the victim has ruined fifty good voices where it has made one great singer. I was glad to receive, not on newspaper authority, very satisfactory tidings of the progress of Miss Bassano, both as a singer and an actress. She seems to have, sensibly, confined herself to the smaller theatres; the result of which, my informant said, is, that her voice has ripened without being strained, while he described her acting as lively and intelligent. Mr. Travers, too, was making a creditable 'stand' at Lucca."

The enthusiasm of audiences at the Milan Scala has been often alluded to, but here is the reverse of the medal—a scene too disgraceful to be printed.

"I have lastly to mention the first representation, at La Scala, of "Saul," a new opera, by a new maestro, Signor Canneti. The subject seems a favourite one :—another work on the story, by Mercadante, was to open the season at Trieste—and for those who have no objection to see the King and the Psalmist of Israel trotting behind the foot-lights in gold lama and geranium cachemire it is effective. If I might judge, too, the young maestro has worked: since, though his motivo be "older than age," and the style of his opera comic rather than grave, there is some attempt at neatness and variety of construction in it. But judgment was not easy. This same first night was a disgusting exhibition. A party in the house, which had resolved that the opera should not succeed, began its disapprobations before the overture had commenced, and continued every manifestation of hollowness and contempt during its progress. This, though sufficiently wounding, might have been borne, since every one knows that the Italians go to the theatre to talk, and are, therefore, as an audience, singularly difficult to please. But the brutality of some of the young men to the unfortunate prima donna, who seemed to be the object of a separate antipathy, was more offensive than anything I have ever witnessed. It was a young girl whom they selected as the victim of their unmanly ill-nature. She was assuredly inefficient to fill the place of the Pastas and Malibrans who have sung at La Scala, but thoroughly perfect in her part: with a clear easy voice, and neither flash, absurdity, nor immodesty as a sanatrice or an actress to be complained of. What rendered the outrage more strange among such undisguised sensualists as the Milanese opera-goers, her appearance was pleasing. No matter: she had to abide being hooted, shouted, hissed, ironically cheered for a good half hour ere the better-natured souls among the audience could get a hearing and put the nuisance down. I had been told much of the treatment to which a woman may be subjected among these dowdies of the second tier of what has been fancied a humanizing art: had I not, however, heard the soprano's first scene in "Saul," I could not have conceived that men could be so debased."

We have received letters from Copenhagen, dated 31st instant, written by the celebrated Jenny Lind. She had been singing with her customary triumphs at the Danish capital, and was about to leave for Stockholm. Her return to Berlin was fixed for the month of November, when she would remain until May, and then visit England. Her professional duties left her little time to acquire the English language. When she appears, therefore, at Drury Lane Theatre in the course of the season, the probability is that she will sing in German. It is quite true that she has been offered carte blanche at her Majesty's Theatre by Mr. Lumley; but it is certain that she has refused every offer. The celebrated Lutzer, who is now living retired at Vienna, will perhaps visit London during the next season, but not professionally

Our Paris letters announce the arrival of Liszt in that capital, as also of Balfe, who had returned from London, to superintend the production of his opera, to be produced at the Académie Royale. He writes nothing this season for Drury Lane Theatre. The lessee relies on the success of Mr. Wallace's opera, "Don Cæsar de Basan," with Harrison, Borrani, Bodda, Bonner, &c. It will be produced the end of this month. Mr. Benedict's opera will be next in rotation, the libretto by M. St. Georges, with Mr. Bunn's translation. The whole strength of the establishment will be called into play, as there are parts for two prime donne, two tenors, and three bassi. It is doubtful whether Mdlle. Nau can appear at the Princess' Theatre this season, Mr. Maddox having been unable to find, as yet, a tenor, and as Mr. Stretton, the Basso, is about to leave for Italy, Mr. Le Hier will be the only available singer in the market.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

A very agreeable adaptation of a French operetta—the plot of which we remember to have seen given in the "Dramatic Record" of the Morning Post some few months back—was produced at this house on Tuesday evening, under the title of "Who's the Composer?" The construction of this little two-act piece is very ingenious, and every situation fully deserved the laughter and applause with which it was greeted. A young Italian, Filippo (Mr. Hudson), has composed a serenade, in honour of a certain Duchess in an Italian State, whom he thinks he has preserved from a fatal accident by stopping the horses which had run away with her. He is encouraged in this opinion by being mysteriously supplied with money, and invited to a birthday fête about to be given at the Palace. His friend Count Pesco (Mr. Holl) is in love with one of the Court ladies, Dorothea de Pompoli (Miss Reynolds), and wishing to serenade her, engages Filippo to write one as coming from the Count. Filippo gives him the one he had already composed for the Duchess. Meanwhile the Marquis de Pompoli (Mr. Rogers), who is also in love with the lady whose is Signor Caffarini (Mr. Brookstone) for another serenade; and Caffarini, in the absence of Filippo, obtains a copy of the one already composed. On this circumstance the whole of the equivoque is based. Filippo finding the serenade of the old Marquis in the Duchess's work-box, orders the Composer of it to be arrested. Filippo has promised the Count Pesco to give him the credit of it, under all circumstances, and the Count is accordingly arrested. Filippo is terribly horrified at his supposed heartlessness. To save his friend, Filippo avows himself as the composer; but hearing a conversation between the Marquis and Caffarini, in which the latter is alluded to, Filippo gives a hint to the musicians to perform the serenade, which leads to a fresh dilemma with the Duchess's old admirer. At last, it is discovered, after all, that Carina (Miss Julia Bennett), is the lady whom Filippo wishes to wed, that she is in love with him; and that she has been supplying him with money, and also sent him the ticket for the ball. This brings about the eclaircissement, and the piece winds up to the satisfaction of everybody.

The incident of working out a plot by a pretty melody was novel and graceful, and the comedetta was admirably played. Mr. Hudson acted with remarkable ease and vivacity, and sang a very catching serenade—the air of the piece—composed by Mr. Reed, in such excellent style as to be loudly encored. Miss Julia Bennett and Miss Fortescue made all that was possible of their characters; and Mr. Brookstone—in the first night's performance made up as the professor of music, and, in the second, revelling at the fancy ball as Mephistopheles, in red tights and a large nose—was immensely droll.

The whole piece went off with much unaffected applause, and at the conclusion was announced by Mr. Hudson for performance every night until further notice. The adaptation is the work of Mr. Maddison Morton.

PRINCESS'.

The long-promised ballet of "Le Diable à Quatre" was produced here on Thursday evening, with a success, we imagine, fully equal to that which it has had so well at Paris. It was preceded by "Much Ado About Nothing" a name very little appropriate to the managerial disputes that have taken place with regard to the music, which, after all, is of an ordinary character enough. But this by the way. Having lately given the plot of the Adelphi version, it is unnecessary for us to repeat it, as in both instances the Parisian libretto has been closely followed. Finally taken, as our readers may remember, from the English piece of "The Devil to Pay," the only alteration for that phrase being "Le Diable à Quatre!" The part of the Count was sustained by Mons. Adrien; that of his termagant Countess by Miss Ballin. Mazzarin, the basket-maker, by Mr. Allen; and Mons. Wieland, Mazarin, by Mademoiselle Melanie Duvals, a young lady, who danced here, if we are not mistaken, when the theatre first opened, and the two lovers Pepa and Felex were represented by Mr. and Miss Marshall. We can but re-echo the sentiments of high commendation passed upon the most amusing in the piece. The acting of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert was perfect; and the "Polka à Cinq de Satan," drew down loud applause, and would have been encored, but for the orders of the Master of the Ceremonies. In the Bohemian Oratory, the Mazurka introduced a very striking Polka, which was received with equal favour; indeed, such showers of bouquets were thrown to everybody, that Count Gordon Markus must have been well paid for his night's attendance. M. Adrien had to perform a grand pas de deux with Mdlle. Duval. He is not very active, and his dancing lacks spirituality. He was, however, greeted with a very fair share of applause. On a conclusion of the performance (which, of course or less) brought down the curtain amidst a storm of applause.

The ballet has been very carefully got up, under the superintendence of Mr. Lee, and materially by the aid of Mr. Gilbert. The transportation of the two female swans one of the most graceful pieces of mechanism we ever witnessed: and he last scene is painted in Mr. Beverley's best style. Altogether the "Diable à Quatre" has made a hit, and will run for a long time.

At the conclusion, Mr. Walton announced as for representation three times a week until further notice; and the principal dancers were loudly called before the curtain, to receive the congratulations of a most crowded house. And in good truth they deserved all the applause with which they were greeted.

The season of the FRENCH PLAYS will commence on Monday evening, and be continued until the Spring. An attractive programme of the arrangements and engagements has been put forward by Mr. Mitchell. The following names will appear in the order mentioned:—M. Lafon, Lemaître, M. Lacrate, M. [illegible], M. [illegible], Mdlle. Page[illegible], Mdlle. Fitzjames, Mdlle. Person, and Mdlle. Rose Chéri. The list also contains the names of MM. Carigny, Rozevel, Lemadre, Mlles. Dorsay, Fleuri, &c. &c. The opening piece with which our dramatists have [illegible] "Les Ilotes," of the Island," the Mysterious Passengers," "Le Roy [illegible]," "Les Chasseurs," &c. &c., will be presented; and the general arrangements [illegible] for a rousing campaign.

On looking in at the different Theatres during the past week, we have been glad to see that all, apparently, are prospering well. The ADELPHI has been literally crammed: the HAYMARKET and PRINCESS' with very little room to spare; and the LYCEUM progressing, at a remunerating pace, to the close of the season, which is fixed for the 14th inst.; when there will be a relache until Boxing night." We hope, before then, some means will be taken to remedy the [illegible] from the box-entrance less objectionable. SADLER'S WELLS has not in any way suffered from the counter legitimate attractions of Messrs. Macready and Anderson. and the good houses prove satisfactorily that the change effected the tastes of the play-going inhabitants of the Northern districts of London, was not a mere temporary fashion. The exceeding care with which every production is placed upon the stage, reflects the highest credit on the management.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

DIRECT LONDON AND MANCHESTER.—On Saturday the arrangement for union and amalgamation of the London and Manchester lines was signed by Mr. John Dillon, the Chairman of the Direct London and Manchester, and Colonel Leicester Stanhope, the Chairman of the Direct (independent line The agreement provides that the two Companies shall be united when cost when the Bill shall have passed. That the Direct London and Manchester shall alone apply to Parliament for the Act. That the two Companies shall have an equal number of Directors. That the Chairman of the Direct Company, Mr. Dillon, shall be the Chairman of the twenty four Directors, and that Mr. Andrew Caldecott, and the Hon. Colonel Leicester Stanhope, shall be the Deputy Chairmen. That the object of the agreement, on the part of the parties to it, shall be the making a Direct Line from London to Manchester as economically as possible, to carry goods and passengers at the cheapest remunerative rate, at the greatest possible expedition consistently with safety; and that the interests of the trade between London and Manchester, and the promises made to the public by each Company, shall be the guiding prin ciples of the Directors. That Messrs. Ashurst and Son, Messrs. Sudlow, Sons, and Torr; and Mr. John Owens, shall be the Solicitors. That Mr Rastrick and Mr. George Remington shall be the joint engineers.

SOUTH AND MIDLAND JUNCTION.—All the deposits have been paid up, and placed in the bankers' hands, from whence they will be removed to be invested in Government securities.

LONDON AND EDINBURGH.—And the mass of immense projects we have been struck with one bearing the above title; and which, upon a more close examination, whether we regard the simplicity and vastness of the project itself, or its importance in a national point of view, is of such a nature as to excite considerable surprise, and no small degree of attention. Direct Railway communication between important place forms a new and prominent feature of the present Railway excitement. On glancing at the English projects, we find that those for which the heaviest outlay will be required, are for direct lines between the metropolis and important cities with which there is already Railway communication. Such being the case, it is not surprising that a proposal for a direct London and Edinburgh line should be brought forward. With two good substantial lines between Edinburgh and London, the public will speedily become sensible of the importance of the new system of transit; and while we augur for them that success which concerns of such an important nature are sure (in connection with lines from other quarters) to call forth, we feel confident that they will only be the means of creating a demand, if not a necessity, for others of at least equal importance, which will, in their turn, form part of, and help to bring into operation, other sections of that vast network of iron communication which will at no distant period cover the face of the island.—Edinburgh Weekly Register.

SALE OF THE SURREY CANAL FOR A RAILWAY.—The Grand Surrey Canal has been purchased by a Railway Company for £250,000. It is not the intention of the purchasers to fill up the canal, but to form a Railway on its banks in connection with the North Eastern, South Western, and Richmond lines. A meeting was held at the Company's offices in White Lioncourt, Cornhill, of the Proprietors, on Tuesday morning, and, after some discussion, the purchase was accepted.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE RAILWAYS.—We hear that it is the intention of the Cabinet to consider the Railway question generally, and the proper mode of dealing with it in Parliament, at one of their earliest meetings. Most people will say that they are not only right in their determination, but that they ought to have done it long ago Chronicle

SETTLING DAYS.—Some further share settlements have been announced by the Committee of the Stock Exchange to have been fixed for November 5. They are the scrip of the following Companies:—Wisbech and St. Ives; Ipswich, Norwich, and Yarmouth; Dalkeith; Ulverstone, Furness, Lancaster, and Carlisle; London and Birmingham new (20), shares; Barbadoes; Exeter, Dorchester, and Weymouth, Dartmouth, Torbay, and Exeter; Taw Vale Extension, Worcester, Hereford, Ross, and Gloucester. The Great Western of Canada was formerly announced. The settlement for the scrip of the South Union, Manchester, and Potteries Company is fixed for November 7.

WATERLOO-BRIDGE TERMINI. The arrangements which have been on the tapis between the directors of the Great Western and South Western companies and the directors of Waterloo bridge, for the conversion of the bridge into a railway bridge, to unite these lines, are understood to be finally arranged. The structure will remain untouched, and the transit, both for coal passengers and cattle, and carriages, will remain in its present state. The proposed line is to run alongside of the bridge. On the south side of the bridge, the abutments can be widened several feet; this foundation the directors have agreed to lease to the Railway Company for a period of years at a yearly rental, subjected to a variety of provisos. The outlet on the Surrey side is to be between the Shot Factory and the rear of the line of houses known as Tulotson's-pl ce.

EASTERN COUNTIES MEETING.—A special meeting of this Company was held on Thursday at the London Tavern. At one o'clock Mr. Hudson, as company's Director, entered the room, and was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause. The Secretary read a string of resolutions, to the effect that the Directors be authorised to proceed, in the next session of Parliament, with an extension of the Eastern Counties line to Cambridge, also one from Farringdon-street to Tottenham, and such other branches as may be deemed necessary, and that the additional capital for such extensions and improvements, £1,500,000, and that the same be called the Eastern Counties Extension. Mr. Hudson then stated the manner in which he proposed to divide the shares. They were to be divided between the Eastern Counties, the Norfolk and Lincoln, the York and North Midland, the London and York, and other Companies; and he hoped he would be able, by such decision, to induce the London and York Directors—or, at any rate, the London and York shareholders—to withdraw their fierce opposition, and become partners in the new line, with the existing companies. His proposition was received with acclamation.

RAILWAY PROSPECTS.—We have the best grounds for believing that an intimation has been made in the quarter in the City most deeply interested in monetary matters, that the Government have determined upon authorising the Account General to receive, in satisfaction of Money deposits, Exchequer bill warrants and Exchequer bills at the price of the day. So that, in fact, it will be only necessary to hand over to the Accountant General the securities of the Companies allotted to the bankers. The convenience and importance of such an arrangement is obvious.—Chronicle.

MR. HUDSON AND CHIEF JUSTICE DOHERTY.—Two rather remarkable customers came to London the other day in the same carriage, namely, Chief Justice Doherty, of the Irish bench, and Mr. Hudson, the "Railway King." Either by luck or design, they had the carriage entirely to themselves; both parties were unknown to each other, but freely discussed the topics of the day, especially the all engrossing one respecting Railways. The Irish Chief Justice more than once referred to Mr. Hudson as a lucky fellow. Arguably the opinions of the learned judge were not of a more free description. Mr. Hudson's incognito was kept up until the parties arrived at the terminus, when they became known to each other. An explosion of laughter was the necessary consequence.

NEW RAILWAYS.

The following are among the newest Railway projects:—

OXFORD AND SEVERN.—A line, thirty four miles in length, between the above terminus, intended to complete a direct communication between the whole of South Wales, Hereford, Gloucester, Cheltenham, Witney, and Oxford. Capital, £650,000, in £20 shares. Mr. John Galloway is the engineer

MANCHESTER, HEBDEN, AND KEIGHLEY JUNCTION.—A line commencing virtually at Manchester, but actually at a junction with the Leeds and Manchester, at Rebden bridge, and proceeding thence up the valley of that name, towards the north-east, and, by a tunnel through Cock-hill, into the Haworth valley, and thence to Keighley, joining there the Leeds and Bradford Extension, with a branch to Oakworth, to the above institution, near Keighley. Capital, £350,000, in 17,500 shares. Mr. Hawkshaw is the consulting engineer

RUGBY, SWINDON, AND WEYMOUTH DIRECT JUNCTION.—A line, intended to commence at Rugby, traversing the line of the Rugby and Oxford Railway as far as Banbury, thence proceeding along the line of the projected East and West of England Railway to Chipping Norton, to the contemplated junction of the proposed Cheltenham and Oxford Railway with Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton line, thence taking a southerly course through or near Burford, Lechlade, and Heyworth, to unite with the Great Western at Swindon; from along that line to Chippenham, Trowbridge, by means of a branch to Troubridge, it will unite with the Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth Railway. The capital is £700,000, in 35,000 shares of £20 each.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN DIRECT AND SHORT.—"The Parliamentary announcement" we gather that this scheme proposes principally to make use of the common roads, the railway being screened from the sight of the passes. The amount of capital is not named, but the shares are to be £20 each.

BRIDGNORTH, MADE ... SHIFNALL AND LIVERPOOL DIRECT.—Capital ... 300,000, in £20 shares ... V. S. Clegg is the engineer-in-chief, and Mr. Sidebottom and Ebbles acting engineer

CARNWAIT AND WEST LINDON.—A line intended to form a junction between the Caledonian, Caledonian Extension, and North British Railways. The capital is £150,000, in £20 shares. Mr. Leslie of Dundee is engineer.

GLASGOW HARBOUR MINERAL.—A line from the Clyde to the various railways having termini in Glasgow. Capital £150,000, in £20 shares.

STRATHEAY AND BREADALBANE EXTENSION.—A line eight miles in length, from the Inverness and Perth Railway to Aberfeldy. The capital is £120,000, in £25 share

BERWICKSHIRE CENTRAL JUNCTION.—A line from the Edinburgh and Hawick Railway to Kelso, to join the Caledonian Extension and Newcastle and Berwick The capital is £240,000, in £25 shares. Messrs R. Stevenson and Son are the engineers.

NEWCASTLE UPON TYNE, EDINBURGH, AND DIRECT GLASGOW JUNCTION —This is a fusion of the North Tyne and Newcastle-upon Tyne, Hawick, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Junction schemes. A new prospectus is about to appear

DONCASTER, WAKEFIELD, AND BRADFORD. A line intended to commence at Doncaster, by a junction with some of the projected Lines from London to York and Leeds, and with the proposed Manchester, Huddersfield, and Great Grimsby Direct, and Hull, Sheffield, and North Midland Railways. It will then proceed in a direct line to Oakershaw, near Wakefield, where it will be connected with the Midland Railway, the Wakefield, Pontefract, and Goole, and the extension of the Leeds and Dewsbury, and Wakefield and Bradford Railways. The length of the line is fifteen miles Capital £350 000, in 15,000 shares of £20 each Engineer, Mr. Billington

NEW LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM. vid NORTHAMPTON AND WARWICK —A line intended to commence at "a convenient point in the northern part of the Metropolis," and proceed by way of St. Albans, Redburn, Dunstable, Woburn, Newport Pagnell to Northampton, where it will join the London and Birmingham Extension Railway, and proceed by Daventry, Leamington, and Warwick, and by the Railway intended to be made along the line of the Warwick, Leamington, and Gode, and the extension of the Leeds and Dewsbury, and Wakefield and Bradford Railways. The length of the line is fifteen miles Capital £1,400,000 in 70,000 shares

HUDDERSFIELD AND LIVERPOOL DIRECT.

THE LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM. vid NORTHAMPTON AND WARWICK —A line intended to commence at "a convenient point in the northern part of the Metropolis," and proceed by way of St. Albans, Redburn, Dunstable, Woburn, Newport Pagnell to Northampton, where it will join the London and Birmingham Extension Railway, and proceed by Daventry, Leamington, and Warwick, and by the Railway intended to be made along the line of the Warwick, Leamington, and Gode, and the extension of the Leeds and Dewsbury, and Wakefield and Bradford Railways. FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

GIGANTIC RAILWAY IN RUSSIA.—A letter from St. Petersburgh states that the Government is actively occupied with a project of making a Railway from that city to Odessa, and, if it be possible, that project will be carried into effect. The construction of this Railway would be of immense importance, not only to Russia, but for the whole of Europe and Asia, for it would join the Baltic and Black Seas; and doubtless it would not be long before branches were made to the Caspian Sea, and to Ispahan, in Persia. It is even probable that, ultimately, it will be extended as far as the East Indies, and perhaps even to China. The Railway from St. Petersburgh to Odessa would be 770 French leagues in length, and would consequently be the longest in a straight line which has ever been conceived. It would traverse three zones of different temperature, and by means of the Railway the whole of the distance might be accomplished at the most in seventy hours By such a Railway, a traveller quitting St. Petersburgh in the depth of winter, would find himself transported in a remarkably short space of time into a country of intense heat.

TOURS AND NANTES. The length of this line is 195 kilometres. The cost of the line, including works and rails, is valued at 36,344,000 francs (£1,454,760). The annual produce, deducting 45 per cent. for working expenses, is estimated at 12,770 francs per kilometre, making a total of 2,489,150 francs (£99,566). The maximum duration of the concession is fixed at 35 years after the time fixed for the completion of the works by the company. The amount to be deposited by the company is to be 3,000,000f. (£120,000).

CREIL AND ST. QUENTIN.—The length of this branch is 98 kilometres, the expense 30,000,000f. (£1,200,000), and the nett revenue 1,950,200f. The maximum duration of the concession is fixed at 75 years, and the amount of deposit required 3,000,000f. (£120,000)

PARIS AND LYONS. The length of this Railway is nearly 510 kilometres, the cost of construction is estimated at 350,000f. per kilometre, and the total sum at 200,000,000f. (£8,000,000). The nett annual produce is estimated at 14,000,000f. (£560,000), after deducting 45 per cent. for the working expenses. The maximum duration of the concession is fixed at 45 years, commencing from the five years allowed for the completion of the works. Deposit to be 24,000,000f (£960,000) Of this sum 8,000,000f. are reserved for the section between Dijon and Chalons, in course of construction by the state, the expenses of which will be paid by the company

LYONS AND AVIGNON, WITH A BRANCH TO GRENOBLE.—The length of the main line is 225 kilometres, and of the branch 95 kilometres; total, 320 kilometres. The expense of construction is estimated at 212,233f (£8,491 per kilometre; total cost of the whole, including interest on calls, 110,000,000 francs (£4,400,000). The nett income from the main line is valued at 5,995,000f. (£239,828), after deducting forty-five per cent. for the working expenses, and for the branch 650,000f., making a total of 6,645,000f. (£265,828) profit per annum for the shareholders. The concession for the main line will not exceed fifty years, allowing the company four years before that term commences for the completion of the works. The deposit to be 10,000,000 francs (£400,000).

PARIS TO STRASBURG. It may not be uninteresting just at the moment the day for the adjudication of this line is announced, to state what are the names and the engineering services of the eight lines of railway which intersect the line and branch to Rheims: including the rails and the materials for the permanent way, the cost to the company will be 21,345,000 francs. In addition to which, the expenses of the branches to Metz and Sarrebruck together, 921 kils. in length, 49,766,000 francs: total cost of line and branches valued at 124,113,000 francs (£4,964,544). The nett annual product, deducting 45 per cent. for working expenses, is estimated at 5,995,000f. (£239,828). The maximum duration of the concession is fixed at 45 years, reckoning from the time fixed for the completion of the works by the company CONTRACTORS.—The Belgian portion of the line is comprised as far as Pontoise, and a single one to Clermont, a distance of 40 English miles An experimental trip has been made as far as Creil, by M. Dufroy de Breville, head engineer of the Northern line; M. Petiet, another engineer; and M. J Perrire. The Moniteur of Tuesday states, that on the Railroad between Paris and Amiens there will be 17 stations, viz., at St. Denis, Pierrefitte, Montmorency, Ermont, Francouville, Pontoise, Anvers, L'Isle Adam, Beaumont sur Oise, Boran, St. Leu d'Esserent, Creil, Lamcourt, Clermont, St. Just, Breteuil, and Creil. The journey will be performed from Paris to Amiens in about 3 hours. Amiens is about 87 leagues (92¼ miles). Should the ordinary speed of the other Railroads of France be observed on that in question the journey from Paris to Amiens will be performed in about seven and a half hours, there are 14 stations between Amiens and Lille. The distance by this Railroad between Paris and the frontier of Belgium will be a little more than 71 leagues (178 miles). The journey will consequently occupy about eight hours.

AMALGAMATIONS.—A "fusion" of the six principal companies formed to bid for the Paris and Strasburg line is stated by the Moniteur Parisien to have taken place. A similar proceeding in respect to the companies proposing to contend for the Lyons line was said to be in contemplation.

INDEMNITIES.—The sum of 1,000,000 francs (£40,000) is allowed for the Railroad from Paris to Nantes, and from Paris to Strasburg, with branches upon Rheims and Metz and the Prussian frontier, is to take place on the 25th of this month. The Moniteur further announces that the Paris and Lyons Railroad will be adjudicated at the latest on the 15th of December

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE CROYDON ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY. — On Tuesday afternoon, Mr. W. Payne held an inquest at Coy's Hospital on the ... of ... Shannons, aged twenty-two years, who lost his life on the ... railway on the night of Saturday last. The deceased was in the service of the Atmospheric Railway Company. On Saturday night, shortly after twelve o'clock, an engine and several ballast waggons left the station at Croydon, for the purpose of proceeding to London, but, as the train neared the Sydenham station, the engineer was suddenly alarmed by the engine lifting up, as if it had passed over something. The engineer immediately stopped the train; and, upon searching about, discovered the body of the deceased lying between the rails. He was quite insensible, and bleeding from a wound on the lower part of his body. The deceased was instantly placed in one of the carriages, and conveyed to the above institution, where he died in a few hours after the accident. The night was very dark and foggy. There was a lamp at the head of the train, and one also behind. The deceased had been drinking in a public house prior to the accident, and it was the opinion of several persons that he was not sober when the train passed over him He had ... on his wages in the evening, and, when discovered after the accident, ... Railway Company. The jury adjourned the inquiry for the purpose of obtaining more evidence

INTERESTING DISCOVERY AT LEWES.—On Tuesday a most unexpected discovery was made in that part of the Priory grounds at Lewes on which ... engaged in the necessary excavations for the Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings Railroad. In digging amidst the ruins of the old Priory, the workmen came upon a leaden coffin, which proved to be a leaden box, surrounded by a few square Caen stones. It was carefully removed, and turned out to be a cist, in which were human bones. Further examination led to the still more important discovery that it contained the remains of Gundreda, the daughter of William the Conqueror ... Gundrada, as it is spelt, being cut in upon its lid The ... about a yard in length, a foot in width, and nine inches in depth. ... sides, and ends, are in excellent preservation—but the bottom is destroyed, an effect apparently produced by the bones, for where they laid there the lead is, as it were, corroded away. The lead is ornamented by nine beaded compartments of the lozenge form, five inches by three, and the lid fits on, or rather laps over the sides. Shortly after this curious and ... had been found, the workmen came upon a second cist, ... similar form, shape, character, and material, being ... dly longer. The bottom was eaten away in the same ... tion, and on the lid was inscribed the word—WILLEM ... old but usual way of writing Guilelmus. This our antiquarians ... erpret into the name of William de Warren; by this means establishing the fact that these cists contained the remains of Gundreda and her lord, William de Warren, the first Earl of Warren and Surrey, and founder of the monastery. Ancient records prove that Gundreda died in 1085, and William de Warren in 1364, and that both were interred in the chapter-house of Lewes Priory; the latter being, as is stated, "buried in the chapter-house in a tomb adjoining that in which his Countess Gundred was laid."

The marriage of the daughter of the Duchess de Berri and the Prince of Lucca, says the Gazette de France, is decided upon, and will soon take place.

OUT OF TOWN.

"BEEN TO BRIGHTON?"

Civilised man is nothing if he is not genteel. Ancient Horace abounds with proofs of the horror entertained by the Roman of the Empire for anything low; and Goldsmith makes the organ-grinder of his comedy shrink from compromising his dignity by performing "any but the genteelest tunes—'Waters Parted,' or the minuet in 'Ariadne.'" Gentility is not easily described: it may best be defined as a quality peculiar to the human race—the characteristics being a desire on the part of the individual to separate from its own order, and herd with a superior class: ton and fashion are varieties of this species. It is the instinct which impels my Lord Duke upon the track of his Royal Highness, and causes Russell-square to rush into Kotten-row. It is an exclusive property, that "has been slave to thousands," and that made Beau Brummel the Dionysius of St. James's. It was the magnet that first attracted high life to a fishing village on the Sussex coast, and which now makes Brighton the occasional resort of all who do not desire to die of a negative to our motto sticking in their throat. Some few years back, the metropolitan flocks used to migrate thither at distinct periods —those of the East, at Easter; those of the West, about the Feast of All Souls. Thither did we also go about the time proper for our kind (albeit, now, all classes are miscellaneous in their descent), as we vowed we would to the Solitary Cockney—"on Monday, by the express train."

There are those, who, to speak disparingly of the city of sea-palaces, call it "London over again." We'll settle those folks anon: all join in condemning its scantiness of shade. "Pity 'tis, 'tis true:" true past all peradventure, that the cliff—noblest of malls whereon Pleasure performeth her gallant pilgrimage, is as stark bare as Fashion at a ball; without a leaf to hide its nakedness, as were our progenitors during their first season in Paradise. But, still O cliff! right rich art thou in many a goodly thing to look and muse upon. Thou hast thy gorgeous sunsets; thy moonlight on the golden deep; thy starry firmament; thy fresh, young beauty of the morning waves—

> Their crispèd smiles.

True is it, thou hast not thy groves of sycamore—thy leafy labyrinths, for Love to sigh, or Hope to triumph in; but thou hast, rarest of possessions, invaluablest of discoveries, a contrivance whereby the human stomach may go to sea and be at rest! They only who have occupied their business, or eke their pleasure, in the great waters what time Neptune was out of temper—those alone who have passed four-and-twenty hours in the British or any other Channel, with "the dead lights" in, and their own almost out, can conceive the blessing of being able to go to sea—on the Chain Pier! Ah! Sir Cockney, its very well for you to smile now: you're not abreast the Nore light, with a flood tide, a dead noser from the South'ard, and a yearning for Margate and your mutton chops. But, that memory may bid grateful thoughts arise—now, while the merry gale is pursuing the white-footed billows, and you fleet of fishing boats comes staggering homewards for the beach abreast of "The Old Ship," disembarse two-pence for a voyage on the bridge of chains, and contrast the feeling of being "off Brighton" and on her graceful pier, and "off" anywhere else in a graceless steamer.

For those who object against Brighton its being London out of town—verbi gratia—we prescribe a trial of Herne Bay or Botany Bay, synonimous recipes. For ourself, holding that comfort is to life what action is said to be to oratory, we should be content to take the great metropolis with us wherever we went, and pitch it, for the nonce, in such place as it might please occasion to call us to. If it be urged that Brighton does not afford that retirement which is an indispensable feature of rural felicity, we reply we would back, as the climax of solitude, against any howling wildness of Africa, or desert island of the Pacific, its gardens of the Chalycosan Spa for a morning's walk, or the stage boxes of its theatre for an evening's siesta. We have tried both, and acknowledge that, in the regard of loneliness, "each of itself is it's own parallel.

They take you your journey now, on an average, in the time it occupies you to order the pints of departure from any habitable quarter of the English capital. In point of facility, it is more convenient to go to Brighton and return to town than it is to storm your way from Hyde Park Corner to the Surrey side of London Bridge. Once there on the Monday registered in our vow, we found ourself before we had quite finished our accustomed morning paper, dallying with a sandwich and a thimble full of sherry at the Bedford. Old Boreas has had a busy equinox of it; perhaps it has not been more zealously breezy for the last fifty autumns than during the present. From the coffee-room windows we look out upon the esplanade, and a few courageous maidens who paraded it in that development of sculpture which the female form is wont to exhibit when walking to windward in a whole gale; we crossed over to the esplanade—probably therefore—but no matter for that. As we crossed in the rear of one of the public carriages of the place called "flys" upon the laissez a son laissendo principle—a dashing equipage, which was following, pulled up its foaming steeds that we might go unscathed. Landed on the footway, we turned to look on the danger we had escaped. We do not love those startling illustrations of the difficulties of our position of which a high state of civilization is full; so perrying the reflection which strove hard to "pink" our philosophy with something about its being "a step between the sublime and the ridiculous" we turned us to one of these seats, which seemed to say—

> Here rest and muse upon the sea,
> And hope. Are not her dreams as fleet
> And endless as the waves that be
> Before the storm with silver feet?

And so we could, (it was just suited to contemplation—for as it is some where written—"A mighty strong west-wind took away the locusts") had not, at this moment, the man with the blue face crossed us. Who is that man with the blue face? We never went anywhere we did not see him, nor ever saw those who had staid at home or journeyed abroad without encountering him. Can he be the Wandering Jew, or is he a ubiquitous Christian. . . . . .

Once used to be—and, very likely is still—a little round Irish Major of Dragoons, who, as the afternoon waxed late, might always be seen, lounging about the door of the Plough, at Cheltenham. For him life had but one object left, and that was his dinner. If any one he knew came out of the house, or ceased to enter it, or chanced to pass in front, his unvarying salute was, "Ah! —well—what o'clock is it?" If the person interrogated should reply it was at all approximating to six, he would rub his hands in an ecstacy, and, looking radiant with delight, exclaim, "Ah! ha! thank God the day's gone, elegant!" We have a suspicion that the case of the Irish Dragoon is a very common one, but it's not so rare as people may insist upon. Take the synopsis, for example, of a Brighton day, and arrive at your own conclusion as to whether its tendencies are towards the cultivation of "fat paunches or lean pates."

Your chamber window opens to the sea—else, what business have you there? and, lo! at seven of the morning you are chased from a wholesome slumber by a silver voice, which inquires, "Any prawns to-day, if you please, Ma'am?" This is a refreshing one to be—and, very likely is still—a delight to the nymphs of Billingsgate, and hide your diminished heads! This serenade induces you to arise and take a plunge in the brine, or a walk to Rottendean, for an appetite. You breakfast well: we defy you to help it, if you were all the couples of Zeno rolled into one. It is one of the afternoon, and lo! you are strolling on the Kemptown terrace and slopes—now, tell us, like an honest reader, one who scorns to fence with fact, have you not turned westward, and put the best leg foremost because one Mutton dwelleth in the King's-road? Don't be afraid, all the world don't know that Mutton's luncheons are left to remand mankind of what ambrosia was. You were not strolling on the Kemptown slopes, neither compassing the good things of the savoury purveyor; you were hunting with the Brookside harriers. Well, now, confess, was it an abstract love of the chase, a simple, unsophisticated taste for the pursuit of wild animals that led you to Telescombe-tye, or the anticipation of the evening haunch, and that a jovial gallop over the downs would be a security for a couple of additional slices? Depend upon it, nothing but the miraculous effect its air has upon the gastric could win for the West Clift the pressure of the flaneur of Mayfair, in the certainty of coming in contact with his tailor, or "that sublime of rascals," his tailor's attorney.

And, apropos, what a place it is for the children of Israel! Perhaps they never mustered in such force on the coast since the days of Pha-raeh. A morning's walk confronts you with enough to colonise a New Jerusalem. There, the daughters of Judah "walk in silk attire" bedight with fine gold: there her youths parade in the manufacture of Moses and Co., and mosaic ditto: there her matrons swarm incessant, with cardinals on their backs, as in scorn of the synanogue, and her old men make their ablutions in the baths of Mahomed! These reveries and revelations are to be understood as the produce of more than one day passed among the scenes to which they refer. In sooth, a pleasant spot is Brighton for him who loveth to sport over a well-stocked human preserve, and eke for the fisher of men who affecteth an odd piscatory specimen for his pannier. Just now, a cry is raised about the exorbitance of its charges: the scale for board rated at famine prices, and lodgings laid at such cost as well might "murder sleep." They put their accommodations down at a handsome figure, no doubt; and where don't they, that "people most do congregate?" We ourself, not many weeks since, made one of a party of five that breakfasted on board of a Rhine steamer, on which occasion the demand for a dish of mutton chops was probably more than was paid for the sheep from which they were cut! What of that? they were flavoured with the Drachenfels, and you can't call for such a relish as that at the Cock or the Blue Posts. Therefore, despite the perfumed mob of Mayfair that comes between your nose and the sweet south what time you roam in gentle dalliance with the last glance of Aurora: in defiance of Jew or Gentile —the noble vulgar or the ignoble genteel—take our advice—follow our example—and add another month to autumn, by accompanying it to the coast of Sussex. See the last of our departing guest shake hands with it on the threshold of winter, as well as you may—it's not everybody can go with it to Torquay or Castella Mare. . . . .

We have said follow our example, and pass three or four weeks, about this time, at Brighton—but we have not told you of a catastrophe that all but nipped these pleasant occasions in the bud. Who has not heard of the Devil's Dyke? It may not be so well known, however, that now our old friend's domain is in the market. But such is the fact, and before its transfer to some less popular proprietor, we were desirous of seeing it once more. Most people ride, there, upon animals belonging to the class of quadrupeds, but empowered by licence to go on three legs, and, very often, on two, at fashionable watering-places. We walk there, and everywhere else that we can: try it yourself—you'll find it the sure way to reform your apothecary's bills.

Hard by the margin of this big ditch stands a rustic hostel. As we drew near to its portal, we became aware of a person issuing from it, with a wedge of bread and cheese in his mouth, and a log each of the same materials in his hand. A glance was enough—it was the solitary Cockney. He approached as in act to speak, so soon as he might swallow his victual. We greeted him with a patronising nod. Why, is not virtue secure of its reward? While yet our courteous smile dimpled our good-natured mouth, and our neck was curved with courtesy there arose within the house a sound of many voices. We started like the scared chamois: one bound placed us on the verge of the Dyke, another some feet below it—in the effort after concealment. Vain, vain hope! Looking upward, there stood—toppling over our devoted head—an avalanche of Smiths! Not a moment was to be lost—we thought of our latter end, glorious reminiscence! Down therefore we sat, and down to the bottom we slid, like one shot from a Montagne Russe, while high up in the air, like voices of mocking fiends, we heard exclamations of "Been to Brighton? Been to Brighton?"

NEWMARKET—AND THE HOUGHTON MEETING OF '45.

About a couple of centuries ago, it required a couple of days for the merry King Charles (scandal says, with the pretty orange girl for a companion) to compass the journey from the Palace of Whitehall to that of Newmarket. Now, it is done in as many hours. This is an accountable change—for the better, no doubt; for, to say nothing of the addition to the career of life gained by endowing twenty-four hours with as much of incident as formerly could be gleaned in a week—the comfort of locomotion in our time is only to be understood by comparison. Arthur Young, the tourist, speaking of our public roads in 1770, says:—"I know not, in the whole range of language, terms sufficiently expressive to describe this infernal highway. (That from Preston to Wigan.) Let me most seriously caution all travellers who may accidentally purpose to travel this terrible country, to avoid it as they would the devil, for a thousand to one but they break their necks or their limbs by overthrows or breakings down. They will here meet with ruts, which I actually measured, four feet deep, and floating with mud, only from a wet summer: what must it, therefore, be in winter?" Now, as the Merry Monarch was fain to sleep at Newport on the first night of his pilgrimage into Cambridgeshire, and content to gain his goal on the second, it is not presuming too much to suppose that the high road from Shoreditch to the Devil's Ditch was altogether innocent of Mac Adam in his time. So far, then, as regards the means of reaching it, the locality of this our history has put a good foot foremost in the quick march of improvement. Whether its other ways have mended as much, we will inquire—by comparison.

In the reign of Queen Anne the following sketch was published by a stranger who paid a chance visit to Newmarket—then the established capital of the turf:—"Being there in October, I had the opportunity to see the horse races, and a great concourse of the nobility and gentry as well from London as all parts of England; but they were all so intent, so eager, so busy upon the sharping part of the sport, their wagers, their bets, that to me they seemed just as so many horse coursers in Smithfield: descending, the greatest of them, from their high dignity and quality, to the picking one another's pockets, and biting one another as much as possible, and that with so much eagerness, as it might be said, they acted without respect to faith, honour, or good manners. I was so sick of the jockeying parts that I left the crowds about the posts, and pleased myself with observing the horses: how the creatures yielded to all the arts and management of their masters; how they took their airings in sport, and played with the daily heats, which they ran over the course before the grand day. Here I fancied myself in the Circus Maximus at Rome, seeing the ancient games, and, under this deception, was more pleased than I possibly could have been among the crowds of gentlemen at the weighing and starting posts, or at their meetings at the coffee-houses and gaming-tables after the races were over. Pray, take it with you, as you go, that you see no ladies at Newmarket, except a few of the neighbouring gentlemen's families, who come in their carriages to see a race and then go home again."

If modern Newmarket were to sit for its portrait, there would be no mistaking the family resemblance it would exhibit to Newmarket of the olden time. The slight sketch which will here be given of its features in this instant October will be found tolerably like those of its ancestor of the days of Queen Anne. How similar the detail of the training. . . . .

It is some two hours after daybreak, and we take our way, haply, for the Warren Hill. There arrived, we find teams of graceful creatures in their gay attire, their hoods and body-clothes of white, or blue, or scarlet, or crimson, with tiny children on their backs, curvetting in the pride of high spirit and pampered appetite. Anon they gallop up the emerald downs towards the clump, or, for a more lengthy course, skirting the plantation, and sweeping away for the summit of the far hill—playing with the daily heats which they run before the day for the grand effort.

In no spot on earth is there so much material of interest for the true lover of the craft and subtlety of racing, as on the Exercise Grounds around Newmarket. The town itself has probably changed but little since first it became the chief resort of Horse-racing. The architecture, for instance, of the Palace, built by Charles the Second, and now occupied by the Duke of Rutland, is very much of the character of the majority of the houses occupied by persons of condition. The late Mr. Crockford, indeed, built a twin companion for his St. James's edifice in the main street, and the Jockey Club and Subscription Rooms no doubt are of more pretension than was the old Coffee House; but still, could the ghost of Tregonwell Frampton walk some moonlight night from the Rutland Arms to the White Bear, he would find things generally pretty much as he left them. Could his shade join the rendezvous around many of the betting posts, he would certainly "find no change in them." In saying that the Palace was built by Charles

THE TRAINING GROUND, NEWMARKET.

II., we mean to convey that to that Monarch it owes its present aspect. James the First originally erected it for a Hunting-box, and Charles the First had a Racing establishment there. So also, had Oliver Cromwell, according to some authorities—but we cannot, for the life of us, imagine grim old Noll indulging in such a vanity. Enough, however, of the past—now to the events of account to which the present week gave "a local habitation and a name" (of one sort or another) at the metropolis of modern Olympics.

The Houghton Meeting, with which it is our purpose to deal under the head of National Sports in this our number, commenced on Monday last, and is still in process of action. In the matter of weather, it could not have been better off had its scene been laid in Tempé. We had one entire and perfect routine of summer sunshine—an atmosphere "like the sweet South." The attendance was considerable; but, as the quaint essayist from whom we have quoted observes—Pray take it with you as you go, that you saw few ladies, save those who, in so far as regards a taste for horse-racing at all events, agree perfectly with their lords. As it was, so business is the characteristic of Newmarket. Therefore, thither flocked the amateur of the sport, earnest in his devotion, and those anxious to turn his enthusiasm to account. There you saw, or might have seen, the most exalted of the sons of men "descending, the greatest of them, from their high dignity," and mingling with all sorts and conditions of their fellows, just as if the golden age had come again. But, to be sure, that could not be the case, or we never should have had the ill rumours rife which were in everybody's mouth. First, they told ye—the busy-bodies!—that the first favourite for the Cambridgeshire Stakes was made secure; as if the selling of him by Mr. Watts to Mr. Clarke were synonimous with transforming him into dogs'-meat! Oh! the horrid things we heard, before we were out of the dust we had accumulated during our drive from Chesterford. We verily believe the most conscientious set of dogs in the world are the gossips of Newmarket. . . . . .

The first day of the Houghton decided the fate of the great handicap of the week—the Cambridgeshire. For this, after various shindies and all manner of disagreeable imputations, twenty-eight came to the post. As to giving the details of the race we don't attempt it, because, in the first place, we have no room for them, and in the next they are unknown to us and every one else—if we had. It was done at very good speed, and as Alarm won by two lengths in a very masterly style, if he had not tumbled down, most probably he would have won the Derby also. To a friend of ours, that stood to win £25,000 on him at Epsom, however, this seemed by no means a pleasant contingency to allude to, so we pass to other matters. The Baron was one of those the soonest beaten—indeed, Wee Pet had disposed of him before they reached the Duke's Stand: how oddly horses run at one time and another! As starting it will be seen that Ould Ireland was first favourite at 3 to 1. We saw "our fat friend" at the post, and wondered what the dickens won him such a place in public favour. He was absolutely, to our thinking, obese; he was backed by the lucky lot at 25 to 1, and had against at 3 to 1. Who talks of the "glorious uncertainty," of the turf? give us the inglorious security. They told you the settling on the Cambridgeshire was quiet. The first day produced capital sport, to the extent of seven events. On Tuesday there were eight races, among them, for the first time, The Criterion. This is, in our estimate, the most intrinsically interesting two-year-old stake run for here. It is the wind-up of the promise of the Derby favourites for the season, in very many instances; it was so in this. There is not a Derby nomination for the coming year of any pretension at Newmarket: but one of much mark out. That is Sting, a colt that has beaten everything he has met in a canter—except Joy, who was his vanquisher at Ascot, through a mistake of the jockey that rode him. Half-a-score met him for the Criterion, in which he carried 7 lbs. extra, and which he won, positively hard held, in a canter. This was a great achievement for one that has done so much. He has been at concert pitch since the early summer, a liberty that few horses—especially two-year-olds—will "stand." The reader will take the trouble to apply this latter remark according to his prudence, rather than his admiration . . . . .

These two events were the cream of the Houghton Meeting, here skimmed in the shape of essay. The matter of fact of its chief issues will be elsewhere found. Its epilogue will not admit of the fine flourishes about hope and promise, and all that sort of thing, common to such compositions. The character of the turf as a national sport has certainly not improved in the present century, if it may not be said of it, as in the last, that those who countenance it do so at the forfeiture of "faith, honour, and good manners." But this may truly, would that it might profitably, be declared, that, till it is purged of the discreditable men who use it as a profession, it is, at the least, a pastime of questionable policy for the gentleman who affects it as his recreation.

CAPTURE OF THE ARGENTINE SQUADRON.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent at Monte Video with the annexed Sketch of the Capture of the Argentine Squadron, off Monte Video, while attempting to escape or run up to Buenos Ayres, on Saturday, August 2nd last. They got under way about 3 o'clock, P M., and were immediately followed by the Dessix, French brig; and H.M.S. Comus and Satellite. The Comus fired a shot ahead of the Argentine Admiral's brig; and the Satellite fired several into the corvette. As soon as the Comus fired again, and the Satellite was fast coming, the Admiral struck his flag, and the corvette followed his example: several shots hit the two vessels, but no material damage was done. The two schooners and the other brig then struck their colours, which ended the affair.

CAPTURE OF THE ARGENTINE SQUADRON, OFF MONTE VIDEO.—(FROM A SKETCH BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

SHIPWRECK OF A HULL AND HAMBURG STEAMER, AND LOSS OF NINETEEN LIVES.

By the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer, Neptune, Captain Whittingham, which arrived at Blackwall on Wednesday afternoon from Hamburg, intelligence of a most deplorable description was received re specting the shipwreck and loss of one of the Hull and Hamburg steamers called the Margaret, commanded by Captain Rawlinson. It appears, that during the last week the coast has been visited by a most fearful storm the [illegible] 20th ult.; and the destruction among the coasting trade and human life, is stated to have been very great.

The Margaret steamer left Hamburg for Hull on Friday, the 19th ult., having her usual number of passengers, and a full cargo of merchandize, the weather at the time of her departure being moderate. When, however, she had arrived off Cuxhaven, near the mouth of the Elbe, a breeze had sprung up from the north west; but the captain, thinking it would not be of any [illegible] and was not aware [illegible] the night was a dark [illegible] Nothing further was heard of her until Sunday morning last, when the General Steam Navigation Company's steamer Neptune was on the point of starting. On the [illegible] to the eastward of the Nore, and [illegible] the passengers and three of the crew had perished with her.

From another source it has been ascertained, that the vessel, after leaving Helgoland, encountered a heavy gale, which gradually increased in violence, and [illegible] stripped, crew [illegible] a dangerous state, passed the Maplin, near Joint, at the eastern entrance to the river Medway.

According to the accounts she struck before daybreak on the morning of the 22nd [illegible] she must have been the victim of the gale in three days. It appears, the steamer [illegible] was running terrifically high, swept several overboard. The long boat being launched, attempts were made to reach, the shore, but owing to its crowded state, and the rough surf, it capsized, and every soul in it met with a watery grave. [illegible] remained [illegible] to save herself. [illegible] but [illegible] however [illegible] [illegible] quantities of her cargo were got out of her hold.

The Margaret was the property of Mr. Fimm, of Hull, by whom she was built some years ago. She was about 250 tons burthen, rigged as a three-masted [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] always the ruling colour, and which is ornamented with a rose, or primroses with brown leaves. Feathers are also employed, not of glaring but of uniform and simple colours. The whole inner edge of the bonnet is to be trimmed with ribbon, not of the colour of that worn outside, but of the hue most favourable to the countenance. We must, however, observe, for the sake of ladies who deem the Pamela form of bonnet unfavourable to their charms, that there is a modification of it, less eccentrical, which may become them. Its form is still rather raised above the forehead, but less so, and it is short and rounded off below with unreasonable proportions, but it has a bavolet of ribbon which fills up the square prominence behind the head, and covers it more completely. Let us repeat once more that the colour of the ribbons inside must be different from that outside. For Manouls, ribbon, bows of velvet, or tufts of blonde, combined with coloured tulle, are employed. Capotes of satin are also worn, made of violet satin, trimmed all over on the inside with ruches of black Brussels tulle and a garland of violet marabouts placed without pretension outside. Morning caps: those worn at home are made of Valenciennes shell-embroidered muslin, of a form somewhat wide, and they are trimmed with small ribbons either in velvet or in satin, but as narrow as that employed for baby caps.

Evening coiffures are likewise preparing in expectation of parties and of the opening of the more fashionable theatres. The Algerine turbans, in cloth of gold and transparent tulle, trimmed with fringe. These resemble in no respect what were formerly denominated turbans; they cover the ears, encompass the countenance, are of Brussels lace trimmed with flowers and ribbon, either in satin, gauze, or velvets. The flowers the most recherché are roses, violets, may, or heliotrope. These little caps are of a form shifting towards the ears. As to the style of dressing the hair, there are in vogue bandeaux à la Raphael, or undulated bandeaux à l'Athenienne—that is to say, begin in oval at the eyebrows. There are also tufts à la Marie Stuart, which afford the countenance a most soft and poetical framing. Garlands are made in leaves mingled with very small flowers. Garlands are also worn in imitation of reeds, of which the leaves are striped with a fillet of gold mingled with coral. The large shaded roses and the deep coloured, the garlands in citronel leaves, and many other elegant ornaments, insure these coiffures a great vogue during the approaching season.

FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

Many dresses are made in the style of redingotes or pelisses: they are almost all ornamented with buttons, in shell, gold, dead or facetted silver; likewise with those in imitation of marcasites, opal, and emeralds. With the higher votaries of fashion, no dress is deemed fit to wear which is not ornamented with buttons adapted to, and harmonizing with, the tissues employed, and their different hues. As to the style of dresses, they are nearly the same as formerly, barring some slight modifications introduced by the taste of the wearer and of the maker; and the accessory ornaments will be—more than the form of the dresses—the object of attention during the approaching season.

The tissues which appear destined to enjoy surpassing vogue, are damasks, with large patterns; satins, with horizontal stripes—white on green, lilac, blue, sapphire, violet, and burnt bread colours. Bordered dresses lose the good graces of the fair wearers daily more and more, because they have been imitated in inferior stuffs.

Jewellery appears destined to be multiplied by the present fashion. There are ladies who wear as many as three bracelets on one arm.

At the approach of the colder season, mantelets are being prepared, and to each is assigned a name more or less extraordinary. Those which appear destined to be adopted by our belles, are mantelets à la visite au caprice, the Egyptian, and that with three bleds. La visite is a close-fitting garment, lined either with white silk, or with pink or with plush. It is trimmed with black lace, or with a braiding in the composition, in which a chenil is employed which imitates velvet. Another mantelet much in vogue is made of satin Argus green, sapphire blue, or Persian lilac, covered with black lace, and a sort of hood is appended, which can be at will put on the head, and which, independent of the proportion of warmth it affords, is very becoming to the countenance.

RAILWAY MANIA.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

IVE him plenty of Line and he is sure to hook himself effectually," says Izaak Walton, when speaking of catching a Jack. Alas for poor John Bull, this system has proved upon him most effectual indeed, when just as he was swallowing the delightful bait in the shape of unlimited scrip, and going on, to all appearance, most swimmingly, a sudden and an unexpected stop is put to his meanderings, and he finds a most tremendous hook in his gills. Now comes on, as Long Tom Coffin has it, "his flurry," all wild, terrific, dashing, and foam. Beware of his struggles, for in his alarm he tries to bolt with a quantity of Line, but it is no go! He is fast! He must come to the surface and yield his fat. It is a terrible thing to be hooked in any sense of the word, but to be hooked by remorseless scrip is the worst of all. A sudden fright has fallen on the Market, for everybody, panic-struck, is rushing to sell, and the Market becomes glutted. The enthusiasm cools down, and eyes become disenchanted, and the imaginary lump of gold turn into their real shapes, of worse than waste paper. The intoxication is over, and now ensues the delirium tremens. The Stag draws in his horns, for bolding is no part of his business. The small speculator trembles with despair in the possession of a hundred shares, upon the obtaining of which he has so much congratulated himself. The aforesaid shares, at £25 each, amounting to more than he ever even hoped to possess; he only intended to turn a pound or two. They now hang like a loadstone round his neck, and must eventually sink him, by slow and torturing degrees, in the shape of frequent calls; for those who can pay must. A most beggarly account will it be when the muster takes place, for the deserters will leave the troops of the Line in a pitiable condition. The awful traffic by Railway Committee-men and others will soon be most frightfully apparent. Disappointed men have whispered a few of the "secrets of the prison house," and shown the world that it has been but a mêlée of interested men to clutch as much gold as possible, and "the devil take the hindmost." This has been a very simple process; for the fairy-like tales spread abroad to catch the ear of the unwary, of men going to bed worth nothing but a letter of allotment, and getting up in the morning possessing thousands, by the magic of Railway speculations, were sure baits. Directors have advertised a number of shares at £2 or £2 10s. per share first instalment, then allotted only a certain number to the public, that a price might be made, which, of course, was done to a certainty, during the height of the fever; directly the sound of premium reached their ears, they thrust the whole quantity into the Market, which bore a very large proportion to the allotted one, and thus sold and divided the profit equally amongst their right honourable Board, careless to whom they sold, as the instantly raising was the only object. Who bought them? Why, men who were of equally honourable dealings—who never intended to hold, but who sold at a profit, and so on to the end. The present holders—who never intended to be so—are not worth a dump—not one in a thousand; nor could they face another instalment or call. Then where is the capital to come from? since the partners or shareholders are men without means, and merely unlucky devils who have, at an unfortunate moment, popped their necks into a bank, from which they have not the power to extricate themselves.

The neglect of all business has been unprecedented; for many months no tradesman has been found at his counter, or merchant at his office, east, west, north, and south. If you called upon business, you were sure to be answered with "Gone to the City;" and the straightforward, honourable, and particular man of business, who formerly asked for your account, now troubles you to ask him for it many times before you get it, or pleads, as an excuse, the scarcity of money, and his heavy Railway calls. This is done now by most reputable houses, without a blush, as everybody is in the same boat, and it is looked upon more leniently than it otherwise would be. All rule and order are upset by the general epidemic, as in the Plague of London, where all ties of blood, honour, or friendship, were cast away; and man grew callous to the sufferings of his fellow man, and only looked to his own welfare and safety in the calamity, and as to how far he could best secure himself from the general ruin.

The fallacy of the Railways only provisionally registered becoming the objects of immense competition, and men paying to each other large sums upon imaginary security, must be apparent to all men of business; and so it has been, but the desire of gain has become so strong, that a Railway to the Moon would have found speculators, if part of the Line could have been surveyed, with the strong recommendation of some Railway King or other potential person: to such an extent had this gullibility gone, that people who had written soft letters to Boards of Directors for a few shares, began to turn their minds to having Railways of their own; many cases of which have been successful. Chairmen and Directors were very easily procured; but, in case of any hurry as to the sending the prospectus to the printers before the aforesaid gentlemen could be consulted as to their willingness to join the designer of the line, a reference to any prospectuses lying now upon every man's desk would furnish a respectable Board, taking them at random. It is a known fact that many respectable and influential men have read their names printed as Provisional Committee-men without the slightest knowledge of the Railway or the parties connected with it. Very often, from this helter-skelter way of doing business, the same name would be found upon two opposition lines; but it did not matter—nobody cared; the involuntary Director found a sop was preparing for him to stifle his growl, so he let the swindle go on. Engineers have been placed in the same predicament, and have feathered their nests most delightfully, for the demand has increased the price tremendously, and their minutes have become guineas, and their patronage to surveyors, &c., immense. The surveyors have been paid in the same ratio, and many a young man with a smattering of surveying has left a good permanent situation under the temptation of four or five guineas a day, which must soon slip between his fingers, and he becomes nothing, as the present slight vibration of the panic, for it is hardly as yet a shock, has electrified the most heedless, and shown them that the storm is not so far off as has been supposed by sanguine speculators.

Deposits paid to provisionally-registered railways, which failing passing through the house, return most pitiful dividends to the holders of promissory share letters, the money being swallowed up by the whole tribe of Directors, Chairmen, Surveyors, Engineers, and other locusts given life to by this mania.

Bankers begin to screw up their money tight, as it is called amidst money dealers, refusing even to look at shares as deposits or security. Yet, according to the Railway advertisements, wherein their names figure to a great extent, and the immense amount supposed to be deposited by the Railway Companies, they ought to be as free as a spendthrift's. But, is the money there? Go and inquire, you forced holders of scrip; you are partners, and have an undoubted right to know the amount placed in their hands to the credit of your Company; this, legally done, they have no power to refuse, and they will inform you "that the enormous amount is only in the prospectus," and that you are bound to pay for the future proceedings of the aforesaid Line to the full amount of your liabilities or shares. Thus many a speculator, who has been doing pretty well heretofore, will find in such events that the other leaf of his gambling or account book has to be put in black to mourn for the loss he has made.

Shrewd men with money have most ingeniously put other men's fingers in the fire, keeping themselves out of harm's way, by thrusting some needy man before them, for whom they find the necessary capital and give a handsome commission. Want of money and the belief of ultimate success, with a very faint knowledge of their liabilities, and the example of high and low around them, have led many men of apparently respectable condition to become cover as it were to the head gambler, who rejoices securely in the profit, and, in case of failure, leaves the poor and tempted victim to shut up his shop—bolt—or go over the Bridge if he pleases. Such cases are not imaginary—they are facts!

Noble Lords, who are certainly liable for their right honourable gambling ribs, will find their names no protection from the forthcoming storm; their own personal peril is no trifle, since we see names of great odour in the polite City of Westminster crowded together as dividers of the Railway sops. Provisional Committees must now provide for the crash, and Directors direct their attention to their accounts, and see how their daily increasing expences are to be met, and that they don't get hung up in their own Lines.

The constant succession of Railways proposed and carried, would, it was supposed, keep up the ball for a year or two more—the public, therefore, have neglected due precaution in speculation.

All Companies have shared in the great folly!—Railway Mania!—seized apparently at the same moment all over the world, upon great capitalists and speculators.

The sudden cloud that has overspread them has been startling and unexpected, therefore unprovided for; and victims stand aghast at their perilous situation.

The magnitude of the error will meet its equal magnitude of punishment; and many families will have to mourn the year Forty-five as they have before mourned over the fatal speculations of the years '25 and '35, when Mines and Bonds worked almost the same ruin, and caused the same delirium. It seems that every tenth year brings its bubble; upon looking back this will be found to be the case.

They have planned and drawn a Grand Terminus for all Railways—to be placed somewhere near Charterhouse Square. We should advise them not to lay out their money in this grand and picturesque idea, for we plainly perceive one already formed in St. George's Fields, which to a certainty will be the Grand Terminus—it is now called the Queen's Bench.

CONSPIRACIES.

The anniversary of the Conspiracy of Guido Fawkes and his associates to "blow up King and Parliament," though no longer celebrated by the populace with that earnestness which marked the day for many generations, is still a prominent one in our annals. The deliverance of the Monarch from death, and the State from peril, is the subject of a Form of Service in our Church; and among the people the shadow of a memory still lingers, though it has degenerated into an absurdity and burlesque, a plea of boys for halfpence, and an excuse for the combustion of gunpowder in the form of squibs, crackers, and rockets—a more harmless mode of applying that dangerous material than was contemplated by those whose attempt still distinguishes the Fifth of November from the ordinary days of the year. It must have been a deep impression on the spirit of the Nation that has endured so long. The crime prevented was a gigantic one—almost the last instance in English History of that dark, cold, and calculating policy which arose in Italy, and which, looking at ends, not means, reckoned assassination as a convenient instrument of State-craft, used poison or the dagger without scruple,—fearing nothing but detection. The annals of Europe for many ages are crowded with such incidents, which, by the space given them by the narrators, were evidently considered as those most worth chronicling. The most terrible enemies of Kings and Princes were their own relatives, or those powerful Nobles who were able to dispute the possession of the Throne with its holder, or who could, like our Earl of Warwick—that "setter-up and puller-down of Kings"—give it to whom he pleased, by throwing his influence on either side during the contest. It was in such struggles as these, that death was the commencement or the end of the drama: the divinity that hedged a King, and made his name a "tower of strength," was a fatal gift, when the Monarch was not strong enough in hand or intellect to hold his own;—deposition was not enough; the "dim, discrowned head" was still that of the "Lord's Anointed;" around that name there would always rally those who had reason to be discontented with the ruler de facto, and many a King found how short was the step between the Throne and the grave. Bulwer, in his "Last of the Barons," paints our Richard the Third as an adept in the Italian school of State-craft,—intellectual, unscrupulous; as profound in the hypocrisy with which he could conceal his crimes as in the skill with which they were planned and executed, leaving no trace or evidence behind. "Men do not die," he says; "they only disappear!" Countless are the instances in which the maxim was exemplified. Of the murders of which Richard is accused, there is little proof or certainty of foul play: Henry the Sixth and the Royal Infants "disappeared;" common report has been repeated by our histories, and what has been still more influential, our drama; Bulwer has but amplified the Richard of Shakspeare's Chronicles (who, we need not say, is not the Richard of the "acting edition"), and re-produced the subtle intellect, the refined taste, the remorseless ambition, and, above all, the consummate dissimulation of the man who "could smile and murder while he smiled"—an accomplishment peculiarly Italian, a first necessity in a practitioner of that school of which Machiavelli was the expounder or the exposer, for the point is still a doubtful one.

This, down to a far later period, was the age of plots and conspiracies; the greater the power vested in the Monarch personally, the more he was considered "personally responsible;" and we shall generally find that the greater the influence the Sovereign exercised on the Government, the more the wearer of the crown became an object of attack if the policy of the day irritated or oppressed any influential part of the people. Elizabeth lived in continual dread of plots against her life, in some of which poison was to have been the agent—the old Italian method; the dreadful skill with which this instrument was used in that age, well accounts for the terrors of rulers. The history of the Borgia Family is perfectly frightful in its fertility of cases, in which the enemies of Alexander the Sixth and Cesar Borgia "disappeared," as well as those Cardinals whose wealth was coveted by those two monsters of iniquity. By a signal retribution, Alexander perished in consequence of drinking a cup of wine that he had drugged for another. During the reign of Charles the First, opposition to the Crown developed itself in the form of an assertion of principles, and resulted in a public contest, open hostilities, the trial of the King, and a public execution. Cromwell crushed open opposition, and silenced the voice of Parliament, which was the constitutional organ of popular complaint; and again—as when the powers of Parliament were destroyed by the Tudors—the holder of supreme power became the object of personal attack. The last years of Cromwell were clouded by dread of assassination and plots against his life, real or pretended, though no attempt ever seems to have been made against it, and he died in his bed, like another and greater usurper—Napoleon.

Charles the Second was the last of the Stuarts who exercised an absolute power. He governed for many years without Parliaments, and was as false and ungrateful to those who served him, as cruel and vindictive to those who opposed him. The latter part of his reign, too, was marked by plots and conspiracies, most of which are now supposed to have been got up by the Government itself, for the purpose of entrapping individuals obnoxious for their opinions or patriotism. Some of the noblest blood of England was shed at this period; and the same policy has often been adopted since, both in France and Austria, and still more frequently in Spain. But with the reign of Charles the Second these kind of plots against the life of the Sovereign may be said to disappear from our history. The Great Revolution of 1688 was accomplished by the Aristocracy almost en masse deserting the Crown, which did not find any support in the hour of trial from the people, and so fell in the person of James the Second, who was deposed and driven into exile, but permitted to live. The doctrine of right divine was then sorely shaken, and the Monarch became the chief magistrate of the state, not its possessor—a ruler in virtue of a compact with the people, which became void if its conditions were violated. Great and violent have often been the attacks on Governments since that period, but the enmity has long ceased to be of that individual kind that gave life to the plots and conspiracies of an earlier age. This is the great distinction between the result of popular discontent in a constitutional government and in an absolute monarchy. Under one system, men assassinate a ruler; under the other, they merely turn out a ministry.

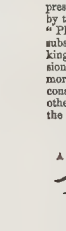
There is a bulwark around a constitutional sovereign, that at once limits his power, and lessens his responsibility, which formerly led to such terrible results. Where power is not limited, it still sits uneasily on its throne; proofs of this may be found in the many attempts that have been made on the life of Louis Philippe, and the suspicion that is betrayed by every arrangement when he goes into public. He is in himself a system, and peace and order are attacked by the violent and unprincipled, whose element is anarchy, in his person. How he has escaped so often is little less than miraculous; the attempt of Fieschi was as diabolical in its real execution as our Gunpowder plot was in intention. His infernal machine was actually fired, and the King stood unharmed amid the death and wounds it scattered among those around him. The fear of assassination is the sword of Damocles, that hangs suspended over every possessor of despotic power; he must daily excite feelings of revenge or terror, and both are evil counsellors. We can trace it most in the history of those rulers who have been the most absolute and the most cruel and capricious. The many Roman Emperors who perished by assassination, generally owed their deaths to the fears of their favourites or dependents; those nearest their persons were the most exposed to their changing moods of favour or hatred. We can trace it in the history of Russia down to the latest period. The madness of the Emperor Paul, perilled the existence of every noble in his dominions, and when it became a question of life and death, the matter was quickly settled; Paul was strangled in his bedchamber, and, it is said, without the knowledge of his own son! Nicholas knows by what tenure he holds his throne, and pays some regard to the opinions of the old Aristocracy of Russia, the only kind of public opinion that exists in Russia. There is a limit in this direction beyond which he cannot go; Paul passed it and was lost.

The Gunpowder Plot was the last great and formidable attempt to throw the State into confusion by one great and sudden stroke. It was the scheme of a few men working in secrecy: great rebellions and revolts belong to another class of things. Yet it was discovered in time; it was crushed; it "lost the name of action;" and this makes it the more strange that the impression and memory of it should have survived so many events that had far more influence on the race of the Stuarts and the people themselves. The execution of Charles is a fact, but forgotten; the intervention is very faintly celebrated. With the expulsion of the Stuart line from the throne, England seems to have agreed by common consent to forget all belonging to them and their unfortunate annals, as things with which, under a new dynasty, it had no more concern. But the name and anniversary of the "Gunpowder Plot" still sounds familiar to the multitude—still calls forth a sort of observance, now happily conducted in the spirit of amusement rather than the dark one of religious hatred which it once no doubt expressed. Is it because the "Commons of England" were destined by the desperate Gudo to share the death of the King that the "Plot" acquired a far greater importance with the people than the subsequent decapitation of a "Royal Martyr," which affected a kingly head alone? Or is it on account of the bonfires and explosions that were made part of that celebration, it has become memorable to the boys of all generations, wholly indifferent to the considerations involved in it? When we have forgotten so many other great events, the lasting memory preserved of this, is one of the "Curiosities of History."

CHINESE YOUTHS.

A very interesting arrival has just taken place at the Chinese Collection, at



A-HENG.

Knightsbridge—two Chinese, youths, A-heng and A-yow. They landed at Liverpool, about eight months since, in the ship Inglestone, in which ship a captain of which unfortunately died on the passage. It is believed to have been his intention to educate these boys in England, and eventually benefit himself by their negotiation with the Chinese. They had been, until lately, staying at Liverpool; when Mr. Langton, the Lessee of the Chinese Exhibition, arranged for their residence in London for a short time. They are intelligent, and well educated in their own tongue, and are respectably connected in Canton, being the sons of merchants. They converse in English tolerably well. We annex their Autographs.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The Chamber of Peers, that spot which grew out of the splendours of one family, and which for past centuries has been styled the Palace of the Medici, is undergoing what may be termed a radical improvement. A constitutional change would be of more importance. A horde of cabinet-makers—not political ones—but ut facto cabinet-workers in mahogany, satin, and rose wreaths—assisted by artists-decorators, furniture-hangers et cum multis aliis, are frightening the senatorial edifice from its moral propriety. Seldom has such a stir been witnessed in the neighbourhood of the Luxembourg. By virtue of a Royal Order, the various offices, the library, and every hole and corner are to be restored to their pristine order. The frescoes are in course of repainting; long and splendid tapestries are in course of suspension; the old fauteuils of the proscript fathers which time had rendered shabby, are to be replaced by curule chairs covered with Russia leather and Spanish lace. These renewals speak for themselves. The Chamber of Deputies manifest a like anxiety for improvement, and a determination to get rid of the old fashions—I presume from a strong sympathy with the upper house. Everything announces that the session of 1845 and 46 will be exceedingly animated, as many affairs have never presented a more serious aspect—not even before the dynasty of July became fixed and settled. More than twenty five projects of law, the remains of last year, are to be got rid of; as old project of law M. Dupin formerly observed, is ever a subject of deep embarrassment—what then must be an aggregate of twenty-five! The external affairs are becoming every day more tortuous, and are the themes of every salon.

The business of Tahiti, and La Plata, and Texas, not counting upon the stormy harangues relative to the late reverses in Algeria, will form pretty aliment for fiery debaters. The mono gold and blood lost in the sands of Numidia, and no result either profitable or honourable! So many young men murdered in the very flower of their age—so much heroism expended to cast a pore lustre around the tinsel of a mad General! These with form nice oratorical pickings for the côté gauche—there will be outpourings of bitternes, indignation, and grief. How many appeals from the Tribune will be launched in winged words! Will they not repeat the famous words of Tacitus,—"Varus, give us back our legions?" And then there will be a fine sprinkling of monetary moralists, thundering forth their tirades against the Golden Calf of the Bourse, and the iron King of the Railroad, whose influences have corrupted the very vitals of social order. To be sure, Parisian monetary language may be covered with a thin coating of honey; but, like the exhibition of arsenic in sugar, the poison will not be less destructive. To add to these difficulties there is the uncertainty in which Marchal Soult keeps the Minister, and you have but a very small section of the difficulties which beset the approach of the 27th of December. The never-ending, still-beginning subject of the dotation—the multitudinous revisions of new Rail ways—and, more embarrassing than all these evils combined, is the coming General Elections. I really feel poor Monsieur Guizot and his colleagues, for I doubt that the wish exists to afford assistance. The Molé faction became evidently more powerful towards the close of last session, and the aristocratic element is evidently disgusted to find but two of their members in the Cabinet, while there are seven issues from the Palais Bourbon.

The death of M. Bouio has left vacant a professorship in "l'Ecole des Beaux Arts." The body of professors, according to the accustomed usage, which is to vote by seniority, have chosen M. Petitot. The professors of sculpture are now MM. David, Pradier, Rauch, Nanteuil, and Petitot. Dumont, Darcit, and Lemaire will take their turns if any vacancies occur before they have reached the age of sixty, for after that period they are no longer eligible. This is rather awkward; but, at that period of existence, repose rather than honours one would suppose most desirable. The model of the equestrian statue of the Emperor has been placed upon a scaffold raised in the centre of the square of the Rue Saint-Dominique: you are aware that it is from the plan of M. Marochetti. Napoleon is represented as a Roman Emperor, the head surrounded with a wreath of laurels, and from his shoulders is suspended a mantle. The horse is in an attitude of repose. There is an air of severe classical feeling about the design, which certainly does not assist the every-day imaginations in which we have indulged, relative to the petit corporal—it rather reminds one of the ancient demi gods of old Rome, and would not be out of place were it to overlook the Tiber: the badauds are quite indignant at the travestie, and bitterly complain of the absence of the buttoned-up coat, and the small military hat of the deified Emperor.

FRANCE.

It appears from the Paris papers, received during the week, that the operations against Abd-el-Kader are prosecuted vigorously. The Moniteur publishes further despatches from General Lamoricière, and the other officers under his command, in the neighbourhood of Tlemcen. General Lamoricière writes on the 24th ult. from Sidi-Bel Abbes, that, on the 18th, he received information that Abd-el Kader, after crossing turned the bridges of the Moulah and Tafna, had proceeded towards the south by the country of the Beni Senous, spreading a report that he was moving to the east. Thinking this probable, the General marched towards Tlemcen, where he arrived on the 21st, and being then informed that Abd-el-Kader had pushed on as far as Tellont, he separated from General Cavaignac, and, on the 23rd, arrived at Oued Sarno. On the 24th, he reached Sidi-Bel-Abbes. "The Emir," says General Lamoricière, "had not gone beyond Tellont, but his Kalifa, Bou-Hamedi, had gone before him, and induced several fractions of tribes to emigrate." As Bou-Hamedi had only one hundred cavalry with him, and could not, therefore, be commanding these by force, the General concludes that it had been previously agreed upon by the chiefs. General Lamoricière encloses a report from General De Bourjolly, giving an account of his march against Bou Maza, after the appearance of that chief in the province of Oran, but to quering Algiers, or even to make a stand in the province of Oran, but to carry away with him into Morocco the greatest possible number of tribes, in order to form for himself a new state and new army. It says that there are large tracts of uncultivated land ready to receive them on the two banks of the Malouia, in the neighbourhood of Tazza and the Rif mountains, and that it will very soon be necessary for the French troops to penetrate into that quarter.

Lieutenant Waghorn's successful express with the last India mail is viewed with much jealousy by some of the Paris papers. Some, unwilling to give him full credit for his achievement, urge that he had the start of the usual packet to Malta and Marseilles by above twenty-four hours, and that the weight of the despatches, &c, which he carried, must have been ten times less than what is brought by the ordinary conveyance. All, however, view the subject as a serious one, and as deserving the prompt attention of the Government. The Débats gives a sort of official intimation that the attention of the Government is already directed to the subject.

SPAIN.

The Madrid papers state that the Government had determined to assemble the Cortes on the 15th of December next. Orders had been already issued for the re-election of the deputies who have accepted the favours of Government.

Private letters from Barcelona of the 28th ult. state that the Captain-General Breton had on the previous day marched from the city at the head of a body of 2,000 infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and six pieces of light mountain artillery, in the direction of Vich and Olot, where the local authorities were either unable or unwilling to carry out the Government orders with respect to the levy of conscripts and the collection of the taxes. The city of Barcelona continued tranquil, although much excitement prevailed and considerable alarm, in consequence of the Captain-General having so consider ably weakened the garrison of the place.

CHINA.

The papers brought by the last Overland Mail contain some important correspondence between some of the leading merchants of Hong Kong and the Government, upon the subject of certain alleged grievances under which they labour, and the removal of which they urge upon the Government. We select, from a memorial addressed to Sir John Stanley, the chief arguments adduced in favour of a modification of the present system. The memorialists say:—

"The period has at length arrived when, as owners of land and property at Hong Kong, we can no longer refrain from addressing ourselves direct to her Majesty's Government, in the confident hope that a plain statement of facts will induce her Majesty's advisers to sanction a material modification of the system which has hitherto been in operation, occasioning results alike injurious to the interests of the mercantile community and the real and essential interests of the settlement.

"It will scarcely be necessary for us, in the first place, to submit, that shortly after the Island was first ceded, or taken; possession of, by her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China, in the early part of 1841, a public sale of lots was held, at which it was stipulated that the terms and tenure of all property would hereafter be defined by her Majesty's Government.

"But, in a letter of her Majesty's then potentiary, dated the 17th of June, 1841, a copy of which is herewith annexed, an expectation is held out that the lands would be granted in fee-simple, for one or two years' purchase, at the rates paid at the public sale; or that they should be charged only with a nominal quit-rent if that form of tenure were found to obtain.

"The suggestion on the part of her Majesty's Plenipotentiary originated in the well known fact, that the very limited quantity of ground available for building purposes on the proposed site of the present town of Victoria was the occasion of great competition, and the eventual payment of a scale of rent which that officer naturally and truly apprehended would, if enforced, be detrimental to the progress and prosperity of the settlement.

"During the time which intervened between the occupation of the Island by her Majesty's Government in March, 1841, and the treaty of Nankin in June, 1843, a period of upwards of two years, the local Government of Hong Kong used every endeavour, both by facilities temporarily offered to early occupants of land, and the threat of penalty or forfeiture of their purchases to all who did not commence building, to induce the British merchants to remove from Macao to the new settlement, and nothing was, up to that date, said or done to induce holders of land to apprehend either that the promises of her Majesty's Plenipotentiary would not be strictly fulfilled, or that they would be placed in a more unfavourable situation than parties similarly circumstanced in other British colonies.

"Large sums were consequently expended on the erection of dwellings and warehouses in the new town of Victoria, to an extent which would have rendered it injurious to all, and ruinous to many, to be compelled to abandon their property; and it was not until the receipt of the treaty that it was notified, 'that her Majesty's Government did not see fit to recognise sales or grants of land that had been made by or under any authority whatsoever, up to the period of the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty of Nankin.'

"But as her Majesty's Government must have been well aware that the colonists had acted with perfect reliance on the good faith and justice of their Government, this order was premature.

"No redress has, however, been granted; and disregarding the future prosperity of the settlement, in the desire to raise a comparatively large temporary revenue, the local Government has not only granted further unusual hard conditions on the landholders, who had been led into a large expenditure of money, owing to their faith in the promises under which the land was originally sold (promises which were, at any rate, tacitly acknowledged by the Government, and not repudiated until after the lapse of three years); while at the same time it is no exaggeration to state, that had the existing regulations been promulgated before, instead of after, the original sale of lands, not one British merchant would have been found willing to become a resident in the colony.

"The result of the system actually in operation for the last two years, commencing with the proceedings in land sales and leases, under the administration of the first Governor, and continued by the financial arrangements of his successor, is sufficiently explained by the present state of the Colony; for, owing to the heavy rents and unsatisfactory tenure of property, the continued arbitrary taxation and impediments to trade of all kinds, and the entire want of confidence, as well on the part of the foreign community in China, as of the Chinese themselves, as to the establishment of a better course of policy, there is, at this moment, after four years' occupation of the Island, scarcely one foreign resident, except Government officers and those British merchants and traders who commenced building before the enforcement of the leases; there are no Chinese merchants, or even shopkeepers, with any pretension to property; there is neither an import nor export trade of any kind, and, as will be seen by the public papers, even now, when many private dwellings are temporarily occupied by the civil and military officers of Government, pending the completion of the public buildings, several houses have been untenanted for months past, and the value of all property is daily on the decrease.

"We trust, therefore, we shall not be deemed presumptuous in submitting to her Majesty's Government our urgent entreaty that they will be pleased to direct the abolition of the opium farm, auction duties, and other harassing taxation recently imposed; these already had the effect of deterring many Chinese from settling in the place, and driven away several who were already established; and been, in fact, utterly destructive of our incipient trade. If this be not conceded, many of the European residents will also be compelled to quit a place totally without commerce, but more havily taxed, in ground-rents alone, than any other part of China, and remove to those ports where the trade is actually carried on, abandoning properties on which many have expended their whole fortunes.

"We further venture to suggest that the system adopted in other colonies may reasonably be extended to this distant settlement; and that it is hoped Government will be pleased to authorise the formation of a municipal body, vested with the usual power of deciding on the appropriation of the money's raised for local purposes."

COUNTRY NEWS.

ELECTION FOR SOUTH WARWICKSHIRE.—The election for South Warwickshire, in the room of Sir John Mordaunt, deceased, took place on Wednesday. William Dickins, Esq., proposed Lord Brooke (the son of Lord Warwick), and the nomination was seconded by W. Holbeck, Esq. Lord Brooke was not present, but Mr. Dickins, on the part of the noble lord, said that he would go to Parliament as an independent member—pledged to no party—unfettered and independent. There being no opposition, the Sheriff declared Lord Brooke to be duly elected.

REPRESENTATION OF WORCESTER.—The rumour of the probable elevation of Sir Thomas Wilde, the Whig representative of the city of Worcester, to the House of Lords, is again in circulation, and a successor of similar principles is talked of in the person of Henry Holland, of Dumbleton, Gloucestershire, a large landowner in the southern and eastern parts of Worcestershire. Mr. Holland was formerly one of the members for the county of Worcester.

FUNERAL OF MR. BOTELER.—The remains of the lamented late W. F Boteler, Esq., were interred in the family vault in Eastry Church, on Friday (last week), on which occasion the shops were closed, and the Mayor and Corporation of Deal followed their late Recorder to the grave, as also did the gentry and tradesmen of that place. The body arrived at Eastry early on Friday morning, from Leeds. The deceased gentleman's sons were chief mourners, and the burial service was read by the Rev. R. D Backhouse. The church was crowded to excess. Mr Boteler has left five surviving children, two sons and three daughters, all of whom are single, and residing at Brook street House, Eastry. The lamented gentleman's sons attended both services, as also did Captain Boteler and his lady. The church presented a sombre appearance; the pulpit, reading desk, and communion-table being hung with black cloth.

LAMENTABLE COLLIERY EXPLOSION, AND LOSS OF NINE LIVES.—On Wednesday morning, the No. 3 coal-pit, belonging to Messrs. Turner and Evans, at Haydock, near Newton, Lancashire, caught fire, and a most tremendous explosion took place, which carried to a considerable distance the planks fastened at the mouth of the pit. These collieries are at work both night and day; the night-men had just returned from the pit, and the daymen in the act of descending, nineteen of whom had gone down, when the explosion occurred. some were actually hanging by the rope when it took place. As soon as safety would permit, their fellow men went down to explore the full extent of the mischief, and nine dead bodies were found, amongst whom was that of a boy, who was so dreadfully mutilated that it was under the necessity of putting him in a sack in order to get him up. Ten men were got up alive, but all so seriously burnt, that not the least hopes are entertained of their recovery, except one. These most unfortunate men are nearly all married, and have left most of them large families.

SCOTLAND.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL AT EDINBURGH.

On Monday last, the Freedom of the City of Edinburgh was presented to Lord John Russell, the Town Council of the City having unanimously agreed to confer that honour upon the illustrious statesman. The ceremony took place in the Music Hall. Prior to the hour fixed (one o'clock) the entire Hall, calculated to hold about 2,000 people, was crowded by an audience comprising most of the influential inhabitants of Edinburgh, not a few of whom were ladies. Among those present were the Earl of Minto, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Bart., Sir James Gibson Craig, Bart.; Mr. William Gibson Craig, M.P.; Mr. Andrew Rutherfurd, M.P.; Mr. Murray, of Henderland; and Provost Traill. The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council were attired in their scarlet robes and other insignia of office. Lord John Russell, accompanied by Lord and Lady Minto, arrived at half-past one o'clock, and on ascending the platform beside the Town Council were greeted with tremendous applause.

The Lord Provost addressed some appropriate observations to Lord J. Russell in presenting the Freedom of the City to his Lordship. He said—To you, my Lord, who have already reached the most elevated height to which the ambition of a subject can aspire, this distinction can add nothing. It is, however, the highest mark of approbation we have to bestow; but, humb e as it is, we trust it will not be without its value in your eyes, as being the symbol which conveys to your lordship the sentiments of gratitude and esteem with which you and your family are regarded by the capital of Scotland. In you, my Lord, we recognise the worthy son of a race of patriots who have defended and bled over and fostered the glorious plant of British liberty, and watered it with their blood. (Great applause.) In you we have discerned the high-toned principles of honour and virtue, from your earliest career we have delighted to observe your aspirations after the welfare of your native land, and the constancy with which you have devoted your great talents and untiring energies to diffuse light, and liberty, and happiness, not only among your countrymen, but through the whole family of man. (Loud cheers.)

Lord John Russell, on rising to return thanks, was received very enthusiastically. After expressing his thanks for the favour, the Noble Lord said, that, whatever might be the arquirements he had made in early life, he owed a great part of them to the education which he received at the University of Edinburgh. Lord John Russell proceeded to say:—

"I have been engaged the greater part of my life in the occupations and struggles of political warfare and political debate. (Loud cheers.) I trust that in the midst of that warfare I have not failed to do justice to my opponents. I trust that, engaged in a party, it has been my object to promote the welfare of my fellow countrymen of all creeds and persuasions With me, the colour of the Negroman is no reason to his receiving the rights of a free citizen; nor could I think that a difference of religious persuasion ought, either on the one hand, to deprive men of those political honours and that political power to which they most justly aspire, nor, on the other hand, to deprive them, while so struggling, of the regard and sympathy of those who, differing with them in religion, might still regard their constitutional grievances, and grant them the hand of Christian charity. (Loud cheers.) It has been the course of my life, in the many important measures in which I have taken a part, to extend the liberties of my countrymen, and to promote the prosperity of whatever the franchise was narrowed by the spirit of former times, or narrowed, perhaps, by the necessity of a contest with some other body, and required to be enlarged, I have been in favour of enlarging it. (Cheers.) I have assisted it to be my bounden duty to endeavour so to correct these abuses, so to regulate that enlargement, that our admirable constitution should not be weakened, but strengthened, and, if possible, purified by the change. (Great applause.) I will venture to say, that in no quarter does there now exist such freedom in forming opinions, and such freedom in expressing them, as now exists in our own country. I need not allude to those countries on the continent of Europe, where monarchy is still unchecked by representative institutions. I need not venture to make any observations upon those laws in which I have had to take a share, still less upon other laws which it may be the part of Parliament hereafter to discuss; suffice it for me, that, if I am right in what I have stated, public opinion will suf, will weigh, will measure truly—perhaps by a slow process—but will measure, in time, justly, all the proposals of change, of improvement, or, it may be, of restoration, which various persons, of various political opinions, may from time to time introduce. I am persuaded that the great object that the Constitution of this country admits of the greatest enjoyment both of civil and religious freedom. Your Lordship has done me the honour to allude to an ancestor of mine who laboured in his life in behalf of the laws of England, then unjustly suppressed, or tyrannically violated. I am naturally proud of being descended from such an ancestor. I believe that his blood was not shed in vain, and that it tended to that revolution which, a few years after, fixed the representative Government—fixed the representation of the people as the governing principle of our institutions; and that blood will not have been shed in vain, if the people be prepared to exercise with moderation and temperate boldness that [illegible]-ed by—will not be either deceived or blinded by the defects of those laws to which abuses or defects prevail, but will go on, from time to time, amending and improving, as

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

NOTTINGHAM AND BOSTON RAILWAY.—This Company has amalgamated with "the Nottingham, Erewash Valley, Ambergate, and Manchester Railway;" and "the Nottingham, Vale of Belvoir, and Grantham Railway." The amalgamated Company is called "The Ambergate, Nottingham and Boston, and Eastern Junction Railway." The Directors have placed the pleted their arrangements with the Midland Railway Company; and Mr. George Hudson, M.P., the Chairman, and Mr. John Ellis, the Deputy Chair man, have joined the Board of Directors, and will give it their zealous and powerful support. Almost every influential landowner has given his adhesion to this line; and the following noblemen and gentlemen have consented to give it their interest:—The Dukes of St. Albans, Devonshire, Rutland, and Newcastle; the Marquis of Bristol; Earls Brownlow, Chesterfield, Harrowby, and Portescue; Viscount Melbourne; Lords Carrington and Middleton; Viscounts Ebrington, Sandon, and Alford; Lords Willoughby de Broke, and Willoughby de Eresby; Sirs John C. Thorold, Gilbert Heath cote, Bart.; J. G. Heathcote, Esq., M.P.; Christopher Turnor, Esq., M.P.; C. B. Colvile, Esq., M.P., &c. The Directors feel assured that, having thus secured this influential support, and effected an alliance with the Midland Railway Company, the Manchester, Buxton, Matlock, and Midlands Junction Railway Company, the Lynn and Dereham and the Lynn and Ely Railway Companies, they have identified their interest with the several Companies with which this undertaking comes into immediate connection; and that they have, consequently, with the Company in a position most conducive to present success, and to lay the foundation of those advantages to the public and the shareholders which the railway was designed to confer. The surveys and plans are nearly completed, and will be ready to be deposited at an early period, in compliance with the standing orders of Parliament.

THE YORK AND NORTH MIDLAND.—The York and North Midland, of which Mr. Hudson is chairman, have just issued a manifesto, to the effect that they have determined upon the route of the various branch lines for which they intend to apply to Parliament, in the next session, for powers by which ample accommodation, both to the north and south, will be given to all the principal places in the East Riding; that the surveys are on the point of completion; and that arrangements have been made with the Manchester and Leeds, which will secure the friendly support of that body. The capital necessary for the formation of these lines is to be raised by the issue of new shares, scrip for which, and for other purposes will shortly be issued. The shares will be divided among the holders of shares in the York and North Midland.

BODMIN AND WADEBRIDGE.—This line has just been purchased by the Cornwall and Devon Central Company, and is intended to form a branch from their line to Padstow, for the purpose of opening a communication with Cork, and bringing that city within twenty hours of London. The purchase money is said to be £36,000.

DURHAM AND SUNDERLAND.—A special general meeting of the shareholders of this Company was held at the Exchange, Sunderland, on Monday. Christopher Bramwell, Esq., of Hendon House, occupied the chair. After considerable discussion, it was agreed to sell the railway, with all its branches, &c., together with the liabilities, amounting to the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, to the Newcastle and Darlington Railway Company, for the sum of £31 10s. per share.

ASHFORD AND CANTERBURY.—The first engine traversed the branch Railway from Ashford to Godmersham on Tuesday. Some of the directors and officers of the company were upon it, and went to inspect the works

LONDON AND YORK.—The directors of this company have issued a notice to the shareholders, in which they state that, having ascertained the extent of their liabilities and consequent upon the contest of last session, they have found that although the expenses have been great, amounting to nearly one-half the original deposit of £2 10s. per share to meet any possible cost in the ensuing session, and that it will therefore be unnecessary to make any further call upon the shareholders. The Bill for the Wakefield branch, which, for want of time, was not heard last session, is to be renewed, and this branch is to be extended from Wakefield into the town of Leeds. Additional extensions are to be proposed from Stamford direct to Spalding; from Hatfield, through St. Alban's, to Luton and Dunstable, and to Hertford The cost of scrip extension shares of £50 each.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON.—A meeting of this company took place on Tuesday at the London-bridge Station. The meeting was called for the purpose of considering the propriety of amalgamating the Croydon and Brighton Companies. After a great many questions had been asked by proprietors, and answered by the chairman, a resolution authorising the amalgamation of the two companies was passed unanimously. The new £50 shares of the Brighton Company were to rank as of the value of £50 in the joint capital; and the holders of £20 shares in the Croydon Company were to be registered as holders of £19 10s. in the joint stock of the two companies.

DISPOSAL OF FARRINGDON MARKET.—On Wednesday a most numerously signed petition from the merchants, bankers, wholesale and retail dealers, and others of the City of London, was presented at the meeting of the Common Council, in favour of the disposal of Farringdon Market to a Railway company for a Railway terminus. The reception of the petition was vigorously supported by Mr. W. Jones, Mr. Williams, and others, who contended against the creation of a monopoly by selling the land to one company who would not allow rival lines the use of it. After a stormy discussion, the petition was, on the motion of Mr. Wire, referred to the improvements Committee

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF RAILWAY DIRECTORS.—The 30th of November rapidly approaches, by which time the mist which has for a considerable period hung over many projects, will be dispelled, when the chaff will be separated from the wheat, and the really sound undertakings distinguished from those having little more than an existence upon paper. From the present demand for Railway engineers, and the increased remuneration expected by them for preparing the necessary plans, books of reference, &c., cannot be estimated at a less cost than £200 per mile, and if not on or before the 30th of November, the actual expenses incurred upon a line to cost £6,000 per mile, would exceed, on a capital of £5 per cent, 40 per cent. of the deposits. I would, therefore, be very desirable that the directors of Railways would seriously consider, before they determine to incur expenses where little chance exists of the necessary Parliamentary preliminaries being completed.

THE COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL AND THE RAILWAYS.—In the Court of Common Council on Wednesday, Mr. Lott moved a resolution to the effect that no member of the Council who is a shareholder in, or director of, or solicitor, engineer, or architect of any railway company, shall be eligible to act on any committee, or to vote in that Court when any matter affecting such railway shall be under consideration. Alderman Sidney objected to such a resolution as a reflection on the integrity of the Court. Mr. R. L. Jones took a similar view of the resolution, which was, however, supported by Alderman Wilson. An adjournment was, however, proposed, and carried.

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAYS.—Amongst the Railway Companies which have notified the absolute or temporary abandonment of their undertakings are the following:—Direct London and Manchester, of Bedford, Railway Company; the Stourbridge, Dudley, and Birmingham Railway Company; the Salisbury and Dorchester Railway Company; and the Torquay and Newton Abbot Railway Company.

NEW RAILWAYS.

STAFFORDSHIRE AND NORTH MIDLAND JUNCTION.—A line, forty miles long, from the Grand Junction Railway, at Stafford, to the general terminus at Amberswood.—The capital is £700,000, in £20 shares. Mr. Locke is the engineer-in-chief, and Mr. Stourgeon Meakes resident engineer.

NORTH WESTERN TRUNK.—A line from Crewe to Gloucester, viâ Market Drayton, Worcester, and Tewkesbury. Capital, £1,250,000, in £20 shares. Mr. S. Clegg is engineer in-chief, and Mr. Francis Briscoe, surveyor.

GREAT NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN DIRECT FROM HUDDERSFIELD TO DERBY.—A line fifty-seven miles in length. The capital is £1,500,000, in £20 shares. Mr. Charles BARLE is engineer.

CENTRAL SCOTTISH AND IRISH JUNCTION. A line to join the Caledonian and Irish and Irish Union Railways. The capital is £1,000,000, in £20 shares. Mr. George Gunn, of Edinburgh, is engineer.

LOCHRYAN HARBOUR AND STRANRAER GENERAL TERMINUS. A line to connect the harbour of Stranraer, in Lochryan, by railway with G ngow, Edinburgh, and the manufacturing districts of the North and West of Scotland, on the one side, and with London, and more directly with Dumfries and the manufacturing districts of the North of England on the other. The capital, £250 000, in 5000 shares of £10 each. Mr. John Miller is engineer.

NORTH CORNWALL.—A design to connect the port of Padstow, the slate quarries of Delabole, the towns of Camelford and Boscastle, and the north of Cornwall, with Plymouth, Exeter, and Falmouth, by a railway commencing at Launceston, and running by Boscastle, terminating at the sand beach at Rock, in Padstow harbour. Length, 25 miles. Capital, £380,000, in 19,000 shares of £20 each. Mr. William Dancl is the engineer.

CANTERBURY AND HERNE BAY.—A line between the above places. Capital of £150,000, in 10,000 shares of £15 each. Mr. Henry Toll and Mr. Andrew Smith are the joint engineers

NEWCASTLE UPON-TYNE, EDINBURGH, AND (DIRECT) GLASGOW JUNCTION.—A line in connection with the Edinburgh and Glasgow by a rank and Railways. It runs from Newcastle, viâ Coxlodge and Woodburn, across the border and on to Hawick. The capital is £7,500,000, in £20 shares. Messrs. J. and B. Green are the engineers.

DARTMOUTH AND PLYMOUTH. This line, it is said in the preliminary announcement, will commence at Dartmouth, and passing near or through Dittisham, Cornworthy, Stockefleming, Blackawton, Strete, Stokenham, Chillington, Frogmore, Charlton, Doddiscoke, Kingbridge, Salcombe, Aveton, Gifford, Modbury, Ivampton, and Plympton, will proceed to Plymouth." The capital is £500,000, in £10 shares.

BIRMINGHAM AND ABERYSTWITH DIRECT.—This is a line from the Junction of the Welsh Midland and Stour Valley Railways, at Ludlow, to join various lines projected in Wales. The capital is £125,000, in £20 shares. Lord Dunboyne heads the provisional committe. Engineer not named.

ROCHDALE, HAYWOOD, AND MANCHESTER.—A line on the atmospheric principle, the engineer being Mr. Joseph Samuda. The capital is £200,000, in £20 shares.

Junction with the Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings Railway.

FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

EXPERIMENTAL TRIP ON THE ORLEANS AND TOURS RAILROAD.—The Journal des Chemins de Fer gives a detailed account of the experimental trip on the Orleans and Tours Railroad on Thursday week. The rails are admirably laid. The line was put down June 12, and already the first line is completed, and the second laid to half its distance, and the gravelling is almost entirely finished. During its whole length, the line is very nearly straight as to arrow, the curves being very rare. The engines and carriages are nearly complete. Six locomotives, according to Messrs. Mackenzie and Brassy, are already on the line. Twenty three will be delivered to the Company in the month of the current year, and the entire number of thirty by the end of May next. On the section from Amboise to Tours all the workmen are French, with whom the contractors are perfectly satisfied. On that from Amboise to Orleans one-sixth are English. The works on the line are most advanced at the two extremities. The opening of the whole length might be made very shortly, but the Directors have decided that it shal. not take place until the 1st January next RAILWAYS IN ITALY.—After much hesitation, the greater part of the Italian States, with the exception of the States of the Church, are actively engaged with the construction of railways. Two sections—that of Milan to Monza, and that from Venice to Padua—have been now opened for some years, and the traffic is daily increasing. The Railway from Leghorn to Pisa, which was opened on the 14th of March, 1844, carried during the remainder of that year—that is, in nine months and a half—467,716 passengers. In the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, the line from Naples to Castellamare and Stamboul direct to Spalding; from Hatfield, through St. Alban's, to Luton and Dunstable, and to Hertford The cost of scrip extension shares of £50 each.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON—A meeting of this company took place on Tuesday at the London-bridge Station. The meeting was called for the purpose of considering the propriety of amalgamating the Croydon and Brighton Companies. After a great many questions had been asked by proprietors, and answered by the chairman, a resolution authorising the amalgamation of the two companies was passed unanimously. The new £50 shares of the Brighton Company were to rank as of the value of £50 in the joint capital; and the holders of £20 shares in the Croydon Company were to be registered as holders of £19 10s. in the joint stock of the two companies.

DISPOSAL OF FARRINGDON MARKET.—On Wednesday a most numerously signed petition from the merchants, bankers, wholesale and retail dealers, and others of the City of London, was presented at the meeting of the Common Council, in favour of the disposal of Farringdon Market to a Railway company for a Railway terminus. The reception of the petition was vigorously supported by Mr. W. Jones, Mr. Williams, and others, who contended against the creation of a monopoly by selling the land to one company who would not allow rival lines the use of it. After a stormy discussion, the petition was, on the motion of Mr. Wire, referred to the improvements Committee

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF RAILWAY DIRECTORS.—The 30th of November rapidly approaches, by which time the mist which has for a considerable period hung over many projects, will be dispelled, when the chaff will be separated from the wheat, and the really sound undertakings distinguished from those having little more than an existence upon paper. From the present demand for Railway engineers, and the increased remuneration expected by them for preparing the necessary plans, books of reference, &c., cannot be estimated at a less cost than £200 per mile, and if not on or before the 30th of November, the actual expenses incurred upon a line to cost £6,000 per mile, would exceed, on a capital of £5 per cent, 40 per cent. of the deposits. I would, therefore, be very desirable that the directors of Railways would seriously consider, before they determine to incur expenses where little chance exists of the necessary Parliamentary preliminaries being completed.

THE COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL AND THE RAILWAYS.—In the Court of Common Council on Wednesday, Mr. Lott moved a resolution to the effect that no member of the Council who is a shareholder in, or director of, or solicitor, engineer, or architect of any railway company, shall be eligible to act on any committee, or to vote in that Court when any matter affecting such railway shall be under consideration. Alderman Sidney objected to such a resolution as a reflection on the integrity of the Court. Mr. R. L. Jones took a similar view of the resolution, which was, however, supported by Alderman Wilson. An adjournment was, however, proposed, and carried.

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAYS.—Amongst the Railway Companies which have notified the absolute or temporary abandonment of their undertakings are the following:—Direct London and Manchester, of Bedford, Railway Company; the Stourbridge, Dudley, and Birmingham Railway Company; the Salisbury and Dorchester Railway Company; and the Torquay and Newton Abbot Railway Company.

NEW RAILWAYS.

STAFFORDSHIRE AND NORTH MIDLAND JUNCTION.—A line, forty miles long, from the Grand Junction Railway, at Stafford, to the general terminus at Amberswood.—The capital is £700,000, in £20 shares. Mr. Locke is the engineer-in-chief, and Mr. Stourgeon Meakes resident engineer.

NORTH WESTERN TRUNK.—A line from Crewe to Gloucester, viâ Market Drayton, Worcester, and Tewkesbury. Capital, £1,250,000, in £20 shares. Mr. S. Clegg is engineer in-chief, and Mr. Francis Briscoe, surveyor.

GREAT NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN DIRECT FROM HUDDERSFIELD TO DERBY.—A line fifty-seven miles in length. The capital is £1,500,000, in £20 shares. Mr. Charles BARLE is engineer.

CENTRAL SCOTTISH AND IRISH JUNCTION. A line to join the Caledonian and Irish and Irish Union Railways. The capital is £1,000,000, in £20 shares. Mr. George Gunn, of Edinburgh, is engineer.

LOCHRYAN HARBOUR AND STRANRAER GENERAL TERMINUS. A line to connect the harbour of Stranraer, in Lochryan, by railway with G ngow, Edinburgh, and the manufacturing districts of the North and West of Scotland, on the one side, and with London, and more directly with Dumfries and the manufacturing districts of the North of England on the other. The capital, £250 000, in 5000 shares of £10 each. Mr. John Miller is engineer.

NORTH CORNWALL.—A design to connect the port of Padstow, the slate quarries of Delabole, the towns of Camelford and Boscastle, and the north of Cornwall, with Plymouth, Exeter, and Falmouth, by a railway commencing at Launceston, and running by Boscastle, terminating at the sand beach at Rock, in Padstow harbour. Length, 25 miles. Capital, £380,000, in 19,000 shares of £20 each. Mr. William Dancl is the engineer.

CANTERBURY AND HERNE BAY.—A line between the above places. Capital of £150,000, in 10,000 shares of £15 each. Mr. Henry Toll and Mr. Andrew Smith are the joint engineers

NEWCASTLE UPON-TYNE, EDINBURGH, AND (DIRECT) GLASGOW JUNCTION.—A line in connection with the Edinburgh and Glasgow by a rank and Railways. EVENING MELODIES.—NO. XVI.

A FATHER'S LAST WORDS.

My noble boy, stand near!
They say my life is dying, and he knows
They say the truth, yet feels my pain, nor fear;
Only he would his darling child should hear
His last charge ere he goes.

His breath is almost spent;
The blood within his veins is waxing chill;
And these his words shall be the music sent
At eventide from some lone instrument,
Whose tones must soon be still.

A thousand hopes allure
Thy footsteps, boy, and some are falsely fair,
But God will send thee holy thoughts and pure;
And when they spring within thine heart, be sure
That then thou keep'st them there!

It is not mine to know
What times mark thoughts thy youthful mind will fill;
But by God's dealings with all men below,
I charge thee keep a constant watch, for oh!
I know that come they will!

If thy dost stand at night
Where Heaven's whole host has on the mountain sunlit'd,
And glows within thy soul a love more bright,
More bound-less far than all those orbs of light,
Let it not fade, my child!

If thou dost kneel in prayer
Where long dim aisles, and mellow'd sunbeams be,
Then all him then proclaim—
That thou art great and free!

The convict in his cell—
The murderer, now amid pluion'd on his knees—
The dying wretch in whose wild ravings dwell
The pains, the fears, the agonies of hell,—
Have had sure thoughts as these!

'Tis done!—and now the sky
Hath joys for me earth's glories fail'd to give,
Oh whpe the tear-drop from that youthful eye,
—My child, it is an easy thing to die,
The great thing is to live!

THE HUMAN BLOOD.

Professor Bronson (an American) states, that if a drop of human blood be subjected to examination by the hydrogen microscope, and magnified some 20,000,000 of times, all the species of animals now existing on the earth, or that have existed during the different stages of creation for thousands of years past, will there be discovered. In the blood of a healthy person all the animalcular are quiet and peaceable; but in the blood of a diseased person they are furious, raging, and preying upon each other. That man contains within himself all the principles of the universe; also, that, if a dead cat be thrown into a pool of water, and stirred up, and allowed to dissolve there, a drop of water taken from any part of this pool, and as above, will show every species of animal of the cat kind that has ever existed on the earth, raging and destroying one another; the bodies of all the lower animals being thus made of animalcule similar to themselves, and the body of man being composed of all that is below in the scale of creation.

LETTERS OF JUNIUS.

The Inverness Courier says, that Sir David Brewster, who is married to a daughter of the late James Macpherson, Esq., translator of Ossian's Poems, has in his possession some letters among the papers of his father-in-law which may lead to the discovery of a great secret—the authorship of Junius. The person who, as Sir David thinks, may be identified as the author, is Lachlan Maclean, the son of an Irish Presbyterian clergyman, her descended from the ancient Scottish family of the M'Leans of Coll. He was bred to the study of medicine, but became a political writer and adventurer in London, and rose to some eminence. He was once an Under-Secretary of State, in which capacity he might have become acquainted with state secrets. Having been sent out to India by Government in 1777, he was shipwrecked and drowned on the passage a circumstance that may account for the non-revealment of the secret as to the authorship of Junius. His papers were all lost at the same time.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

A Berlin letter of the 18th ult says, "By means of a microscope, the cause of the malady prevalent in the potato has been discovered to be insects of an exceedingly small species. They create cavities in the tubercle, and soon produce putrefaction. It is stated that a very large amount of farinaceous matter may be extracted from the decayed roots, if proper means be taken to do so.

OLD BAILEY DOINGS IN 1724.

Yesterday, the sessions began at the Old Bailey (London). . . . One Hoss was indicted for a street robbery, but refused to plead to the indictment; whereupon the Court told him the fatal consequence of such refusal, namely, that he must be miserably "pressed to death," and indulged him with time to consider of it till this morning. When again brought up, he pleaded guilty, and was condemned to death.—Whitehall Evening Post, Aug. 25, 1724.

PROGRESS OF LITERATURE IN GERMANY.

The following statistical returns show the progress of literature in Germany during the last three centuries:—In the year 1589, the number of works published was 362; in 1617, 371; in 1717, 553; in 1789, 2110, in 1831, 6389; in 1840, 9770; and in 1844, nearly 11,000.

HOW TO LOOK YOUNG.

How is it some men thought to be so old, still look so young, whilst others known to be so young must still look old? The cause lies frequently within themselves. A physician once, on being asked the secret, said, "I never ride when I can walk, I never eat but one dish at dinner; and never get drunk. My walking keeps my blood in circulation; my simple diet prevents indigestion; and never touching accident spirits, my liver never hears going astray up alive." But he forgot to add one of the greatest causes of all lasting youth, "a kind unconscious heart." Envy can dig as deeply in a human face as time itself.

A COMPARISON.

The lapse of time and rivers is the same,
Both speed their journey with a restless stream,
The silent pace with which they steal away
No wealth can retbe, nor prayers persuade to stay;
Alike irrevocable both when past,
And a wide ocean swallows both at last.
Though each resemble each in every part,
A difference strikes at length the musing heart.
Streams never flow in vain; where streams abound,
How laughs the land with various plenty crowned!
But time, that should enrich the nobler mind,
Neglected, leaves a weary waste behind.

Old Poem.

RAIN IN THE PRESENT YEAR.

The Philosophical Magazine publishes a meteorological register of the quantities of rain that have fallen in each month during the present year. From this table it appears, that during the first four months, January, February, March, and April, there fell little more than four inches of rain fall, whilst during the succeeding four months of May, June, July, and August, there were fourteen inches of rain. "February fill dike" must henceforth lose its character, for during this year a smaller quantity of rain fell in that month than in any other. The average quantity of rain in a year near London is twenty-six inches, and eighteen inches fell within the first eight months; and as at least three inches must have fallen in September, we may reasonably expect the remaining months of the year to be unusually dry.

QUICKER THAN TIME.

The St. Louis papers are felicitating themselves upon the prospects that, when the magnetic telegraph is completed from Washington to their city, they will be able to report the speeches in Congress a few minutes before they are delivered, in consequence of the difference of longitude between the two places.

AN EXCUSABLE SUPPOSITION.

An editor having read in another paper that the deaf nuts were a kind of tobacco which, if a man should either smoke or chew, he would forget that he owed a dollar in the world, very innocently concluded that many of his subscribers had been furnished with the article.

DEATH OF AN OLD SAILOR.

(On hearing that a Scallerman had expired while plying his boat.)

A Heart of Oak, proud Albion! see,
Here parting with a life,
Consumed by bitter sorrow,
To make their great and free!

This withered arm once hurled for thee,
When covered by manhood's prime,
Thy helm from alone to climb,
To make thee great and free!

Not love, not kindred—tender plea—
His ardent soul restrained,
All human ties disdained,
So thou be great and free!

Here, shielding base unshared, they see,
Now enfeebled from home,
A storm-fossil's banner, roam,
That thou be happy—free!

Trafalgar! Nile! the Straits! With glee,
Still immortal the sailor's name!

Then all him then proclaim—
That thou art great and free!

Paid off, though worn with wounds he be—
He hoards on England's shore
Commercial wealth and store,
And England's rich and free

Fast sinking—independently
He'll go on a sailor's way,
Nor does his fate despise—
For England's great and free!

DR. HEINRICH FIER.

LIEUTENANT WAGHORN'S RACE WITH THE BOMBAY MAIL, FROM ALEXANDRIA TO LONDON.

LIEUTENANT WAGHORN'S TRAVELLING CARRIAGE.

Lieutenant Waghorn has just succeeded in bringing the India Mail for the Times journal, from Alexandria, viâ Trieste ; and has thus anticipated the regular Overland Mail, and proved the superiority of the communication through Germany over that across France. The enterprise is, altogether, of so interesting a character, independent of its importance in our communication with India, that we have illustrated the principal points of the journey ; and have received from the indefatigable chef the following details :—

It appears that the Hon. East India Company's steamer Semiramis, with the Bombay Mails of October 1, arrived at Suez, on the 19th, 11h. 45m. A.M. Here Lieutenant Waghorn's agent was in waiting to receive the Express from the steamer, the Captain of which had been directed to deliver the same by the Bombay Government, so that all delay at the Suez post-office might be avoided. In like manner, the Express passed on to Cairo, carried by Couriers on horseback, 84 miles across the Desert; there being a change of horses at each of the eight stations, and the distance being accomplished in eight hours. From Cairo, it passed in The Little Nile steamer (built by Ditchburn and Mare, and fitted with Penn's engines, for Lieutenant Waghorn, about five years since), to the Canal of Alexandria, in nine hours. From the end of the Canal, it was dispatched to Alexandria by couriers, in four hours and three-quarters, to Lieutenant Waghorn, who was lying off that port, in the Austrian Imperatore; the time in the transit from steamer to steamer being twenty-one hours and three-quarters.

Lieutenant Waghorn then proceeded, in the Imperatore, to Dwino, near Trieste, in six days thirteen hours, having a most stormy passage, by adverse winds and weather. This distance has, however, been accomplished by the Pasha's steamer, Nile, in five days. Dwino, we should add, is fourteen miles nearer to London than Trieste, and is better adapted for expresses and mails than the latter place, as it avoids the mountain, at the foot of which Trieste is situated.

The following is the summary of the route from Dwino to London :—

		H.	M.
Dwino to Inspruck	.. ..	27	30	Post.
Inspruck to Ulm	.. ..	18	30	Do.
Ulm to Bruschall	.. ..	12	0	Do.
Bruschall to Manheim	.. ..	2	30	Rail.
Manheim to Bingen	.. ..	7	0	Steamer.
At the last-named place, a thick fog came on, and the steamer ran foul of a large vessel ; after getting clear, Lieutenant Waghorn landed, and posted to Cologne	.. ..	13	0	Post.
Cologne to Ostend	.. ..	11	0	Rail.
Ostend to Dover	.. ..	5	45	Herne Steamer.
Dover to London	.. ..	2	30	Rail—Special Train.

Lieutenant Waghorn arrived at the Times office on the morning of the 31st ult., at half-past four o'clock. Meanwhile, the Iberia, with the Bombay Mail, did not start from Alexandria to Marseilles till forty-eight hours later than Mr. Waghorn, viz., on the morning of the 22nd. An express by this Mail was received at the Times office at eleven o'clock on Sunday night last. "The result, therefore, of the grand race lately pending would seem to be, that the route viâ Trieste is the shorter of the two by rather more than fourteen hours, that being the time which remains after deducting the forty-eight hours' start which Mr. Waghorn had over the Iberia."

Mr. Waghorn considers the Pass of the Brenner far easier to cross than either Mount Cenis or the Simplon—the great Passes of the Alps between France and Italy. The Governor of Inspruck, likewise, has it always in his power to order a sufficient quantity of men to keep the Passes of the Tyrol clear.

The weather altogether was unfavourable for Mr. Waghorn's enterprise. On nearing Dwino, the night was so dark, that fireworks were sent off from the Castle and lights suspended on shore, to guide the traveller. Before reaching Dover, too, Mr. Waghorn fired rockets as signals; and so densely foggy was the weather, that the answering signals from shore could not be perceived till they had attained an extraordinary height.

MOUNTED ARAB COURIE

The Times, in glancing at Lieut. Waghorn's success, observes that "it must be gratifying to all admirers of enterprise. Even supposing France to be the more natural route, it is obvious that untoward circumstances might arise which would at once cut off our Overland Communication with India, unless the practicability of as speedy a transit through Germany were demonstrated. A spirit less bold or indefatigable would have been content with being the first to discover one Overland route, it is the singular fortune, if it be fair to apply the term in such a case, of Lieut. Waghorn to have shown the feasibility of two. * * * As to the courage and capacity which Lieut. Waghorn has displayed, there can only be one opinion. He has a claim on the gratitude of all who are interested in India ; and we only hope that the thousands who have been benefited by his persevering labour, will not forget that a testimonial is now being set on foot in acknowledgment of his eminent services."

We should add that Lieutenant Waghorn's journey has, throughout, been accomplished under peculiar disadvantages. First, the Semiramis steamer was nineteen instead of seventeen days between Bombay and Suez; thus, a loss of two days to the Express. Again: the common passage between Alexandria and Trieste is five days, whereas the Express occupied six and a half days; thus, three and a half days have been lost upon the sea-passage: and the Express should have reached London in twenty-six days, instead of twenty-nine and a half days. Lieutenant Waghorn is of opinion that he shall soon be enabled to complete the journey between Bombay and London in twenty-five days; and, with less than two years' experience, despatches will be in London on the twenty-first day from Bombay.

Lieutenant Waghorn, in a letter to the Times, thus records an extraordinary instance of Austrian alacrity and attention. "His Excellency the Governor of Trieste, Count Stadion, Chevalier de Bruck, the head of the Austrian Lloyd's Company, and all the élite of the merchants, &c., of Trieste, were waiting for me at Dwino, though at the hour of half-past twelve at night, and one of the darkest I ever experienced. we were guided only to Dwino by the rockets sent up by them. My passport was given by order of the Emperor of Austria, and countersigned at Vienna by the representatives of Belgium, Prussia, Baden, and Bavaria, countries through which I passed; indeed, I was not asked a question throughout the journey."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—In the event of a continuance of the present fine autumnal weather, her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Infant Royal Family, are expected to proceed to Osborne House about the 28th or 31st inst., where the Court will probably remain for about a fortnight or three weeks. Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked this morning in the Slopes and private plantations. The Royal Family have been taken out for their usual walking and equestrian exercise. Prince Albert rode out on horseback, at noon, attended by Lieut. Colonel Wylde; and this afternoon his Royal Highness drove her Majesty for an airing, in the Great Park, in a pony phaeton and pair. Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Wylde, the equerries in waiting, were in attendance. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent took a carriage airing, this morning, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson.

RETURN OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Baron Knesebeck, arrived in town on Monday, from the Continent. On arriving at the Bricklayers' Arms terminus, his Royal Highness was received by Prince George, who accompanied the Royal Duke to Cambridge House. The Duke of Cambridge visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester after his arrival.

HEALTH OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Sir Robert Peel, who, as we stated last week, has been suffering from gout, is much better. The right hon. baronet is sufficiently recovered to leave his room.

ARISTOCRATIC MARRIAGE.—On Thursday morning, at St. George's, Hanover square, the Hon. James Lindsay, M.P., second son of the Earl of Balcarres, was married to the Lady Sarah Elizabeth Savile, only daughter of the Earl of Mexborough. After the breakfast given on the occasion by the Earl of Mexborough in Dover-street, Mr. and Lady Sarah Lindsay took their departure for East Hampstead Park, near Bracknell, the seat of the Marquis of Downshire.

THE HON. CAPTAIN LEICESTER.—WINDSOR, Thursday.—We regret to state that the Hon. Captain Leicester, who burst a blood-vessel in the early part of last month, suffered a relapse yesterday (a considerable hemorrhage having taken place, which has reduced him to the very lowest ebb), and has been given over by his medical attendants.

THE BANK OF IRELAND.—The Directors of the Bank of Ireland have determined upon a further advance in discounts; namely, to four per cent. upon English bills, and to five per cent. upon Irish bills. This proceeding is one of great commercial importance, under existing circumstances, and cannot fail to produce a material influence upon railway enterprise.

NEWSPAPER SAN MARINO

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

LONGFORD CASTLE.

This "fine old place," one of the seats of the Earl of Radnor, is situate in the immediate neighbourhood of Salisbury. Opportunely enough, we find the following very amusing descriptive details in a vividly-written paper ("Out of Town"), in "Fraser's Magazine" for the present month:—

"Longford Castle, the seat of the Earl of Radnor, was built by Thomas Thorpe, in 1591, for Sir Thomas Gorges and his lady, the Dowager Marchioness of Northampton. There are two elevations of the parts of each front, among Thorpe's designs, in the museum of Sir John Soane. The original form was that of a triangle, with an octagon tower at each corner, the triangular court containing a diagram of the Trinity. The Castle has been much enlarged since it passed from the family of Sir Thomas Gorges; but Thorpe's portion of the building is still nearly entire. The great Dining-room is in one of the octagon towers, and a most pleasant damp-room it makes; reviving Arthur's board, and the co-equality of the Knights of the Round Table. The Chapel is immediately above the dining-room, like a kind of aristocratic chapel of ease in London, with a wine-merchant's cellar below, reminding one of Defoe's celebrated couplet in his 'True-born Englishman.'

LONGFORD CASTLE.

"The 'Steel-chair,' and the two Holbeins ('Erasmus and Ægidius,' from Dr. Mead's Collection), have often been described. So have the Claudes, 'The Morning and the Evening of the Roman Empire.' Nor has Guido's 'Magdalen' been overlooked, since Hazlitt passed a glowing eulogium upon it. But Hazlitt ran too hurriedly through Longford: the pictures are infinitely to be preferred to the pictures at Wilton. We must except, however, the Vandyke Room. But Wilton has a name, and Longford Castle has still to acquire one. Witness the 'Three Children of Henry VII.,' of which there are copies at Hampton Court and Wilton; and a third in existence, once Lord Methuen's. The Longford picture is the original, we think; but we can get no aid from critics on this subject. Mrs. Jameson had evidently not seen it."

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.

ST. MARY'S, ISLINGTON.

This modern church, built so lately as 1751, is the successor of one or more sacred edifices occupying the same site. Of the original foundation of a church in the village, nothing at this time can be ascertained. The one removed prior to the rebuilding, had an embattled tower, with a bell turret, and is presumed to have been about 300 years old. The tower would, probably, have stood many years longer; for the surveyor had literally to burn the timber-work ere the old fabric could be brought to the ground.

The existing church was built by Mr. Stevenson, from a design by Mr. Launcelot Dowbrggin, an architect, who was one of the unsuccessful competitors for Blackfriars Bridge. The foundation stone was laid August 28, 1751, by James Colebrooke, Esq., the largest landed proprietor in the parish; and the church was opened for divine service on Sunday, May 25, 1754. It is well built with brick, strengthened with stone quoins, corniees, &c., in rustic work. At the west end is a handsome tower, surmounted by a spire of Portland stone. The west door has a semicircular portico, consisting of a dome, supported by four Tuscan columns. The two side doors are Vitravian; and at the east end is a Venetian window. The steeple consists of a square tower, to the height of 87 feet, and terminated by a cornice, ornamented with vases at the angles, an octagonal balustrade, &c. From the latter rises the base of the spire, supporting eight Corinthian coupled columns, with shafts wrought in rustic. Upon these columns rests a dome, and from its crown the spire is continued with perforations, until it terminates in a ball and vane. The roof is spanned from the walls, without the support of pillars. The ceiling of the interior was originally vaulted, and enriched with moulings of wreathed flowers, &c., in stucco. There are side galleries; and at the west end an organ in a mahogany case, erected in 1772. The pulpit, reading desk, &c., are of mahogany, as is also the altar-piece; above which is a painting of the Annunciation, and on each side are emblems of the Law and Gospel, in chiaro scuro, executed by Mr. N. Clarkson, a parishioner.

The main dimensions of the church are: height of tower and steeple, 154 feet; length of church 108 feet; width 66 feet. In the tower is a fine peal of 8 bells; six of which were in the old church, and were re-cast in 1774. The tenor weighs 16 cwt., and was re-cast, by Mears, in 1808. Around each bell is a couplet, indicating loyalty, love, and harmony. The clock-dial was, amongst the earliest of those in London and its vicinity, illuminated at night. The entire cost of the church was £7340.

In 1787, when a lightning conductor was affixed to the spire, one Thomas Birch, a basket-maker, constructed a wicker work scaffolding around the spire, with a flight of steps within; and he was deservedly rewarded by the public for his ingenuity.

The Parish Register dates from 1557, and contains many curious entries.

The Monumental inscriptions in the church and churchyard are very numerous. Here lie Dame Alice Owen, who founded a free school and almshouses; Dr. Hawes, one of the originators of the Humane Society, &c.

We have gleaned these facts from Cromwell's "Walks through Islington," a carefully written work.

THORWALDSEN'S STATUE OF LORD BYRON.

THORWALDSEN'S STATUE OF LORD BYRON.

This picturesque work of art, after lying for more than a dozen years in the cellars of the London Docks, has, at length, found a destination at the upper end of the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, where it was set up a few days since. Of its artistical characteristics we find the following admirably written estimate in a late Number of the Athenæum:—With regard to the statue itself, we believe that no man who looks at in an artistic spirit will be disappointed. As the representation of a poet, and of the particular poet, it is a beautifully imagined and presented work, having, with much of the Danish artist's carelessness, and even coarseness, of execution, less than his accustomed severity of style. The fact is, that the work presents a picture, from whatever point of view it is regarded—and a picture raising the romantic as much as the classical associations. The bard is seated on a ruined fragment, which has been part of some ancient temple, and his foot rests on the broken shaft of a fallen column. The sculptured ornaments on the shattered fragment, while they are supposed to have been the ancient carving of the stone itself, are skilfully selected as tributes to the poet—those on the right representing the Athenian owl, while on the left the dedication of the lyre to Apollo is symbolised. In his left hand, the poet holds a volume, inscribed with its title, "Childe Harold;" and the raised chin is lightly touched with a stylus, or pencil, which he holds in his hand. The head is slightly lifted, and turned over the right shoulder—the eyes raised, but with no dramatic or determined air of inspiration. The look and attitude are both natural and unaffected expressions of thought. The beauty of the poet's hand and wrist, and the delicate forms of the throat and lower face are strikingly rendered; but in the aspect there is something more than mere thought—infinitely sad and touching; and which, to us, seems one of the triumphs of the work. The upper face tells a tale of pain and sorrow; and a shadow from within gives a character of age to features that, in their maternal presentment, are obviously young. The costume is a riding-dress, with a cloak thrown loosely over,—whose folds are among the sculptor's resources for composition and relief. In feeling and design, the work is a very fine one—the genius, the character, and the fortunes of the wayward poet are all shadowed forth; and Trinity will have, in this statue, a new object of great interest for the visitors to her fine library. The execution of the figure—as in many another of Thorwaldsen's—is far below the conception; and here it is that the more unfriendly critics may have found the objections which have led them so greatly to underrate the work. Besides a general coarseness of handling, excepting about the head and in the modelling of the hand, there are faults of detail, which may furnish the mere critic with themes undeniable, and accusations to be answerered only by an appeal to larger sympathies and artistic faith. No English sculptor, in view of the clamour he would draw about his head, dare venture to produce to his public such lower extremities as Thorwaldsen has given to the bard; no British statue could stand on such feet. The right leg of the figure—which is extended, to rest on a lower plane (the left being raised on the broken shaft,) is shapeless—its upper portion being rather feminine than that of a man. All these defects the sculptor could have corrected, at will; the wanting finish is an added charm which his chisel could have added at any time. We do not affect to underrate the graces of finish and execution, nor to justify their being withheld; but the thought embodied in this is intrinsically worth all the technicals which schools can teach or critics enforce.

Pen-and-Ink Drawing.—The venerable Mr Minasi has just produced another proof of his extraordinary ingenuity, in copying pictures by pen and ink. It is from Raphael's celebrated Madonna della Sedia, in possession of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. It is most beautifully executed, within 6 inches square. The veteran artist, now in his 70th year, is, we perceive, a candidate for admission into the National Benevolent Society, at the forthcoming Election, on the 27th inst.; and we are happy to learn that his Majesty the King of the Belgians has liberally commanded to be forwarded his proxy for 100 votes. Under such illustrious patronage, we trust that a "happy port and haven" may be secured to the poor artist, whose la bours in the minute have, we regret to say, very considerably impaired his sight.

The "Eclair" Steamer.—The officers and crew of the unfortunate steamer Eclair have been gratified by the announcement that they are once more permitted to have free intercourse with the shore. The yellow flag has been hauled down on board the Eclair, and the several hulks appropriated for her sick and convalescent. Several of the officers have already availed themselves of their pratique, and been visiting their friends at Sheerness. It is expected that the Eclair will be paid off immediately. There are yet several on her sick list suffering from the effects of the fever, but all who are unable to be paid off will be sent to Melville Hospital.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1845.

THE alarming reports as to the state of the potato crops in Ireland still continue to be made, though even now there is a degree of contradiction in the rumours. Certain it is, if we may take the declaration of the Lord-Lieutenant, that the Government do not consider that they have as yet received sufficient data to act upon. It is still making inquiries and receiving reports from local agents, which we trust will even now prove that rumour has exaggerated the evil. In the meantime, it is as well to be prepared for the worst, and we are glad to see men of different parties in Dublin uniting their efforts in an attempt to ward off the effects of that saddest of afflictions in a poor country—famine. It is probable that the more exacting of the Irish landlords will be shamed into something like liberality by the example of their better-disposed brethren, and that, under the eye of a watchful public press, if relief should have to be given in money, or food, neither will be made the subject of such sordid jobbing and peculation as common report gives out was the case on former occasions.

MR. DAVID SALOMONS has individually exhibited his gratitude for the removal, last Session, of one of the civil disabilities that pressed on members of the Jewish persuasion. It was a technical defect in the law that was amended, rather than an actual disability intended to be imposed by the law; it was an error and an oversight similar to those committed in drawing up hundreds of other Acts of Parliament, and which are only discovered when the Act is tested by being called into operation. The principle of admitting Jews to take civic offices had been admitted long ago; a Jew could be the Sheriff of a county, but not of a city, if a certain declaration was enforced before taking office; where it was omitted, he might discharge all the duties of the office, and be relieved from all penalties attending such omission by the annual Indemnity Act. Such was the explanation given by Sir Robert Peel, when he introduced this defect or anomaly; the credit of making such an Act necessary, by insisting rigidly on a doubtful interpretation of the former law, of the spirit of which there could be no doubt whatever, belongs, we believe, to the Corporation of the City of London. The question is now placed beyond quibbles, and Mr. Salomons, who was the means of raising it, has celebrated the relief given by the Legislature, by an appropriate and munificent gift. He has given a sum, amounting to nearly £2000, to the City of London School, to found an Exhibition of £50 a year, for each of the scholars as may proceed from it to one of the Universities. The thanks of the Court of Common Council, for this gift, have already been presented to the donor: rarely have thanks been better deserved. The amount of the beneficiation recalls something of the munificence of the citizens of olden time, to which the modern tens and twenties given after dinner at the London Tavern, under the influence of good cheer and lordly eloquence, seem poor and mean, in comparison.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK, AND MR. ALDERMAN GIBBS.

A meeting of the half-styled churchwardens and one or two of the ratepayers of the parish of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, took place on Wednesday morning in the vestry-room of the parish church, in order, it was supposed, to adopt some stringent measures relative to their dispute with the Lord Mayor.

The Rev. Dr. Croly having taken the chair, said that the meeting had been called together for the purpose of ascertaining what had been done in legal proceedings with respect to the action that was pending with Mr. Alderman Gibbs.

Mr. Rock thought it might be advisable for them to be a little guarded in saying that which might prejudice the feeling respecting the proceedings now before the Court of Chancery. There were two actions almost certain of being brought to an issue immediately, and if anything unguarded was now said, it might be referred to there.

The Vestry Clerk stated that considerable deductions had been made from Mr. Gibbs's claim upon the parish, but he could scarcely tell what would be the result of the proceedings, though he anticipated it would be in their favour

Mr. Flight had no doubt that the money which had been received by Mr. Alderman Gibbs during the progress of these proceedings, instead of being lodged in the banker's hands, had been employed in law, in order to prevent its being useful to the parish

Mr. Rock then got up and went through the whole history of their dispute with Mr. Alderman Gibbs, and observed, that on making some inquiries about the accounts, he had been told that it was the custom of the Court of Chancery to pass all payments under forty shillings on the word or oath of the person producing the account. Now, as the churchwarden's expenditure was amongst paupers, the distribution of the money would necessarily be in small sums; but he did not think it was sufficient because the payments were under forty shillings that they should pass them.

The Rector then addressed the meeting at great length, repeating what has been before stated, adding, however, that he had not received the amount of stipend for his afternoon lectures for the last three years, nor had the organist or sextoness been paid for the same length of time; and he thought that the state of the church was a disgrace to the parish; at the same time, he attributed it all to the mismanagement of Alderman Gibbs and his accounts.

After some further discussion, Mr. Rock stated that the meeting was at an end, though they had not done what they intended to have done, in consequence of their having been advised by the vestry-clerk to take no further steps in the matter until they knew the issue of the lawsuit, which would shortly be seen.

HER MAJESTY'S APPROVAL OF THE LORD MAYOR ELECT.—On Monday morning several members of the Corporation arrived at the Lord Chancellor's House, Great George street, Hanover-square, when his lordship, in a complimentary speech, said he was commanded to give her Majesty's full and entire assent to the choice the citizens of London had made of chief magistrate for the year ensuing. The Lord Mayor elect was then presented to his lordship, and the corporation retired

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.—For several days past preparations on the most extensive scale for the celebration of Lord Mayor's Day, on Monday, have been going on in Guildhall and the vicinity, and it is expected, from the well known wealth and liberality of Mr. Alderman Johnson (the Lord Mayor elect), that the approaching festival will be one of unusually magnificence; already are the frames suspended for a noble massive suite of chandeliers, and around the walls are a vast number of pendants supporting stars, &c., in jets, by the whole of which will be brilliantly lighted with gas, as will some splendid devices to be affixed at the east and west ends. The flags, armour, and other usual chivalric groupings are also being displayed. The usual scaffolding placed in the upper hall, and thereon are emblazoned, in various coloured crayons, the Royal and City arms, and those of the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, &c., surrounded with elegant scroll and other ornamental devices. A tasteful decoration has been placed in front of the grand southern entrance, and the street barriers are in preparation. The Society for the Protection of Traders from Fraud, of which the Lord Mayor elect is the President, have issued their circulars to accompany his lordship. The Distillers' Company will form part of the procession in the morning, as well as the Spectacle makers' Company, his lordship belonging to both fraternities. The Ironmongers' will preside the Spectaclemakers'. A portion of the Hon. Artillery Company's band will attend this portion of the procession, which will exhibit twenty-one banners. The Master of the Spectacle Company will be present, with the presentation Carroll; the Renter Warden, the Marquis of Downshire; and the Upper Warden, Mr. Clarkson, the barrister.

CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL.—At a meeting of the Court of Common Council, held on Wednesday, was rendered remarkable by a Report from the Committee of the City of London School. The Report stated, that the Committee had "recently been honoured with a communication from David Salomons, Esq., late Sheriff of the City, intimating his intention of investing in the public funds a sum of money sufficient to establish and support a scholarship or exhibition of the value of £50 per annum for the benefit of pupils of the City of London School.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—A report was submitted to the Court of Common Council on Monday by the Chairman of the Improvement Committee, suggesting as the best plan for appropriating the annual sum of £39,500 per year in improvement, the application for an Act of Parliament for forming a street from the south end of Bartlett lane, now called Blackfriars street; and another in the Old Bailey, from the south side of the New Inn to the south side of Prujean-square. The report was agreed to by a vast majority.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MICHAELMAS TERM.—Monday being the first day of Michaelmas Term, the Judges sat in banco for the dispatch of the usual business. They entered Westminster Hall, in procession, at about a quarter to two o'clock, having breakfasted with the Lord Chancellor, at his residence. They proceeded through a crowd of well dressed men and fine ladies, who, for hours, had been awaiting their entrance to the Courts. The new Judges were attired in their robes of state, the Queen's Counsel following, in full bottomed wigs and flowing trains. Soon after their lordships had taken their seats upon the bench, the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Denman, invited Mr. Sergeant Shee, who has obtained a patent of precedence, and Mr. Montague Chambers, recently made a Queen's Counsel, to take their places amongst her Majesty's counsel learned in the law, on the seat on which he sat.

VALLANCE v. THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK.—In the Court of COMMON PLEAS, Mr. Sergeant C. Jones moved for a rule to show cause why there should not be a new trial in this case, or why the judgment should not be arrested. The action was tried, as will probably be within the recollection of our readers, at the last Surrey Assizes, when the jury gave the plaintiff £300 damages for the libels in question. The learned sergeant now sought to set that verdict aside, upon the several grounds of the improper reception of evidence, misdirection, and excessive damages; and he also contended that the judgment ought to be arrested, inasmuch as two out of the three counts in the declaration were bad.—The Court, however, expressed their opinion that there was no ground shown for arresting the judgment, and a so that there was no reason for granting a rule for a new trial with respect to the grounds of misdirection and excessive damages; but, as it might be a question whether the evidence given by Mr. Pearson at the trial, with respect to the character of the plaintiff, was admissible, the rule might go upon that point.

STRANGE DELUSION.—On Saturday, a commission de lunatico inquirendo was opened at Bow-street, at about a quarter to two o'clock, before R. Winslow, Esq., and sixteen special jurors, to inquire into the state of mind of Miss Sarah Caney, a maiden lady, aged eighty five, described as of "8, Cannon street-road, St. George's, Middlesex, spinster." The commission, which was unopposed, and taken out in behalf of the lady's nephew and nieces, was supported by Mr. Warren and Mr. Wilde, and, from their statement, and the examination of Dr. Mitchell, it appeared that Miss Caney is possessed of about £15,000 in funded property, in addition to several houses. About three years since she had become subject to fits of extraordinary delusions, and her manners and habits had been most loathsome and filthy. She knew nothing whatever of the value of her property, and had not received a dividend for more than two years, stating that she was in great poverty. An almost putrid cat, which had been thrown into the area in August last, she fancied was a fine rabbit, and said she would have it cooked. She imagined that Prince Albert had cut off the Queen's toes, from which her Majesty had bled to death, and that the Prince had run off to the continent that the French had taken possession of England, and were marching down her street—that a man was in the habit of coming down the chimney, and taking away her plate and property, and she had consequently had bars placed across the chimney. With this imaginary being she occasionally held conversation. She fancied several men were coming to pay their addresses to her, and for that purpose she sat at the window six hours at a time with a cloth round her head for a turban She had lain in bed for three and four days at a time without tasting food, and her clothes were of the most wretched and filthy description. After the evidence, the Learned Master Jury, &c., proceeded to the residence of the lady, when a scene occurred which baffles all description. The premises contained eight rooms, had all the shutters closed, the windows barricaded, and no less than twenty-seven squares of glass broken in the four lower windows No access was to be obtained in the ordinary way, and entrance was only effected by ladders in the rear, where some men got in and opened the street door for admission. The unfortunate lady, not opening the door after repeated loud knocking for days at a time without tasting food, and her clothes were of the most wretched and filthy description. After the evidence, the Learned Master Jury, &c., proceeded to the residence of the lady, when a scene occurred which baffles all description. The premises contained eight rooms, had all the shutters closed, the windows barricaded, and no less than twenty-seven squares of glass broken in the four lower windows No access was to be obtained in the ordinary way, and entrance was only effected by ladders in the rear, where some men got in and opened the street door for admission. The unfortunate lady, not opening the door after repeated loud knocking for days at a time without tasting food, and her clothes were of the most wretched and filthy description. After the evidence, the Learned Master Jury, &c., proceeded to the residence of the lady, when a scene occurred which baffles all description, she was placed in the hut, in order that he might be identified by the witnesses. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Bodkin appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Ballantyne for the prisoner Maynard. Mr. Clarkson, in stating the case to the jury, observed that the prosecution was instituted by the Directors of the Great Western Railway Company, their object being to recover, viz., to obtain possession of the stolen property, and to find out the guilty parties. In the month of April last a letter was received by the secretary of the company, signed by the prisoner Maynard, in which he stated, that on the payment of a certain sum of money, some of the stolen property would be restored, but he was not prepared to give the name of the person who had instructed him to make this offer. This letter was answered, and an arrangement made that that there should be a meeting between Maynard and the solicitor to the company. Before the day of meeting, however, arrived, several letters passed between the parties, some of which were in the handwriting of Maynard, and the object was to obtain money for the restoration of the property. On the 29th of May he was taken into custody he denied all knowledge whatever of Garratt, which would be proved was quite contrary to the fact. It was at length agreed that the company would pay £20 on the property being given up; however, said the learned counsel, however, for a moment intending giving one farthing, their only object on entering into a negociation being to get hold of the guilty parties). A meeting took place at the Queen's Bench Coffee-house; Maynard was there, but he had not the property with him; he was consequently told it must be produced before the money was paid. He then left the room, and in less than two minutes returned with a letter, in which he informed that two officers were in the house who had instructions to arrest him. He was taken into custody and conveyed to the Guildhall Police office. At that time the principal in the transaction was not known, but under the circumstances there was sufficient to detain him, as no reasonable doubt could exist but that he was aware the property had been stolen, and, therefore, to negociate for its restoration, brought him under the statute relating to receiving stolen property; but it would be shown that he was well acquainted with Garratt, and that they had, for a length of time, been acting in concert. On searching Maynard's house, several drafts of letters were found, copies of which had been forwarded by Garratt to different parties. It would be proved that the two prisoners were acquainted long before the present transaction, that as far back as the month of May they had meetings together, and that money passed between them on various occasions. There were some memoranda of the prisoner also found, that clearly showed they were acquainted; one was found on Maynard's person, headed "Mem. Week to Garratt today."—Mr. France was the first witness called, who stated that on the 23rd July, he was a passenger by the mail train of the Great Western Railway. On that occasion he lost a box containing property to the amount of £7000. —After the examination of several witnesses, Mr. Ballantine addressed the jury on the law applicable to the case of Maynard, but did not call any witnesses.—The Common Sergeant summed up, and the Jury returned a verdict of Guilty.—Both the prisoners were sentenced to be transported for fourteen years.

INCORRIGIBLE OFFENDER.—On Tuesday, John Lee, alias Robert Dalton, was indicted for stealing twenty five sovereigns, four half sovereigns, three bank notes for £5 each, and other moneys, the property of Sarah Walton, in her dwelling house in Camomile-street. The evidence that the prisoner was a lodger in the house of the prosecutrix. On Sunday, the 12th of August, Mrs Walton went to church at eleven o'clock, leaving the prisoner at the desk, in one of her rooms, at one o'clock, she went to the desk, and found that the money had been stolen. At about half past eleven o'clock the prisoner left the house; as he was going, he asked which was the shortest way to Westminster-bridge, and that he had a carpet bag in his hand, and said he should return on the following Wednesday. It was proved that, instead of going to Richmond, he was at Greenwich, where he was seen in company with eighteen or twenty sovereigns; and when he was taken into custody, a chisel was found, which he claimed as his property, and which was found to correspond with the marks on the desk, after it had been opened.—The jury found a verdict of Guilty.—The Recorder having questioned the officer who had taken the prisoner into custody as to whether he had been convicted before, and the answer having been in the negative, that some time since the prisoner had absconded from his father's house with his gig and horse—that he had since been taken into custody on that charge, he was brought to the police court, but that his father had there his father appeared, and, with tears in his eyes, begged he would be let off. This was granted; but, in consequence of the violent threats he used against his father on leaving the dock, the magistrate thought proper to hold him to bail to keep the peace, and in default he was sent to Maidstone gaol for six months. At the end of four months, bail was offered by the prisoner, and accepted on the part of the father as it was then stated that he had subsequently appeared that the bail in question were two notorious thieves. Since then he had committed a burglary in the house of his own uncle, and stole a considerable quantity of property. The learned Recorder having adverted to these facts in his charge to the prisoner, sentenced him to be transported for ten years.

The Court then adjourned to Monday the 24th inst.

IMPROPER USE OF NAMES BY RAILWAY DIRECTORS.—On Monday, at BOW-STREET, Mr. S. Rendall, 11, Clements Inn, solicitor, and Mr. L. Hores, 78, Wimpole-street, Cavendish-square, the registered projector of the "Important Economic Railway Traction, by the Leviathan Air Engine, intended to be adopted by the Shrewsbury, Chester, and Crewe Junction Railway Company, for completing a direct communication between Bristol and Liverpool," appeared to answer a complaint preferred against them by Charles Barry Baldwin, Esq., M.P., that they had printed and published, in a circular purporting to be a prospectus of the project in question, that Charles Barry Baldwin, Esq., M.P., was one of the provisional committee of the company.—Mr. Beavan appeared for the complainant, and Mr. Clarkson on the part of the defendants. The printed prospectus of the company was put in and admitted.—Mr. Baldwin said that on the 23rd of October, the prospectus referred to was sent to his house in Parliament street, in which his name appeared as one of the provisional committee of the Leviathan Air Engine, and he had never authorised any person to connect his name with that undertaking. He should, therefore, not as many as thirty or forty, but there might be as many as ten. He begged to be allowed to say that he had always encouraged railways in Ireland, for which purpose he had given his name to that effect. There were also many foreign ones, about three in France, and in England ten; altogether, as far as his recollection would serve him, about twelve, at the utmost. He had seen a Dr. M'Kenzie but once, from whom he received a letter on the 8th of October, from his residence, at 68, Mortimer-street, inviting him to have his name inserted on the list of the provisional committee, as he had been connected with various railway companies, to which he returned an answer.—Mr. Clarkson: I see, by the newspaper accounts, that when you applied for a summons, you represented that you had repeatedly written to the defendant to remove your name, without effect—Is it true?—Complainant: I did not say so, but I certainly wrote to others that I did not wish my name to appear.—A long discussion ensued, during which, however, nothing particular was elicited, after which Mr. Hall asked the question was, not had M'Kenzie abused the confidence of the complainant, but did the defendants make use of his name against his consent; and supposing that M'Kenzie had acted ill, had the defendant on that account any grounds for holding up the name of the complainant to the public, who were, as a matter of course, anxious to obtain the names of persons of high respectability? It was very clear that on the 8th, M'Kenzie wrote to the complainant, and on the 13th received an answer, that if not too late he might then enter his name on the list. The question then was, did the complainant give his sanction? and he thought from what he did, for he had inserted it in the paper, containing other names with that of the complainant, to the defendants, which precluded them from the possibility of acting knowingly, and ought not to render them liable to the penalty. It would certainly have been more prudent to have had a letter from the complainant himself, although there could be no proof of the handwriting, unless he had recourse to it for the purpose of obtaining a conviction.—Mr. Clarkson applied for costs, which were refused; and Mr. Hall, in dismissing the case, said that he was satisfied the complainant was not sufficiently in possession of the case before he adopted the proceedings, therefore could not be actuated by any wanton feelings towards the defendants, whose characters, he was happy to say, remained untouched.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE RECENT RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—George Maynard alias George Gregory Maynard, aged 47, agent, was placed at the bar on an indictment charging him with feloniously receiving a box, containing stolen property, well knowing the same to have been stolen, and Daniel Garratt, aged 39, labourer, who had pleaded guilty to some indictments, charged with stealing various descriptions of property from the terminus of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, was also placed at the bar, in order that he might be identified by the witnesses. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Bodkin appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Ballantyne for the prisoner Maynard. Mr. Clarkson, in stating the case to the jury, observed that the prosecution was instituted by the Directors of the Great Western Railway Company, their object being to obtain possession of the stolen property, and to find out the guilty parties. In the month of April last a letter was received by the secretary of the company, signed by the prisoner Maynard, in which he stated, that on the payment of a certain sum of money, some of the stolen property would be restored, but he was not prepared to give the name of the person who had instructed him to make this offer. This letter was answered, and an arrangement made that that there should be a meeting between Maynard and the solicitor to the company. Before the day of meeting, however, arrived, several letters passed between the parties, some of which were in the handwriting of Maynard, and the object was to obtain money for the restoration of the property. On the 29th of May he was taken into custody he denied all knowledge whatever of Garratt, which would be proved was quite contrary to the fact. It was at length agreed that the company would pay £20 on the property being given up; however, said the learned counsel, however, for a moment intending giving one farthing, their only object on entering into a negociation being to get hold of the guilty parties). A meeting took place at the Queen's Bench Coffee-house; Maynard was there, but he had not the property with him; he was consequently told it must be produced before the money was paid. He then left the room, and in less than two minutes returned with a letter, in which he informed that two officers were in the house who had instructions to arrest him. He was taken into custody and conveyed to the Guildhall Police office. At that time the principal in the transaction was not known, but under the circumstances there was sufficient to detain him, as no reasonable doubt could exist but that he was aware the property had been stolen, and, therefore, to negociate for its restoration, brought him under the statute relating to receiving stolen property; but it would be shown that he was well acquainted with Garratt, and that they had, for a length of time, been acting in concert. On searching Maynard's house, several drafts of letters were found, copies of which had been forwarded by Garratt to different parties. It would be proved that the two prisoners were acquainted long before the present transaction, that as far back as the month of May they had meetings together, and that money passed between them on various occasions. There were some memoranda of the prisoner also found, that clearly showed they were acquainted; one was found on Maynard's person, headed "Mem. Week to Garratt today."—Mr. France was the first witness called, who stated that on the 23rd July, he was a passenger by the mail train of the Great Western Railway. On that occasion he lost a box containing property to the amount of £7000. —After the examination of several witnesses, Mr. Ballantine addressed the jury on the law applicable to the case of Maynard, but did not call any witnesses.—The Common Sergeant summed up, and the Jury returned a verdict of Guilty.—Both the prisoners were sentenced to be transported for fourteen years.

INCORRIGIBLE OFFENDER.—On Tuesday, John Lee, alias Robert Dalton, was indicted for stealing twenty five sovereigns, four half sovereigns, three bank notes for £5 each, and other moneys, the property of Sarah Walton, in her dwelling house in Camomile-street. The evidence that the prisoner was a lodger in the house of the prosecutrix. On Sunday, the 12th of August, Mrs Walton went to church at eleven o'clock, leaving the prisoner at the desk, in one of her rooms, at one o'clock, she went to the desk, and found that the money had been stolen. At about half past eleven o'clock the prisoner left the house; as he was going, he asked which was the shortest way to Westminster-bridge, and that he had a carpet bag in his hand, and said he should return on the following Wednesday. POSTSCRIPT.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—We are happy to state that Sir R. Peel is convalescent, and, with the exception of a little lameness from the recent attack of gout, is in excellent health.

WINDSOR ELECTION.—WINDSOR, Friday Evening.—The great influence of the Court and Conservative interest has been exerted in every quarter, in favour of Colonel Reid, has been of that overwhelming character, that Mr Walter, by the advice of his friends, commenced the poll a late hour this afternoon, to abandon all further attempts to pursue the unequal contest. The nomination will take place to-morrow; when Colonel Reid will walk over the course.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE OF LADY ADELA VILLIERS.—We regret to state that accounts have been received in town from Brighton, of the sudden disappearance of Lady Adela Villiers, the Misses Villiers, younger children of the Earl of Jersey. The young lady, who is only 17 years of age, left her home on Wednesday afternoon, at a quarter past five o'clock. It was expected that she had retired to her room with the intention of dressing for dinner, but not making her appearance at the table, on inquiries being instituted as to the cause of absence, it was ascertained that her ladyship had some time previously passed through the lodge gate with a small bundle in her hand. Inquiries were made at the railway station, and in every other direction, but no intelligence could be obtained, as no one employed at the terminus had any recollection of any person resembling her ladyship's description going by either of the trains on Wednesday evening. Intelligence of the distressing occurrence was forwarded without delay to the Countess of Jersey, who was then on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, at Arundel Castle, and her Ladyship lost no time in returning to Brighton. Every means possible has been used to trace the fair fugitive, but without the slightest success. The Earl of Jersey and family are at present residing at East Lodge, Upper Rock Gardens, Brighton. This distressing occurrence has caused great excitement in the town. No cause whatever can be imagined as to what could induce the young lady to take such a step. On inquiry in Berkeley-square yesterday, we were informed that no intelligence whatever of her Ladyship had been received by her noble parents up to the present time.—Standard.

DEATH OF THE HON. CAPTAIN LEICESTER.—WINDSOR, Friday.—We regret to state that the Hon. Captain Leicester expired this morning at the Henry Barracks, in Sheet-street, from three bad fever of typhus. Lord De Tabley, his only brother, was with him at the time of his death.

A special meeting of the Great Western Railway Proprietors was held on Friday. The agreement to pay the Bristol and Exeter Company a rent of 6 per cent. until the termination of the lease (three years and a half), and afterwards 6 per cent., was agreed to. The Directors were also empowered to take steps for carrying a direct London and Exeter line.

THE LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—A special meeting of this company was held yesterday (Friday) at the Euston-square Station, to consider the propriety of amalgamating the Grand Junction, Birmingham and Manchester, and London and Birmingham lines into a joint property, to be henceforth called "The Great North Western" G. C Glyn, Esq., the chairman of the company, presided, and said that the present was the second special important meeting they had ever held. In January last, certain propositions were made for an amalgamation with the Manchester and Birmingham line, and since then many opposing lines, styling themselves "d rect," had entered the field; but there was no line that could offer to the public the advantages which the existing lines could afford to give. With respect to the amalgamation with the Grand Junction, it must be a source of great satisfaction to the Directors, as he believed it would be to the proprietary at large. He only regretted that it had not taken place earlier. By it they secured the line of railway communication to Liverpool and Holyhead. Arrangements had been made with the North Staffordshire, and the line to Macclesfield and the Trent Valley, which would be beneficial to all the parties concerned. The Shropshire Union was also in alliance with the Birmingham Company, and the directors had every reason to suspect that by the terms they had secured, success in the next session of Parliament might be confidently anticipated. The Secretary then read the report, after which the Chairman moved that it be adopted, which was agreed to unanimously, as were several others carrying out the objects of the meeting.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE BRISTOL AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—A dreadful and fatal accident happened near to the Stoke station of the Bristol and Birmingham Railway, on Wednesday morning, by which a fireman residing in the village of Stoke was killed. The deceased had been drinking at Stoke Prior, and left that place about eleven o'clock at night to go home, the railway being between the inn and his residence. He was last seen alive by a man named Thomas Davis. He was not heard of again until the accident happened, which was at about a quarter to two o'clock on Thursday morning. At that time the train from Birmingham was due at Stoke, and arrived very shortly afterwards. This train, however, does not stop at Stoke station, and accordingly passed on towards the Droitwich junction. It, however, had not proceeded more than a mile when it saw something white before him, and immediately afterwards, before he could stop, it was felt that something was upon the rail. Accordingly, the brakes were put down, the train stopped, and the driver and guard walked back to the spot where the obstruction was met with. Here they discovered the body of the unfortunate man, whose name is Humphrey Willis, lying upon the rail quite dead, and frightfully injuries, by which he must have been killed instantaneously. The deceased (who was in the habit of crossing the line on his way to and from the public house) had been repeatedly cautioned not to continue such a practice. There seems to be no blame attributed to the driver of the train, who is an old servant on the line. He blew the whistle as usual on approaching the station, and was not proceeding at an unusually quick pace.

ANOTHER MURDER IN IRELAND.—The Irish papers received yesterday contain the following account of a murder at Westport (County Mayo). It appears that about eight o'clock on last Saturday night, as the unfortunate Peter Gibbons was leaving Westport for his residence, near Kilboyne, he was waylaid opposite the Court House, and received a blow of a loaded stick which broke his skull. He lived but two hours after receiving the blow. An inquest has been held by the Coroner, when a verdict of "Wilful Murder" was returned against some persons unknown.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—The Presse has a very dangerous article upon the subject of the disease in the potatoes. It suggests that France ought to "prevent the English from coming and satisfying their hunger at the expense of those gifts which God has reserved for her." In other words, that France should allow her corn to rot rather than sell it for the purpose of alleviating a famine in any part of her Majesty's dominions. The Reforme assigns as a reason for following up the suggestion of the Presse, that provisions, and potatoes more especially, are becoming so scarce in Paris that "the necessaries of life will soon be placed beyond the reach of the indigent." The Princess of Joinville was at Eu, on Wednesday morning safely delivered of a daughter. Her Highness has received the title of Duke de Penthievre.

SPAIN.—Accounts from Madrid to the 30th ult., state that the British Cabinet had formally protested against the marriage of the Infanta of Spain to the Duke de Montpensier.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

We read in an Italian journal—"The health of the Empress of Russia is so deeply affected that her domestics are often obliged to carry her. Two footmen always attend her, with a couch prepared for her purpose, as it was in this way that she was seen to visit several of the monuments in Italy. She has wasted so completely away that little hopes are entertained of her recovery. Her life has been worn out in the midst of fêtes, over which she was obliged to preside, and the recent death of her youngest daughter has given the finishing blow to her health, which for 20 years has never entirely recovered from the terrible scenes which signalised the accession of Nicholas."

A letter from Stockholm, dated Oct. 24, says:—"Deplorable accounts of the results of the harvest are received here. The provinces of Upland, Westmanland, part of Sodermanland, East Gothland, and Calmarsleen, all Gothland, and Oeland have suffered a total failure, and these are the very provinces which used to export corn, but cannot now, not having sufficient for their own consumption. In consequence of this state of things, the price of barley and potatoes has risen. It is expected that the Government will follow up the prohibition to export potatoes. Apart from the potato disease, nevertheless, potatoes are already scarce, because such great quantities have been purchased for foreign countries by speculators."

A correspondent of the Augsburg Gazette writes from the Turkish frontiers that the greatest activity prevails in the Russian ports on the Black Sea, preparatory, no doubt, for the campaign in the Caucasus next year. The numerous Russian ships stationed in the Black Sea will be increased next year by four English-built steamers, the Taganrog, Dargo, Anab, and Iberdanesk.

A letter from Damascus, dated Oct. 10, says:—"On account of the desolate state of the country for miles round us, articles of food have risen in price. I fear we shall have a hard winter this year. We are beginning to hear of distress already. A man was found the other day in the street, selling his own daughter. Being a Christian, he was sent to the Patriarch by Mr. Misb, the British dragoman, who prevented it. The man explained that he was a widower, had two wives, and he wished to sell one of his children to prevent the others from starving."

A Berlin paper contains a Cabinet order upon duelling, signed by King Frederick William, wherein it is stated, that in case of a duel occurring between an officer and a non commissioned officer or a civilian, the principal the bearer or bearers of the message, the seconds, and all persons concerned in the transaction shall suffer the same punishment as that inflicted upon the officers who shall actually have fought a duel, and that in case of the death of either of the parties, the punishment shall be confinement in a fortress for a period averaging from two months to two years; but should death ensue from any unfair practice, the punishment to be death.

It is stated that the marriage of the Archduke Stephen of Austria with the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia is definitively settled. The mission of M. de Nesselrode to Vienna, was for the purpose of adjusting the pecuniaries of this Royal alliance with Prince de Metternich; and as it raised no obstacles, but was at once assented to, after the disposal of some minor considerations, official intimation has been made to the French and British Governments of the contemplated match.

A letter from Hamburg, of the 28th ult., says:—"A steamer arrived here yesterday from London with a large quantity of specie One well known banking house received two millions of marcs banco. We daily expect to see the rate of discount reduced."

A letter from Vienna, 27th ult., states that the Emperor and Empress of Russia will remain about five weeks at Palermo. The Emperor, on his return, will visit Vienna, where he is expected to arrive in the beginning of December

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Constantine, second son of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, is expected at Plymouth, from whence he will proceed to Italy, to see his august mother. His Imperial Highness is Lord High Admiral of Russia, and will come to this country in an Imperial ship of war.

We have received Cape of Good Hope papers to Aug. 27. Preparations were making, by the appointment of the proper officers, to make Natal a British settlement in every respect. The Kaffirs were still pilfering, but no doubt the representations of the farmers would induce Sir Peregrine Maitland again to exert his salutary influence in restraining them. The duty on British spirits imported into the Cape colony, and including French brandy, had been raised by the Governor to 1s. per gallon.

Mr. Bianconi, whose successful industry as a car owner has raised him from the position of a travelling hawker to that of Mayor of Clonmel, has lately purchased an estate in Tipperary for £25,000.

In the evening of the 22d ult., a murder was committed at Berlin on the person of a M. Reith. Two well-dressed men knocked at the door of the house, and, being admitted by the female servant, one of them, who had a pondard in his hand, threatened to kill her if she uttered a cry, and menaced M. Reith in the same way. M. Reith, however, resolutely attempted to disarm the rebel. He was immediately attacked by both villains, and received some wounds, of which he died on the following day. The two murderers then left the house, without, it is said, committing any robbery. On the 26th, two brothers, who are supposed to be the criminals, were arrested in Berlin. The motive for this murder remains a mystery. It was reported, however, in Berlin, that it had its origin in personal dislike from religious differences.

ANTIQUARIAN DISCOVERIES AT LEWES.

In our Journal of last week, we briefly noticed the discovery amongst the ruins of the ancient Priory of Lewes, of the remains of Gundrada, fifth daughter of William the Conqueror, and of William de Warren, her husband, who, according to the best authorities, were interred in the Chapter House of the above religious house. Thence, at the Dissolution of the Priory, the tomb of the pious lady was removed to the church of Isfield; but, it was brought back near its original locality, in 1775, and placed in the neighbouring Church of Southover, where it remains to this day. The entire discovery is of so interesting a character, that we were induced to commission an artist of Brighton, Mr. H. Nibbs, to proceed to Lewes, and sketch the remains and their locality. We have ourselves since journeyed to the spot, and have been much gratified with our visit of inspection.

Strange, indeed, are the changes wrought by time and man's ingenuity; for these relics of nearly eight centuries since have been upturned in a work peculiar to our own times—the construction of a railway; and this by a circumstance purely accidental, and but for which the Relics might have rested for many more centuries. The projected line of railway from Brighton to Hastings, it may be necessary to state, runs through a portion of the town of Lewes, or rather through the grounds of the ancient Priory of St. Pancras; and, although it will not materially disturb the walls, there will yet be a cutting 40 feet wide by about 12 feet deep, traversing in a north-eastern direction from the western boundary to the north-eastern wall adjoining the Mount Field. One of the workmen struck the precise locality, with "the Mount," an artificial elevation, the origin and uses of which are involved in much doubt.

Nearly upon this spot, workmen had, for some time, been removing the earth from the side banks in the excavation of the Priory, without discovering any thing of interest; but, on Monday week, they commenced clearing a driftway on the bank of the west side of the remains of the Priory chapel, on the high ground. During the day, the workmen found a leaden coffin, 5 ft., 4 in. long, containing the remains of a female skeleton, and portions of cerecloth:

cular, supported by cylindrical columns; whilst the remaining arches are of about the 16th century. The edifice was originally of much greater length than at present; for, it terminates with the chancel midway in one of the arches of the later period. The stone window-frames, of various design, some of them very fine, are stated to have been brought from the Priory ruins; but the original bases of the cylindrical columns carry us to the Norman age. The interior has lately been repaired; and in the windows are some good examples of old stained glass, a few fine specimens of yesterday; the emblem of the Trinity, in one of the northern windows, for instance. We are happy to learn that the Chancel is shortly to be restored, and its large altar-window to be displaced by one of appropriate design. Above the Altar is a painting of the Last Supper, by Mortimer, who was a native of Eastbourne; and high above this, filling the gable of the roof, hangs a large but ill-executed painting of St. John the Baptist, to whom the church is dedicated. The roof of the nave, too, has open timber-work. There is a gallery at the west end, with a small organ; and in the south-west corner, is an unsightly wooden inclosure, lighted by one window, and used as a vestry room. Here we saw the remains of the woollen gown of the monk, and a portion of his shoes, already mentioned: the materials of both readily crumbled at the touch.

REMAINS OF

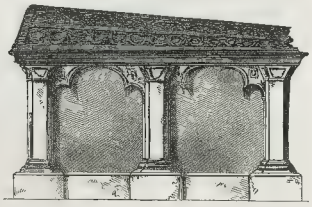
GVNDRADA

The tower of the church was built early in the last century, in place of the tower and steeple, which fell down in 1696. The former bears the date 1714: in its west face is sculptured in stone the shield of the Earls of Warren: in the south, a rose and decal crown; and on the north, in Anglo-Saxon characters, T. A. D. E. (Theobaldus Archiepiscopus Dedicavit Ecclesiam), commemorating the dedication of the church by Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was translated to the see, A. D. 1138. In the ground, at the eastern end of the church, are some massive remains of columns and arches, which may bespeak the original extent of the fine old edifice.



TOMB OF GUNDREDA, IN THE NAVE OF SOUTHOVER CHURCH.

The Relics have been preserved by these means. The land on which the Priory stood, and through which the railway passes, belongs to a lady named Jackson, and who stipulated with the contractor for the railway works, Mr. Wythes, through her solicitor, Mr. Hopar, of Lewes, that all relics which might be discovered should be reserved for her. Accordingly, they have been saved from falling into the hands of persons who might have been unable to appreciate their real interest, but who might have caused them to minister to their cupidity.

On returning to the site of the discoveries, our mind's eye carried us through a vista of eight centuries, as we gazed by turns on the crumbling and fire-rent ruins, and the railway works hard by. Then, too, we felt the true spirit of Mr. Blaauw's concluding reflexions:—"Many a hymn and mass have been chaunted on behalf of the souls of the pious founders of the Priory on the spot where now steam-engines will soon rush across; and, though we by no means wish the masses back, yet it almost requires the iron conscience of a railway to be proof against the curses denounced in his charter by William de Warenne on any who should disturb his foundation. 'May those who oppose or destroy these things meet with God's sword of anger, fury, vengeance, and eternal malediction; but may God welcome in peace with grace, mercy, and eternal salvation those who preserve and defend them.'"

FINE ARTS.

(PAINTED BY HIMSELF.)

The Painter painted by himself!—his eye
  Gleams grandly from a canvass of its own
—Like some immortal Star within the Sky—
  O'er Nations perish'd and thro' ages flown!
Those features are as proudly fix'd as tho'
  Ambition had no dwelling in their brow,
And when young Genius stamp'd its early glow,
  Wore their soul-prowess just as calm as now!

Why beams that living Register of Face?
  And wear those lineaments their look divine?
Bathed in so much of glory and of grace,
  —Like flames that burn on Inspiration's shrine! –
Is it the vanity of mortal life
  Recording beauty with a reflex fair,
Or hath some impulse of the Spirit's strife
  Prompted to fix the strong resemblance there?

Did the fond painter say "my living look
  Shall search the gaze of many a wandering age,
And they shall read his mind as in a book,
  Whose genius burns on art's immortal page."
Or would he leave his features finely limned
  By the weird pencil and the native skill,
To those who keep his lustre all undimm'd,
  Treasure the works and love the master still!

It must have been a burst of loving thought,
  —Even such as that—which made him leave behind
To the art-worshippers his genius wrought
  This noble portrait of his face and mind;
And though he reign on many a loftier throne,
  And fill the realms of colour with his light,
Raphael the mortal liveth here alone!
  Raphael the painter shines thro' day and night!

Oh, not for Fame did he devise this gift!
  His fame hath wings that as the eagle's soar;
He hath a name the world can never lift
  To greater glory than it gain'd of yore.
He fed the lamp of Art with oils that burn
  Through all the dreary passages of Time;
The flames of that imperishable urn
  Illumine ages with a light sublime!

Immortal Painter! still thy works have power
  To chain the heart and bid the spirit bow:
Thine was the triumph of the inspired hour,
  And proudly now we linger on thy brow,
Scanning thy genius—watching lip and eye
  With deep intensity and dwelling pride,
And feeling consciousness too full and high,
  Even as we gaze, that Raphael NEVER DIED!

* This superb Portrait of Raphael at 15 years of age, has lately been added to the Gallery of the Louvre, at Paris: its size is about 22 inches by 17.

RAPHAEL AT THE AGE OF 15.—PAINTED BY HIMSELF.—FROM THE LOUVRE GALLERY.

HONG-KONG.

Intelligence of considerable interest and importance, as respects the welfare of this new Anglo-Chinese colony, has just been received—the details of which will be found elsewhere. At the same time, we have been favoured by a Correspondent with the annexed sketch of the Victoria Barracks. The accompanying account of the present condition of the island has been abridged from the Gentleman's Gazette, a Bombay paper:—

Hong-Kong, "the Red Harbour," is the name given by the Chinese to one of a number of islands called by the Spanish "Ladrones," or "Thieves," from the notorious habits of the inhabitants. It lies about 40 miles, east, from Macao, and is eight miles long, and from two to four miles in breadth. It is separated from the mainland of China by a channel of the sea, which varies in width from half a mile to three miles. The Lymoon Pass is about half a mile across.

The physical aspect is that of a broken ridge of hills, the highest being about 1000 feet, running from N.N.W. to S.S.E, and rising abruptly from the sea, particularly on its northern face, where stands the straggling town of Victoria, four miles long. The vegetation of the island during the rainy season is but small; in the other months of the year there is none.

Its geology resembles that of the south of China—granite rock, hard stiff clay, and red sandstone. On digging the foundations for buildings at Victoria a fetid swell arose, caused by a gas which spreads sickness through the island. There are no marshes to be found, but the heavy rains every year produce a new surface by washing the old into the harbour, which is every year growing shallower from the deposit.

Its climate is variable, and, from its sudden transitions, dangerous to the health of its residents. Situate on the verge of the tropics, there is a dry burning heat while the sun is approaching, and during the rainy monsoon a fearful pestiferous gas is emitted from the hill, which, if it does not produce fever and speedy death, has the result of enervating both the body and the mind. The Chinese look upon it as a "fatal" island, and have left it to be inhabited by the very refuse of their population. The climate produces the most weakening effects on the European constitution, and few English men can expect to live many years after residing there for some time.

Its diseases are endemic fever, diarrhœa, and dysentery. Each European soldier is calculated to pass four times through the hospital in the course of the year. The artillery, infantry, and the crews of the ships stationed there suffer in equal proportion.

The British commander, General d'Aguilar, has declared, that to retain Hong-Kong will require the loss of a whole regiment every three years, and that to have 700 effective men, it is necessary to maintain 1400. The grave yard was soon filled, and another was required from the Surveyor-General, who found it difficult to point out a proper spot

As to its population and progress, the only known facts are, that in January, 1841, it was ceded to Captain Elliot, and great offers were made by him and Commodore Sir Gordon Bremer to induce settlers to go there The floating population, on its being taken, was about 7000 smugglers, stonecutters, and vagabonds, in March, 1842, it rose to 12,360; in July, 1845, it was about 19,000; but of the worst characters from the neighbouring coast of China, for not one respectable Chinaman had come to settle there during the three years and a half of British occupation. The Europeans who dwell there sleep with pistols under their pillows, for their lives or property cannot be considered safe either by day or by night.

The trade at Hong Kong is nought. Ships touch there, but they refuse to break bulk, as there is no native trading craft belonging to that port, and all the respectable traders from the neighbouring ports prefer going elsewhere. The opinion of Dr. Gutzlaff is, that Hong Kong was only of value when all the other ports of China were closed The trial has been given, & if the place was found to be bad, the influence and encouragement of the British authorities, considerable sums have been expended in buildings, which will produce but little benefit, for few will be tempted to dwell, or to risk themselves or their goods, where none but thieves and vagabonds of all sorts will ever resort.

The finance of Hong Kong is a miserable sum; not even sufficient for a small civil government. The only use to which that island could be converted is an opium entrepôt, if no arrangement can be entered into with the Chinese authorities for its importation elsewhere at a moderate duty—a hope which is as yet not likely to be realised.

As a fortress, Hong-Kong is not to be looked upon as a Gibraltar or a St Helena

The religious and social influence of the possession of Hong Kong on the Chinese people may be easily guessed from the character of its actual inhabitants It is visited by none but the lowest vagabonds of the Chinese population, and it is hard to expect that Hong Kong convicts will become missionaries to spread Christianity in the other parts of China.

The cause of the retention of Hong Kong, at the time when the Chinese Government, on signing the treaty with Sir Henry Pottinger, was prepared to make great sacrifices, arose from ignorance of the insalubrity of Hong Kong, and from the belief that Chusan was a most unhealthy spot for Europeans.

The utility of retaining Hong Kong as a British port is, therefore, to say the least, very doubtful. When it was selected by Captain Elliot the sphere of the British commerce in China was small; but now the case is different. Hong Kong, therefore, becomes a pestiferous burden, and not a blessing. There are no sound reasons, either in a military, civil, political, social, religious, financial, or commercial light, for preferring it to Chusan.

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

Whatever may be the case with the Corn and Potato Crops, there is at least no famine in the Article of Gossip, and if Speculation in Railways is not so brisk as of yore, speculation in human affairs generally has a vigorous progress. Tongues do wag continually, and the talk of the community turneth not. November has stepped upon the stage with its cue, and we are beginning to take the consequences of his appearance. The old Almanack-makers used to account him a suspicious dog—ever wakeful of mistrust and doubt. They called him during whose reign,

Though nothing's stolen, every thing is mist

But the damp old dog is merry under all misgivings:—doth he not bring us the feast of Guys, and induct us into the pageantry of Lord Mayors' Shows? Are not little boys now shouting under our windows, Hollo! boys—Hollo! boys—hurra!

And have we not a vision of the City Charger, the Sheriffs' Carriages, and the Mace?

Apropos of Guys—they are a suggestive race of puppets: they involve in the mind's eye the possibility of political and social personations. As for instance—

The Stags who went to Capel Court
And took such mighty heaps of lies,
Might all be well rigged out for sport,
And carried through the town as GUYS!

Directors of all hurahag lines
That dust have thrown in people's eyes,
The ruined gamester now opines
Ought all to be exposed as Guys.

George Hudson is a Railway King,
But he makes cautious use of pelf;
His good example you may bring,
Or he might be a Guy himself.

Windsor election's going on,
We hope that Walter may get in, Sir,
We do adore Colonel Reid
May flourish as the Guy of Windsor.

We believe we may venture to cut the Guys, to record a very creditable anecdote of the Lord Mayor Elect, who is reported to enter feelingly into the prospects of a famine (as what Alderman does not?), and to be incensed, by the contingencies of the moment with a Cobden-like desire to see corn free. It is known that he gave a feed the other day, in honour of his formal inauguration into the Mayoralty. There was a luminous spread—every preparation, and unanimity provided with beverages worthy of the Corsitor Barons. His Lordship, previous to the arrival of the company, went into the Banquet Hall, to see all right. The wines were regrouped and decanted previous to uncorking, and the intelligent head-waiter insinuated to my Lord Elect—"My Lord, here are the Sherries, the Madeiras, the Clarets, &c. Which would your Lordship like us to open first?"

To which his Lordship condescendingly retorted—"Madeiras! Sherries! Clarets! Tut! tut! this is a time of comparative famine, Sir, and the thing speaks itself—open the Ports—the Ports, Sir!"

"Oh, My Lord! I beg your pardon, Sir," said the waiter, "but I thought Government had done that already."

We believe that, during the week, there have been a great many good, honest people, who have participated in the delusion of Alderman Johnson's head waiter: nevertheless, the ports have not been opened, although the feast of Guy has been played, as we described, and a Cabinet Council held for the occasion

The potato malaria, we lament to believe, promises to entail real calamity on the people—and in Ireland, we trust, the gaunt form of famine is already rising from the soil. Four millions of the peasantry may too surely look to starve, if foresight, mercy, and benevolence do not come to the rescue of the poor.

To pass to themes more cheerful the world of theatres has been titivating itself into a costume of gaiety, and there has been some battling among the ruling spirits. Bunn and Maddox have been excitingly charging each other about the copyright of "Le Diable à Quatre," and Adolphe Adam and Julien have been brought into be fray. Their epistolory correspondence is quite picturesque and serious, the pièce de résistance of the Princess' has gone off remarkably well. Bunn, in his own park, tried to change a "Princess into a Deer;" but, the first night, it was shot by the audience as dear as any Stag in Capel-court. Mitchell has begun the French Plays, and polished up the St. James's.

The Overland Mail, by way of Marseilles, reached London only on Monday, being three clear days later than the express of Lieutenant Waghorn by Trieste The papers and letters by this conveyance, afford no news of interest in addition to that given by us last week.

MUSIC.

BALLINI'S "SONNAMBULA" AT FRANKFORT AND LONDON

On Monday night the "Sonnambula" was given at Drury Lane Theatre, a few words previously we heard Balfe's masterpiece at the Frankfort Theatre and, although comparisons are odious, we cannot resist the temptation of pointing out some striking differences in the representation. Frankfort has not the temptation of being one of the first musical towns in Germany, but there is an excellent orchestra, conducted by Professor Guhr, who is a distinguished musician. The doors opened at five o'clock; the "Sonnambula" announced at six, and at half-past eight o'clock Jenny Lind had obeyed the second encore in the finale A clock placed in the centre of the proscenium informed the audience as to the duration of the performance. There was no afterpiece Before nine o'clock the fours uttered a prolonged Oh! ——o—o! At Drury Lane, the house was half empty during the opera, and, except a burst of applause at Allen's admirable singing, it was listened to with the utmost indifference, and not a call was made for any artist at the fall of the curtain. But the two pas of Dumilâtre and Petipas, between the acts, called forth tremendous furore—one, indeed, being encored. Numerically, the English company was much larger than the German one, but there was care and attention bestowed by the latter, whilst in the former, there was apathy and carelessness. The band was about the same in numbers; but, with the marked difference between the Saxony and metropolitan execution under Schira's baton, and the crispness and mellowness under Guhr's vigorous conductorship. At Drury-lane, the wind instruments lazy and false, and the strings scraped, without spirit and animation. The Frankfort singers, on the contrary, all unity and coherence—the violin leading in one school, with a sensible delicacy in the observance of every nuance The perfect training and discipline of a German musical conservatorio is beyond all praise The excellence of the Frankfort choral and orchestral forces, with the genius of Jenny Lind, compensated for the utter failure of the tenor and baritone. Allen and Stretton were unmeaning and inferior to the German representatives of Elvino and the Count. Indeed, Allen's style of singing has so wonderfully improved of late years, that he not merely takes his stand at the head of English tenors, but he would now create a wonderful sensation in Italy He is the acme of Herr Mantius of Berlin, he is equal to any existing German tenor of note. And Allen has gained his position by hard study, for he had to contend with physical defects in his voice at first, but it is subdued, and mind and feeling in style and effect over impaired or inferior organs. We wish we could conscientiously applaud Miss Romer's Amina. When she appeared some years since in this part her natural and artistic acting enlisted the sympathies of audiences. Now she appears to labour incessantly, and her elocution is remarkable for undue emphasis on wrong words. Her former simplicity has been replaced by a stereotyped business and coarseness. In the stupid quarrel scene absurdly announced in the English version of the "Sonnambula," Miss Romer gave to Amina all the airs of a soubrette Jenny Lind does not throw herself on the stage, and drag Elvino in every direction, when Amina is discovered in the Count's room: but the eye of the Swedish prima donna, and not the feet and arms, proclaimed her excess of despair so eloquently, that there were tears even from those who must to be seen to weep One touch of exquisite naturalness is worth a whole scene of conventional stage bombast. We are willing to believe that Miss Romer was out of voice last Monday night, for we have, indeed, regret the decay of her splendid organ, but her intonation was painfully untrue in her opening cavatina She was happier in the finale, although it was taken much too slow: it is a joyous outbreak of Amina, requiring much finish of style, and affording to the well-trained artiste a magnificent opportunity for florid display, of which Miss Romer did not successfully avail herself.

Mr. Wallace's new opera, called "Maritana," founded on the popular drama of "Don Cæsar de Bazan," is underlined for next Thursday, after which Mr. Benedict's new work will be put in rehearsal. We would recommend the manager to increase his repertory by the revival of some standard operas. At present, the bills exhibit weekly a repetition of the "Bohemian Girl," the "Enchantress," &c., which, we fear, now can no longer benefit the treasury.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

We have great pleasure in announcing that the question of the Conductorship of this admirable institution has been definitively arranged by the Directors, and that Signor Costa has accepted the appointment for the eight concerts of the ensuing season. Every true amateur must feel delighted at this decision. The admirable organisation of the Opera orchestra, the work of years, by that distinguished musician, has been the subject of European admiration; and there can be no doubt that his talents will be exercised with a similar result for the Philharmonic Society. Signor Costa, although a Neapolitan by birth, is a cosmopolite in his musical opinions. He reverences the great masters, and he loves melody in whatever country he may find it. In the absence of all bigotry for particular schools—in his appreciation of the qualities of instruments, in his perfect knowledge of orchestral effects, and in his devoted attachment to the interest of his profession—the great qualities of Costa have always been recognised. He has the faculty of attaching the members of a band to himself personally, whilst, at the same time, he is firm and unbending in the exaction of its duties This nomination is calculated to raise the character of the Society, and to excite unprecedented interest for the performances of the season 1846.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The thirteenth season opened last night at Exeter Hall with Handel's Oratorio of "Israel in Egypt." Mr Surman resumed his post as Conductor, Mr. Perry as Leader, and Mr. Miller as Organist. The band and chorus were upon the usual scale, the principal instruments being in the hands of the most distinguished players in the metropolis. The solo parts were assigned to Mr. Arthur, a tenor who made his début at the Ancient Concerts, in 1844, and whose vocal name of Beeson, Miss Rainforth, Miss Messent, of the Royal Academy, Miss M. B Hawes, the celebrated contralto, Mr. Loffler, and Mr Phillips. "Israel in Egypt" is distinguished for its choral sublimities; in no other work has Handel developed them more stupendously. It was written in 1738, and produced the year after—two years prior to the "Messiah." The outpourings of alternate prayer and denunciation on the part of the Israelites and Egyptians constitute the main subject. There are no less than 29 choruses, and only three duets, five airs, and four recitatives. It will be evident that the mighty workings of harmony are the great attraction; and as the amateurs have had frequent opportunities of singing this Oratorio, the choral display is very striking. To Mr. Perry's additional accompaniments we have always entertained a great objection; there is not the slightest necessity for the overdoing of the violins, or so much brass. We must also strongly protest against the interpolation of the two airs "He Layeth the Beams," by Mr. Phillips; and "We are from Ware," by Mr. Loffler. The reason assigned for this departure of Handel is curious; it is, that as the two basso having only one duo in the Oratorio, the singers exact that they shall have a solo each, and, in spite of the necessity of singing This is monstrous tyranny, but it is too true. Miss Hawes had a great reception, and richly did she deserve it, for she is the grandest singer of Sacred Music in this or any other country. Not only is it the magnificence of her voice that enchants the ear, but her fine readings address themselves to the intellectual auditor. Although late in the second part, she gained an encore in the air "Thou shalt bring them in," her devotional interpretation of the Gospel announced.

Mr. H. Phillips, on his return from America, was at first scarcely recognised. He has abandoned his whiskers, and wears a wig. In the introduced air he was coarse in style, and his intonation was defective: but in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," his pristine vocal qualities came out gloriously, and he was called upon to repeat it with Loffler. The chorus is at times wore rather at fault; but in the "Hallelujah" they secured the applause of the house. Mr. Arthur was very nervous, but he has a good voice, and sings well. The duet, "The Lord is my strength," was nicely sung by the Misses Rainforth and Messent. The organ was dreadfully out of tune, and has become a positive nuisance The attendance was most numerous.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The enterprising lessee of the St. James's Theatre commenced the season of those attractive performances on Monday evening. During the recess the house has been entirely repainted and decorated, and is decidedly the most elegant interior in London, whilst, as regards the comfort of the company in the gallery and upper boxes, a very great improvement has been made in substituting a glass chandelier under the gallery front, for the heavy lustre which formerly converted the upper part of the house into an oven. All the appointments are in the best possible taste, reflecting the highest credit upon those who have had the suggesting and arranging of them

The first performances of the season introduced to us M. Lafont, of the Vaudeville and Variétés Theatres; and Mademoiselle Eugenie St. Marc, of the Vaudeville. M. Lafont is well known to the habitués of the Variétés, the theatrical affairs of Paris His is pleasantly styled the Antinous of the latter theatre. His characters generally played by him are those rôles which make husbands jealous and ladies coquettish; whether in the garrison, the village, or the hotel. M. Lafont's representation of the gallant is excellent. In Collé's comedy of "La Partie de Chasse de Henri IV," in which the spectators saw on Monday as the gay King, his reception was very flattering. The play is founded on one of the old story of "The Miller of Mansfield," and the part afforded good scope for M. Lafont's acting. He was well supported by our old favourites, M. Carrigan and M. Leménès; and a débutante, Mademoiselle Heloise, promises to become a most attractive member of the company. She is, we believe, from the small theatres on the Boulevards, the Délassements Comiques. In the little comedy of "La Somnambule," we were much pleased with Mademoiselle St Marc's performance of Cecile. Her countenance is expressive and intelligent, and we are convinced that she will become a favourite with the habitués of the theatre, of whom we are glad to see a very full muster on this occasion. Altogether, the season has opened well; and the announcement of the artistes who are to appear—which occupies one entire side of the bill—gives promise of a succession of well-sustained and attractive performances.

COLOSSEUM.

On Monday evening last we were present at the private view of a new feature in the attractions of this unrivalled exhibition. The whole of the magnificent conservatories, which were, hitherto, closed at night, were most brilliantly illuminated by a number of elegant glass lamps depending from the points of the Moorish roof; and, in the aviaries, some gracefully designed Gothic lanterns, multiplied to infinity by the panes of looking-glass, appeared shedding their light in long avenues, to the termination of which the eye could not reach. The effect altogether was perfectly one of enchantment, completely realising, if not surpassing, all the gorgeous splendour of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. The view of Mont Blanc and the Mer de Glace was also shown under the light of an artificial moon; by which the snow-covered peaks of the Alps were thrown out with singular truthfulness; whilst the natural sky above, with the stars twinkling, gave an air of startling reality to the entire scene. Some effective additions were also made to the view of London by Night, the principal one being the passage of a thunder storm, accompanied by rain, wind, &c. A fine organ has been erected in the circular museum of sculpture; and some of the most popular music, excellently performed upon it, gives increased pleasure to the visitors. It is difficult to find any fresh terms of praise for this beautiful work of art, whichever of its attractions is selected. Every eulogium has been long since exhausted. We can only tell our readers that if they have not visited the Colosseum, they have yet to see the most marvellous exhibition in the world; for such we really believe it to be.

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

RAILWAY CALLS.

Every man in the present day is a holder of shares in a Railway, that is to say, he has got some pieces of paper, called scrip, entitling him to a proportionate part of a blue, red, or yellow line drawn across a map, and designated a Railway. If the coloured scratch runs from south to north, it is generally called a Trunk line; if it "turns about and wheels about" in all directions, seeking to nowhere on its own account, but interfering with every Railway that does, ten to one but it is a Grand Junction; and if it lies at full length along the shore, it is of course a Coast line. Trunk lines are generally the best, because the word trunk naturally connects itself in the mind of the public with the idea of luggage, and a good deal of traffic is consequently related upon Grand Junctions are good speculations, as troublesome customers are likely to be bought off by larger concerns, which would consider them a nuisance; and as street musicians generally expect a consideration for moving on, a Grand Junction may ask a good price for taking itself off from an old established company. As to a Coast line, it is usually thought to afford an opportunity for boasting of the support of the Government; and certainly, in case of an invasion there might be the traffic of a few troops, though otherwise it does not seem very likely that the Government would want to keep sending the soldiers up and down, for the mere sake of the sea-air by the side of the water.—Cruikshank's Table Book.

NOVELS, WALL PAPER.

We have some idea of establishing a literary house-agency for supplying builders and others with intellectual wall paper, at the cheapest rate, from rural essays for the parlour, to romances for the bed rooms, and polite literature for the butler's pantry. We would undertake to paper a six roomed house complete, with a ghost story for the two attics, a sketch of character and a comic song for the two best bed rooms, a series of charades, in sets of three to the yard, for the sitting-room, and for the kitchen a romance of real life, to be called the "Scull of the Scullery, or the Fatal Kitchen Stuff" We contemplate inserting in the Times an advertisement to the following effect, in order to get together an efficient staff for our new speculation:—"Wanted, a number of persons in the literary line, to whom constant employment and good wages will be given. A few sentiments, handed in required at once, Poets accustomed to fiction may find this advertisement worth attending to. Poets treated with on liberal terms, either by time or piecework, or at the rate of so much per poem, couplet, or stanza. There is a vacancy for a pupil in the ethical department. A good price given for ready-made maxims adapted for bordering. Jokes purchased by weight or measurement, in quantities of not less than a hundred.—N.B. No punster need apply, as it is the determination of the proprietor to keep the concern respectable."—Cruikshank's Table Book.

SPAIN.

A peculiar interest, in connection with the Peninsula, must ever be cherished in Britain. The sea around her rocky coast, from age to age, from the times of Drake to those of Collingwood and Nelson, has been the field of naval victory, and a home of glory to "the dog that bravest a thousand years the battle and the breeze." And in high rivalry, the land, along its plains, and streams, and mountain passes, has been witness to British triumph, from the days of the heroic Edward the Black Prince, to that of the mournful honours of Corunna, hallowed by the ashes of Moore—and of the dazzling career of Wellington, advancing from conquest to conquest, by Talavera, Busaco, Salamanca, and Vittoria, to all at length the heights of the franchised Pyrenees were crested with the victorious banners of Britain.—North British Review.

STEAM IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

As soon as the traffic of the islands to goods and passengers can support the expense, an iron steam boat of say 300 tons, with a light draught of water, would be a great improvement. It would pay well and economically managed, it would not pay at the present moment. It would do away with the necessity of two or three small vessels, at present kept for the use of the King and Government, and would at length the facility of procuring, for certainty and quickness of passage, increase that transportation. A visit to the great volcano of Kilauia, in Hawaii, and a tour amongst the islands, would become more fashionable than at present—the prices of provisions and labour would be equalised the knowledge of every local improvement would be extended, and the efficiency of Government would be greatly increased, by the more prompt propagation of the laws and transmission of its orders.—Simmonds's Colonial Magazine.

THE GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The new "Catholic Church of Germany" has begun in the same circumstances as the old Reformation of the Sixteenth Century; nay, the very Pope that presided at the Reformation Diet of Worms is the cause of the present movement. This is a curious coincidence, and may well be claimed as an omen of success. A wild, semi idolatrous superstition, authorised by the heads of the church, has aroused Rouge, as similar abuses aroused the mighty monk of St. Augustine before him; and the very Leo whose indulgences and bulls rent asunder the Christianity of the north and south of Europe three hundred years ago, is the Leo whose special indulgence of 1514 was published the Autumn of last year at Treves, to guarantee forgiveness of sins to the pilgrim worshippers of the Sacred Coat, and the pilgrim contributors to Treves Cathedral.—Dublin University Magazine.

PALANQUIN TRAVELLING IN INDIA.

A palanquin is something like a couch, with light wooden sides and roof; and the easiest position in it is lying at full length. In fact, as you never travel during the day, you always undress, and make yourself comfortable in your dressing-gown You have eight men (bearers), four of whom carry you at once, two before and two behind; and the other four run alongside, and take their turn about every few minutes. Your servants travel in lighter conveyances than a palanquin, and have four men each. Then your clothes are packed in square boxes of equal size, and one is fastened to each end of a stout bamboo, which is slung over each man's shoulder, and he keeps up with the rest. Then, to complete your luxuries! a man with a long torch in one hand, and a bottle of most dreadful oil in the other, keeps quite close to your palanquin, in order to give light to the bearers; so you have the comfort of the smoke and the smell the whole night; and if you meet with no obstacles, and your bearers are strong, you go at the wonderful rate of three miles an hour, or perhaps even four! The whole set is changed every seven or eight miles. Another necessary attendant on a journey in this country, is a native horseman (called a Sowar), whose business it is to keep all your bearers together, to see they do not put down your boxes, or run away with them, to make them go fast, &c. &c. So he gallops backwards and forwards, and with the most civil intentions, sends all the dust into the palanquin, generally understanding half what one says as these Sowars are servants of the native princes in the neighbourhood and have not much to do with the English.—Dublin University Magazine.

HORSE RACING.

The conditions of horse-racing, as regards its fundamental arrangements, are precisely such as they were three quarters of a century ago. In '76 there were six nominations in the St. Leger; for '46 there are nine hundred and twenty-six. The same system of management being applied to both. In '76, it is more than probable, somebody knew something of the animals engaged, in '46, it would probably discomfit the bench and the bar of the kingdom to identify one whose birth, parentage, and education it might be convenient to surround with obscurity. Last year Westminster Hall was for days in labour before it brought forth the real Running Rein; and there was the Solicitor General proved round-sum of obstetrics, it might have been a still more difficult case had not the patient—that is the defendant—ministered to himself, and thus saved the Court of Exchequer any further pains.—Sporting Review.

ELECTRICITY, MAGNETISM, AND LIGHT.—At the meeting of the Royal Institution on Monday, Mr Faraday, the Fullerian Professor of Chemistry, announced to the members present, that in the prosecution of his researches in electricity and magnetism, he had succeeded in obtaining experimentally what he had long sought for—namely, "the direct relation of electricity and magnetism with light." The details of his experiments, which exhibit the magnetization of light, the illumination of the lines of magnetic forces, and a new magnetic condition of matter, will be presented to the Royal Society immediately; but the public institution of the several phenomena will be deferred till the approaching evening meetings of the members of the Royal Institution.

Sir James Emerson Tennent arrived at Alexandria on the 7th ult., by the Great Liverpool, on his way to Ceylon, but will remain some short time in Egypt to visit the upper country, and also, as it is rumoured, to endeavour to make some final arrangements with the Viceroy respecting the transit of the English mails and passengers through Egypt.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We are truly gratified and flattered by the interest manifested among all classes of Chess Players for the success of Mr. Staunton's projected version of M. Heydebrant's great work. Suggestions, many of them most serviceable, and proffers of assistance in the laborious undertaking from parties ably qualified to render it, continue to pour in from every quarter. In reply to numberless inquiries concerning the degree to which Major Jaenisch's unrivalled "Analyse Nouvelle" will be made available, we take the opportunity of saying that no deviation of importance between these two distinguish d writers will be passed unnoticed, and that every point in which they may be at issue with each other, o with their able contemporaries in the same walk, Henry, Lewis, Cato, and Sube schonek, will be explained and commented upon, not only by the translator, but by the authors themselves, with whom he is in communication on the subject: so that the new translation will, in fact, contain all that is valuable in the published works of Heydebrant and Jaenisch, and much, in the shape of corrections and improvements, which they have originated subsequently.

* Problem No. 92.—We have received a communication from Mr. Bolton, expressive of his deep regret and vexation at finding that, in the Diagram he forwarded, and which appeared in our Number of the week before last, the checkmate may be postponed beyond four moves. The position is now undergoing a full scrutiny, and will be presented in an amended form hereafter: in the meantime, we beg, on our own part and in the name of our respected Correspondent, to apologise to the Readers of this Department for the trouble we have unwittingly occasioned them.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The most important and most popular of our National Sports has come to a conclusion—the racing season of 1845 has ended. Taken as a whole, perhaps, it was as brilliant an anniversary as the turf has known. It was productive of a great deal of sport: it gave evidence of the public taste everywhere being on the increase for the boon business of the course, and it witnessed the first appearance of some of the most dashing defiants the ring has been since the days of Mellish. It is a pity the mysterious story of the Irish Baron should descend, with its words, to posterity. Whether its designs were "wicked or charitable," they were not such as ought to have been framed up with British chivalry. Had it en known that the winner of the St. Leger had passed into fresh hands previous to the Caunewitsch, he, most probably, would not have stood the market, as he did, for double events, and what not. And why was it kept secret? Why was there a juggle about it?

"There be no tricks in plain and simple faith," says Shakespeare: the shadow of suspicion should not attach to the conduct of those who are allowed the privilege to say nothing of the profit—of associating with the big fat in station and consideration of the land, in their engagements of honour. Let us believe all concerned right in Mr. Watts's horse, were, one and all, honourable men, still the affair was not a pleasant one: it was not according to the spirit of the turf practice of those whose connection with that sport have won for it the countenance and the confidence of persons of probity and substance. Let us, therefore, have no more untoward events of the kind, and let not racing accounts be regarded in the same category as tailors' bills, to be settled three hundred and sixty-five days after convenience. Above all, let not the present indifference of default be persisted in: the least we may ask of gentlemen is difficulties, is, that they Boldly proclaim that pay they won't—or can't—

And liquidate at once—or else lament.

While all the world is canvassing the effect of the railway panic upon the "bulls" and "bears," one hears nothing of its operation upon fox-hunters. At this instant railroad crisis, how fares it with the chase? There is a story, as old as the hills, of the late Earl Spencer's huntsman, the famous Dick Knight, who, overhearing some philanthropic observations of his master about the ruin of the nation—(it has been utterly and irretrievably undone three hundred times within our own experience) exclaimed, with a sigh, "Ay! they ruined the country when they made the Oxford Canal." The annihilation of fox-hunting was foretold as a certain consequence of railways: up to the present time, has a single accident occurred to hounds, horses, or hunters, arising out of any line in existence? Certainly not of any account.

Should railways ever come to pass, to use an expression of the author of "The Noble Science," the face of our island shall resemble a grid-iron, then indeed an excursion in search of a day's sport with hounds would probably be as vain as one after the pestiferous: but, so far as railroads have gone, and as we think they may go, they afford facilities for the fellowship of sport that the disciples of landcraft never even dreamt of in by-gone times, and facilities for enjoying it unknown to our forefathers. Before the project of cutting railways was attempted, the vicinity of the metropolis of England had become anything but an agreeable hunting district. We saw the huntsman of a suburban pack, a few seasons ago, made prisoner, shut up in a barn, and there confined with a chevaux de frize of pitchforks presented against his bowels till he paid a heavy ransom, and the moiety of his field marched before a magistrate, at a suit of trespass; and, to say truth, they did ride ruthlessly among pleasure bowers and melon frames—and how else could they do? People tell you, England is one entire garden: it's certainly nothing but villas, vegetables, parterres, and plantations, in a circumference of twenty miles, measuring from St. Paul's. Therefore, is it not a real blessing that a man can put himself, and his red coat, into a first-class carriage at the London and Birmingham, and his hunter into one of its flying boxes, and, having breakfasted in the parish of St James, find himself, before the Pytchley, at one of their best meets?

This, the railway system now enables him to do at his leisure; next week we propose to show how it may most conveniently be turned to that account. In the meanwhile, summer having set in with the first of the present month, hunting is at a stand still, between the prevalence of dust—and violets. Coursing is not yet "in perfect season," so we hold our pens touching those unlucky leverets which are cut off beneath the fervid sunshine. The only sport just now in the ascendant is every-shooting: at pheasants, in the country; at pigeons, chiefly at the fashionable watering places.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY.—The present state of the market is far from healthy, two or three parties (one of them a City official) having disappeared, and others having suffered so much from the panic, as to be what is vulgarly termed "hard up." We hear that a public announcement of its absentees will be made in the course of a few days. The following quotations are governed by business actually transacted this afternoon, but in small amounts:—

FATAL EXPLOSION AT LIVERPOOL.

Last Saturday evening, an alarming explosion of gunpowder took place at the shop of Mr. Richard Jones, ironmonger, Dale street, Liverpool, which not only seriously injured Mr. Jones himself, but caused the death of his shopboy, John Buckstone, and more or less injured several other persons, besides causing a devastation of property to a considerable amount.

The explosion took place at that part of the back of the shop where what is called a treble canister of powder was kept. This canister consisted of three divisions: the first division contained fine powder, the second coarse powder, and the third dust powder; and when full the contents would weigh from 10lbs. to 15lbs. It is the opinion of the shopman, Mr. Evan Pugh Davis, that the division containing the dust powder was not full, and that a portion of the contents of the other two divisions had been spread at the time of the explosion, but that the canister probably contained about 8lbs. or 10.bs. There were between 16lbs. and 8Lbs. of powder also in the window, and when the fire was communicated from the canister to the powder in the shop with a second explosion took place. Both the explosions are described as being tremendously loud.

Almost all the houses to a considerable distance round Mr. Jones's were shaken by the explosion, but the house which sustained the greatest injury was that occupied by Mr. Daly, baker, on the opposite side of Dale street. His shop window was smashed, Mr. Daly's shop-scuttle, which was carried across the street from Mr. Jones's, and driven through the sash. The house in which the explosion took place sustained, of course, the greatest damage of any in the neighbourhood. The entire front of the premises in the shop with a second explosion took place. Both the explosions are described as being tremendously loud.

At the time the explosion took place there were four persons in the shop, Mr Jones himself, two shopmen, Mr. Davis; his errand boy, Buckstone, and a lad who had come in to buy a penny worth of powder.

Mr Jones was literally blown through the window into the street by the force of the explosion.

Buckstone and Mr Jones were immediately conveyed to the shop of Mr. Samuel Potter, surgeon, of 76, Dale street, where their injuries were examined, and where, we regret to say, those injuries were found to be of a very alarming nature. Mr. Jones's face presented a very black appearance. Very faint hopes are entertained of his recovery. The shopboy, Buckstone, after much suffering, died on Monday morning. The lad was not much injured.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

LORD MONTAGU.

Henry James Montagu-Scott, Baron Montagu, of Boughton, in the county of Northampton, was the second son of Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch, by his wife Elizabeth, only daughter and heiress of George, Duke of Montagu. Henry, Baron Montagu succeeded as second baron the 28th May, 1790; he married the 22nd of November, 1804, Jane Margaret, daughter of Archibald, first Lord Douglas, of the blood of the great Montrose, by whom he leaves issue four daughters—Lucy, married to the Earl of Home; Mary, married to Col. F. Clinton; Jane; and Caroline, married to George William Hope, Esq.

Lord Montagu was a Tory in politics; in private life he was greatly esteemed. He was the friend and frequent correspondent of Sir Walter Scott, who always spoke of him in strong terms of respect and affection. His lordship was Lord-Lieutenant of Selkirkshire, and Keeper of Geddington Chase. Lord Montagu died on Friday, the 30th ultimo; as he leaves no male issue the title becomes extinct.

The late Lord Montagu was, on the male side, a son of the great house of Buccleuch, and, through his mother, descended from the Earls of Cardigan and the Dukes of Montagu. George Brudenell, fourth Earl of Cardigan, on espousing Mary, daughter and co-heir of John, second Duke of Montagu, assumed the name of Montagu, and was, on the demise of his father-in-law, and the consequent extinction of his Grace's honours, created, the 9th November, 1766, Marquis of Montchermer and Duke of Montagu. This Duke's only son died during his father's lifetime; and his Grace's only daughter, Elizabeth, was, as we have stated above, the wife of Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch, by whom she had two sons; the elder was Charles, fourth Duke of Buccleuch, father of Walter, the present Duke; and the younger was Henry the Lord Montagu recently deceased. Lord Montagu acquired the peerage thus:—The last Duke of Montagu, on the decease of his son, obtained a revival of the Barony of Montagu of Boughton, by letters patent, with remainder to his younger grandson, Lord Henry. His Grace died in 1790, when the barony passed according to the limitation.

MAJOR-GENERAL BREDIN.

This gallant officer entered the army as a lieutenant in the Irish Artillery on the 9th September, 1794, and, at the Union with Ireland, joined the Royal Regiment of Artillery, in which he acted until his promotion to the rank of Major-General, when he retired on the 23rd Nov., 1841. Major-General Bredin was a distinguished soldier, and received a military reputation during the late war. He was at the capture of Grenada, St. Vincent, and St. Lucia, and saw and shared in much hard service during the Peninsular campaigns. General Bredin died on Wednesday the 29th ultimo, and was buried in Plumstead churchyard, on Saturday, with the usual honours of unattached military officers of his rank.

SIR GABRIEL WOOD

This gentleman was the second son of Gabriel Wood, Esq., a merchant of Greenock, by his wife, a Miss Stuart, who was a descendant of the Stuarts of Castlemilk, baronets. Sir Gabriel was born in 1767, from 1796 to 1806 he was Vice-Consul at Maryland, and afterwards proceeded to the West Indies, as Commissary-General. In 1811 he repaired to the Mediterrnean, where he remained for five years, and was afterwards appointed Commissary-General of British North America, where he served upwards of six years, and then retired on account of ill health. When he returned to this country in 1825, he received the honour of knighthood from George IV. The same year Sir Gabriel married the eldest daughter of the late General Fanning. Sir Gabriel died at Bath on the 30th ultimo, in the 78th year of his age.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO LINCOLN'S INN.—The incident of the barrister throwing his gown in the path of her Majesty, noticed in our Journal of last week, was not merely an act of loyalty. It appears that some unlucky wight of a waiter, had let fall on the floor of the Hall a bottle of Champagne just before the Queen retired: and there not being time to gather up the broken glass, the young barrister threw over it his gown, and thus the Royal visitors passed on unhurt.

CABINET COUNCILS.—Cabinet Councils were held on Friday and Saturday (last week); another Council was held on Thursday last. Some of the papers had an announcement of a Cabinet Council on Monday, but no notice of it appeared in the Court Circular. There appears to be an attempt in some quarters to found all sorts of exciting rumours upon these Cabinet Councils. The rumour of an intention to open the ports for foreign corn, duty free, is not confirmed. Another report raised by alarmists, is, that Parliament will be summoned immediately. It is only necessary to observe upon these reports, that if Ministers intended to adopt any step of this important character, it is not likely that they would allow the intention to transpire so premature.y.

THE DOWAGER MARCHIONESS OF BREADALBANE.—By the will of this distinguished lady, her son, the present Marquis of Breadalbane, has acquired a large addition to his fortune. Her ladyship's will was recorded in Scotland on the 6th ult., and has been proved in England by his lordship, the sole executor; the personal estate in England is sworn under £120,000. Her ladyship has bequeathed a legacy of £6,000 to the Earl of Lauderdale, in testimony of her sense of the very valuable services which his lordship had rendered to the Breadalbane family. With the exception of such legacy, her ladyship has left the whole of her personal estate to her son, the present Marquis, absolutely. The will was made in Scotland in the year 1844.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—We regret to state that during the week ending Saturday, November 1, there has been a great increase in the number of deaths, as compared with several previous weeks. The total number was 948, exceeding that of last week by 174. The increase has taken place chiefly in contagious diseases, and those of the lungs, and other organs of respiration.

ECONOMY OF A MAN-OF-WAR.—H.M.S. "COLLINGWOOD."

In No. 151, of our Journal, we gave a fine Engraving of this truly magnificent specimen of improved naval architecture. We now add the series of Illustrations (three) presenting to the interior economy of the vessel, which will be especially interesting at the present moment, when points of nautical skill are so extensively discussed. For convenient reference, we shall arrange our descriptive details in order to correspond with the succession of the Engravings.

SHIP'S CUTTERS OR QUARTER BOAT.—There are two of this sort, generally called the first and second cutters. They are suspended over the quarter on either side of the ship, for the purpose of being quickly lowered into the water in case of need. They are light boats, and are generally employed in conveying officers on duty, messages, and in the various duties incident to the ship. There are also attached to the ship five or six other boats—as the Barge, or captain's state boat; Pinnace, a boat generally used in conveying stores and water when out of England; Yawl, about the same size, and for the same purpose; a Jolly Boat and Gig, two light boats; also the Launch, or long boat, which will carry eight tons of water. Whenever this boat is hoisted on board, it is considered necessary to take all possible care of the stores and stock. When any one has been remiss in providing for all his wants, and wishes to borrow from his neighbour or messmate, the answer usually is, "I can't; don't you know the long-boat's in, you gulpin?"

SICK BAG.—Or hospital, is generally on the starboard, or right-hand side of the ship, forward. This part is solely under the charge of the surgeon and his assistants; and in well-regulated ships it forms a separate establishment of its own, and its extras are supplied by a general subscription fund from the captain, officers, and crew. It is not interfered with in any way, save for the purpose of cleaning in the morning, which is superintended by the mate of the main-deck; he makes his report to the executive officer who reports to his captain, and when this inspects the sick and every other part of the ship with the most minute scrutiny.

MESS TABLE.—Between each gun on the lower-deck is a table about 12 feet long, and 3 feet or more wide, known as the Mess Table. It is generally roofed by a moveable pin in a hinge to the side of the ship, and suspended from the deck overhead by slings or ropes at the outer end, so as to be capable of being removed in an instant, such as done when the ship is cleared for action. The Mess Tables are then conveyed to the orlop-deck, and, being without legs or frame, are placed over the cable, and form a platform or bed for the wounded men when dressed by the surgeon. On these they must remain until the battle is over, and their hammocks or beds can be obtained, or cots can be slung for them. The officers, in general, abandon their cabin and mess-place for the accommodation of the wounded, and are content to put up with every kind of inconvenience to contribute to the comforts of their brave companions in arms. It should be observed that a mess is generally composed of 8, and sometimes 12 men; and there are generally located between each gun 30 men. They have also stools or forms to sit on, the legs of which can be taken out for the better convenience of stowing away. The messes are all numbered, generally from 1 to 80.

WARD-ROOM.—This is the dining-room and drawing-room of a certain class of officers, and is in the after-part of the main-deck. Here are located the commodore, lieutenants, master, marine officers, surgeon, purser, and chaplain. It is fitted with dormitories, or cabins, on each side, and these are furnished by their occupants generally in a style of exquisite neatness and taste.

SICK BAY, OR HOSPITAL.

LASHING THE HAMMOCKS.—Lashing is a term used among nautical men. To lash or secure the booms, spars, or boats, is to wind rope round them to the "sides," or other fastenings, so as to secure them from moving about, unless unlashed, which means to untie. Our engraving gives an excellent idea of the busy scene on the "gun-deck," when the sailors are making their beds for the night.

CAPSTAN.—The Capstan is an instrument of great power, and has two drum-heads, one of which only is used at a time. To each drum-head are from twelve to fourteen spaces, in which are fixed an equal number of bars or levers of fourteen or fifteen feet in length, and to which are stationed, in the operation of weighing the anchor, a part of the marines, waisters, and afterguard, amounting to about 112 men, or more, if necessary. To the Capstan is attached, on the lower-deck, a rope of twelve inches or more in circumference, commonly known as the messenger, attended to by one watch of the gunner's crew, and hauled forward by the idlers, as those men are termed who do not keep watch. This messenger is again attached to the cable (which is fast to the anchor, to be weighed or raised up from the bottom), by a species of rope known by the name of "Nipper," which is put on by the fore-top men near the hawse-hole, in the bows of the ship, and taken off by the main-top men at the main hatchway over the cable tier. The "nippers" are held on by the mizen-top men, and carried forward again by the boys of the ship. The men at the laborious work of the Capstan, when weighing the anchor, are generally cheered on by the exhilirating music of the drum and fife executing the popular airs of "Nancy Dawson" or "The Girl I Left Behind Me."

SIX-WATER GROG.—A seaman or marine used to be allowed half-a-pint of rum or brandy, or, in lieu thereof, one pint of wine, per diem; but, when spirits were issued, it was done twice in the day. As for instance: a gill of spirits was issued at dinner-time, to which was added three gills of water, making in all one pint of grog. To this liquid, when the ship had been six weeks at sea, a proportion of lime-juice and sugar were added, making a pint and more of excellent punch. (In some ships, the lime-juice and sugar have been issued by itself, leaving the men to use it at their discretion.) But, when the men have abused the use of this beverage by frequent acts of inebriety, it is the custom to give six-water grog instead of three, thus inflicting a sad punishment on poor Jack.

STEM OF THE SHIP.—This is the fore part of the ship, to which the planking of the bows is fastened by the "gammoning" and "bobstays" —nautical terms for ropes and lashings.

THE BOATSWAIN'S MATE—Is a petty officer, whose duties are similar to those of a sergeant of soldiers. He carries a whistle or call as a badge of his office; it is blown to excite attention, and by it many manœuvres are put into practice, and particular sounds indicate particular movements:—First, a long whistle means to hoist; then there is another to stand fast, or stop; then another to lower; and many others too tedious to describe; but all of which are well understood by those who are carrying on the various movements in hand. The Boatswain always attends at the gangway when the captain or admiral comes on board or leaves the ship; and gives a long shrill whistle when the bowman of the boat tosses his oar, and repeats it again when the captain sets his foot on the deck, and is received by the officer in command as well as by all the officers on board. This is considered a mark of great respect. The Chief Boatswain's Mate performs the same office to the commander and lieutenants. It is merely a mark of respect, but it apprises the crew that officers of distinction are coming or going, as the case may be, and generally causes silence and attention.

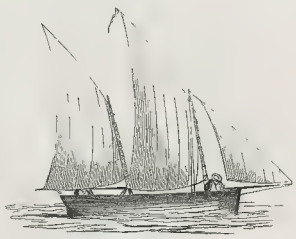
BOATSWAIN'S WHISTLE.

WEIGHING AND WORKING.—In well-regulated men-of-war the crew are so disposed of, or stationed, that one watch, or half the crew, are employed weighing the anchor, while the other half are employed in looming and making sail. This is generally practised in open roadsteads, when there is plenty of room, though it generally takes all hands to "cat" and "fish" the anchor, which is of great weight. (In line-of-battle ships about 76 cwt.)

WEIGHING ANCHOR.



SHIP'S PINNACE.

LOWER DECK GUN.—This is one of the guns of the principal battery of a line-of-battle ship, and is generally of the calibre to receive shot of thirty-two pounds weight. In modern armament are introduced four guns of the calibre of sixty-eight pounds, for the purpose of throwing shells. It will be well if in the course of battle, ships are not blown up by placing live shells amidst the active artillery; for, however careful the gunners may be, it will be next to an impossibility to avoid accidents of this nature with so combustible a material. The thirty-two pounders are generally worked or manœuvred by thirteen men and a boy, as follows:—Two forecastle-men, or prime seamen; four topmen, or able seamen; two afterguard, or ordinary seamen; two waisters, or landsmen; two marines, one mizen-top man, and a boy to fetch powder ("a powder monkey"); they are selected of equal number from each watch, so that when a ship has to fight from both sides, the starboard watch remains with the guns on the starboard side and the larboard, or past watch, on the post side, and are thus designated:—Two captains—first and second; two firemen, two sail trimmers, two pumpers, two boarders or small-arm men, two spongers, and one powder boy. On any other exigency each gun contributes its quota of two men, who are headed by an officer selected for that purpose. As, for instance, a roll of the drum summons the boarder, and each gun supplies two men who are commanded by the senior lieutenant, assisted by the lieutenant of the small-arm men, and by that division of marines always prepared for that purpose.

LOWER DECK GUN.

STOWING OF STOCK.—There is in all ships, between the fore and main hatchways, on the main-deck, a regular fixed sheep pen of two tiers, each about four feet high, and capable of holding 18 or 20 sheep each. One part is appropriated to the admiral or captain, and the other to the officers of the ward-room, the sheep being under the charge of the sheep butcher, who attends them three times a day. When more stock is taken on board, for which there is not room in these pens, the executive officer generally has it placed between such guns on the main-deck as are not likely to be disturbed until the ship goes to sea, and the long-boat, or launch, is hoisted in. The inside of this boat, usually, is then allotted to receive live stock.

SCENE FROM THE BALLET OF "LE DIABLE A QUATRE," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

Our theatrical readers may remember, that in No 159 of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS we noticed the gorgeous fairy spectacle of the "Biche au Bois," at the representation of which we had been present the week before, at the Porte St. Martin Theatre, Paris; and that, whilst bestowing unmeasured commendation on the piece, and its mise en scene, we added that it would not do in London. The result of its production at Drury Lane, on Monday evening, when it was brought out under the English title of "The Princess who was changed into a Deer," has proved our opinion to have been a correct one.

It is long since we have seen a condemnation so entirely and ludicrously brought about as that which awaited this unfortunate burlesque, on Monday. The audience, at the commencement, were quiet enough; but, long before the first hiss was heard, we knew it must come, if the dialogue and incidents did not "pull up" a little.

The earliest expressions of disapprobation were met by vigorous and overwhelming applause; then, as the piece got a little worse, instead of mending, the parties became balanced; and, lastly, the dissentients had it all their own way. And then, very funny indeed did they become, perpetually supplying the jokes which the author, somehow or another, had forgotten to put in the piece. In fact, the two or three last scenes passed in comical dialogue between the actors and the audience. Every speech was eagerly laid hold of, on which an ironical cheer or derisive laugh could be grounded—Mrs. Selby, Harley, and Wieland, being the principal targets for the shafts from the pit and gallery. There was no ill-humour; on the contrary, everybody was highly diverted, and in an amusingly merry mood—that hilarious turn which the disposition of an audience sometimes takes, and which is so very fatal.

The burlesque was adapted by Mr. Maddison Morton. Unless we had seen this printed on the libretto we could not have believed it, looking to the very many hearty laughs we have enjoyed at the pleasant pieces that gentleman has written. It lacked jokes sadly; and jokes or allusions are the life and soul of a burlesque. Other causes, also, contributed to its failure. With the exception of Harley, the cast was lamentably ineffective, and will not bear to be mentioned in any way by the side of that at the Porte St. Martin. Certainly a great deal had been expended in putting it on the stage; but still it was far behind the original in effect. The extreme beauty of detail, and artistic arrangements every where visible in the "Biche au Bois" were no where apparent; and the most splendid scene in the piece as played at Paris—"La Roche Terrible," which formed the eleventh tableau, and was possibly the most remarkable "set" (in theatrical parlance) ever put on the stage—was altogether left out. The best thing in the Drury Lane version was the scene of the fishes; but here again the points were lost sight of. We well remember the roars of laughter at the Porte St. Martin, when the carp moved her practicable eyes and languished at the Prince, before returning the ring he comes in search of.

We fear nothing can be done with "The Princess who" &c. This is to be regretted for the sake of all parties concerned, and especially on account of the expense incurred in its production. We would almost suggest to author and manager the propriety of withdrawing it, until it has been entirely re-written in good burlesque verse, filled with the necessary complement of allusions. This we admit to be an unusual course; but, it is evident that in its present state it will do but little service to the theatre, if any at all.

By the DRURY LANE bills of the week we see that "The Princess who" &c., has been withdrawn, since the above notice was written. It is said that it is the intention of the management to reproduce its most remarkable effects in the Christmas pantomime. In the meantime, Mr. Wallack's opera is in active preparation: and a new grand ballet is underlined, which will bring forward several dancers new to the English stage.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy appeared at the OLYMPIC on Monday, and were received with loud applause. A new apropos farce, "The Railway King," has been successful; and affords to Mr. George Wild and Miss Kate Howard, an opportunity of displaying their talents in the line which experience has proved to be the popular one with the patrons of the theatre.

The bills of the ADELPHI, PRINCESS', and LYCEUM, have remained nearly the same during the week, a proof that the present entertainments are sufficiently attractive. Nor, indeed, are any novelties underlined. The latter theatre closes next week; but at the other two, each of which has adaptations of "Le Diable à Quatre," promises to run on till Christmas. We have engraved a scene from the version at the Princess' Theatre: Mazourka, the basket-maker, employing somewhat more than conjugal coaxing to induce his wife to dance.

SKETCHES OF IRELAND.

KILKENNY.

"Fair Kilkenny," so Spencer styles it, is in the province of Leinster, an inland county. The county is level, but, the soil being very fertile, the prospect is, at all times, cheering.

The first object that strikes the visitor on entering Kilkenny is its famous Castle, the ancient and present seat of "the Ormonds," standing on a small hill that overlooks the river Nore. It has recently been put into complete repair by its noble, respected, and estimable lord; and now, therefore, recalls little of its early history. It is said to have been originally erected by Strongbow; to have been afterwards destroyed by the Irish; and to have been rebuilt, in 1795, by William, Lord Marshal, Earl of Pembroke. In 1391 it came, by purchase, into the possession of James Butler, third Earl of Ormond, in whose descendants it has remained vested—while so many other properties in Ireland have changed hands to the present day.

The principal attraction in the Castle is the picture gallery, 150 feet in length, and containing a fine collection of portraits. From the turrets of the Castle, there is a striking view of Kilkenny, and a magnificent prospect of the winding Nore and the fertile valley through which it flows. One is instantly startled by the singular effect, to be witnessed nowhere else in the world, of a large assemblage of houses, with the usual chimneys, from which no smoke issues; one of the marvels attributed to the city in the old rhyme—

"Fire without smoke, earth without bog,
Water without mud, air without fog,
And streets paved with marble."

The Kilkenny coal gives no smoke; there are few bogs in the vicinity; the streets are literally paved with black marble; and fogs are very rare; and, although the Nore is here as muddy as the Thames at Bankside, a vast number of small streams run into it that are as clear as crystal.

Kilkenny consists of English-Town and Irish-Town—the latter, of course, the more ancient. The oldest part is "the Butts Cross," where formerly the inhabitants exercised themselves at the long-bow, to which they were compelled by several Irish statutes. The present Butts Cross stands on the site of the ancient Butts; and near it was the bull-ring—the scene of a sport once famous in Ireland; or rather among the Anglo-Irish.

In Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall's beautiful work on Ireland, whence we quote the above, it is remarked that there is, perhaps, no city in that country so full of striking and picturesque ruins as Kilkenny. Remains of abbeys, castles, churches, and castellated houses, are to be encountered in every quarter. But, by many degrees, the most important and interesting of the ecclesiastical edifices of Kilkenny, is the Cathedral of St. Canice, an extensive and beautiful pile, founded in the reign of Henry II.. it is cruciform, and ranks next to the Cathedral of St. Patrick, and Christ Church, in Dublin.

Kilkenny has, for ages, been famed in Parliamentary history. The Statute of Kilkenny is an act memorable in the sad legislation of Ireland; but it was never completely executed, save in the county which gave it a name. It enacted that marriage, nurture of infants, or gossiped with the Irish, or submission to Irish law, should be deemed high treason. Any man of English race taking an Irish name, using the Irish language, or adopting Irish customs, was to forfeit goods and chattels, unless he gave security that he would conform to English manners. Finally, it was declared highly penal to entertain an Irish bard, minstrel, or story teller; or even to admit an Irish horse to graze on the pasture of an Englishman! In consequence of the enforcement of this Statute, Kilkenny was sometimes emphatically called "the English County," a distinction which it has long lost.

SKETCHES IN IRELAND.—KILKENNY.

RAILWAY MANIA.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

STOCKBROKER—no longer the last man to go to business—has been compelled, by the Railway excitement, to be an early bird, and seeks his little den with the earliest. No more can he howl to town, at fashionable hours, in his light dog-cart and fast mare, or unblinkered trotter; he may now be seen, amidst a host of his stock-broking brothers, crowding the top of an omnibus—something after the sitting fashion of a batch of Undertaker's men going to a country job—discussing eagerly, and with deep interest, the only topic of the day; and, as the vehicle rolls by you, the eternal word Railway strikes upon your ear as it passes from mouth to mouth, and dies a natural death in the noise of the wheels of other rumbling vehicles: Clapham, Kennington, Brixton, and Wandsworth being the favourite localities of these monetary genii, as they approach the Elephant and Castle. Upon their road, the coachman pulls up just long enough to allow the well-known character, the Irish newsvender, to throw each individual his newspaper, and then bowls on again. The appearance of the omnibus changes entirely; the damp papers, just torn reeking from the press, are unfurled in the breeze, and flutter round and about. They devour, with eager glance, their morning meal of leading articles—quotations of prices—penny-a-line warnings, and notices of fresh speculations—thus priming themselves, on their journey to the great mart, with every information necessary for them to enter fully armed into the arena of business.

The Royal Exchange being the point at which the coaches and omnibuses disgorge themselves of their loads of speculators, they alight like a flight of crows, or any other more poetical birds, and the quiet morning becomes startled with their noise and clamour. Early as they may be, they still find waiters round their offices—from the frightened boy, with his first speculation, to the old man who has thrown away the staff of his age in the desire for gain, and who now trembles as he sees almost certain ruin staring him in the face; these all crowd round them with nervous questions as to how things are. They answer with the coolness of practitioners, with a "very sorry" to one, and a "very glad" to another—unconsciously dealing out death-warrants to some, and unexpected good fortune to others.

These scenes, since the slight panic, have become painful to a degree. Men pass you with smiling and calculating looks, as if they already clutched the Golconda; whilst others press forward, with knit brows, and pale, haggard faces, upon which is written the despair of ruin, apparently unconscious of the surrounding crowd that impedes their dogged course; they are stunned, but they must soon waken—but to what?

Desperate men dash on with a gay air, and revive at every gleam of sunshine in their favour; their minds are made up for the worst; come good, come ill, they are provided. If they play a lucky card, good, they still smile on, and are most respectable; but, should they lose the trick, they are nowhere! To such a pitch has this now arisen, from the frenzy of hope and despair, that many, knowing the suddenness of action necessary in the betrayer and betrayed, carry passports in their pockets, that they may close their hands upon what they have got, in case of failure, and fly.

The settling days are now watched with anxiety and terror, for all men connected with the Railway transactions are fully aware of the rotten foundation upon which the whole affair rests, and the mere chance of the speculators coming to the scratch in case of loss: the Broker, in this case, where he has purchased largely for any of the before-mentioned account days, by order of any speculator, is entirely at his mercy, and—as has been the case the last settling—some highly respectable men have been entirely ruined.

When we look at the grade of people who—not possessing a farthing—have bought and sold thousands within the last few months, the wonder is that the mischief is so little; at present, the blow wavers, but it will be struck—how soon, or how late, the cleverest man of business cannot calculate.

Ladies—even of high degree—have become business-like, and conned with cunning eye the Broker's list, selling and buying; accordingly, many have astonished their Brokers—even in their times of wonderful doings—not only by their early, condescending visits to their offices, but at the constant supply with which their speculation wallets are stuffed of the dear, delightful Scrip. Lucky creatures! all their applications seemed to have met with success: they flew at bold game, and were rewarded; and it is a fact, that, in one or more cases, they have sold, at one and a-half or two premiums, two or three hundred thousand pounds! How is this? that the fair creatures have become so suddenly women of business, with a full knowledge of the most difficult monetary traffic? Is it that the papers are pulled by hidden hands? Brothers, fathers, cousins, uncles, &c., certainly are all Directors of everything they can get to be Directors of: then, how natural is the conclusion that they could not find it in their hearts to refuse the fair applicants; and if they do such things, how natural—for, after all, it is only an insane scramble, where some get the bon bons, some get the kicks, and some get their deaths.

Under the immense load of Railway business, the Stock Exchange—even in its enlarged and improved state—seems too small for the giant Speculation to disport himself in; therefore, men have started a novel and improved safety valve for the Steam giant, that he may have full room for his antics: they sell his magic Scrip by auction! Yes, even by auction! Oh! that Scrip should ever come to be knocked down, like a table or chair seized for rent. Why it loses half its romance; its mystery was its beauty; for what is a Harlequin, Columbine, or Demon Sprite, in the daylight? Why should we wish to be undeceived? Here is the bill of the play:—

Mr. GOING, GONE,
Share and Stock Broker, and Auctioneer!
Will Sell by Auction, at Doom Hall, on the 5th Nov., 1845, and on every succeeding Tuesday and Monday, BRITISH AND FOREIGN RAILWAY AND OTHER SHARES.

TERMS.—Under £20 per Share, 1s.; above £20 and under £50, 1s. 6d.; above £50 and under £100, 5s. This plan will combine cheapness with the advantage of open competition and greater publicity.

Publicity! who wants publicity? Does the elegant lady of ton? Does the apprentice boy, who, to buy Scrip, runs an involuntary collection from his master's customers? Does the sentimental and morally-loving Quaker? or the old-fashioned tradesman, who shakes his head at the dreadful state of business? Yet are they all in it—but they don't say so!

Scrip is decidedly a bashful thing: look how silently and secretly it has deposited fortune at the doors of some, and as insinuatingly crept into the undefiled reticules of the daughters of the aristocracy, and, at the same moment, picked a pocket of its last farthing, with one of its many claws. But this last fact is not to be wondered at, when you consider the company it has kept of late being nothing more or less than that of the greatest thieves unhung, in the shape of blacklegs, stags, and roués.

Publicity, indeed! What will the Lady Stags say to it?—(I beg their pardon—deers they ought to be called by prerogative.)

Then comes in the advertisement, or circular, of another Line, thus:—
"Persons who wish to sell their shares, will oblige G. G. by forwarding their orders as early as possible, that the Lists may be published. Lists, indeed! Do they suppose people will consent to run a tilt to prove the best man, or that a rogue will come out in full brass, with his cognizance on his shield; no, much more like moles, who secretly scratch their way in the dark, hoping to come out safe at the last. The addresses generally conclude thus, viz.:—

"References for integrity and confidence to ——."

Here follows a long list of names of persons who are supposed to know all about the above asserted integrity and confidence; the list is certainly rather long, which is very necessary in these times as for integrity goes, for nobody now trusts anybody: but, as to the confidence no reference is necessary, except to the prospectus.

This is one of the many mushrooms of the times, caused by the unnatural heat and excitement of the whole globe. Men's wits get quickened by the sharpness of the play, and sparks will be emitted. As a person, a short time back, who sat smoking his cigar and vaguely wondering what he should do next, as to his independence and his pressing landlady, found a line in the Railway Act which dragged him out of the Slough of Despond. He saw "that all Railways must be advertised in the county paper so many times before being brought before the House." The county in which he had no paper! Lucky thought! He had no capital, but a capital idea; printing was cheap, paper was cheaper. Hey, presto! a county paper was published; he mildly insinuated the necessity to the thereabout Railway Committees of sending in their advertisements to him, at his own price, as they could not pass without paying toll; and he cut the complex! Simple as like these must float, at least while the hubbub lasts, and the cauldron boils; but when the fire of speculation goes out, and the stuff cools, there will be a confounded lot of dregs, which will leave a disagreeable taste in the mass, and take much care and time to purify.

A single newspaper has swollen, and swollen until it has become large enough to cover your garden; you have your supplement No. 1, supplement No. 2, supplement No. 3, and last, though not least, a supplementary supplement. Post-office guards jump with all their Royal weight upon the bags, but they refuse that they are to be conveyed in the usual way, in the coach boots, before and behind; bag after bag is borne to what can't carry them, looking like a real representation of the the sham "Miller and his Men," until at last the Royal Post-office omnibuses are forced into the service, and they are carried to the rails that are the cause of their dreadfully swollen appearance, and conveyed to their destination. This is gradually growing to such a frightful extent, that, very soon, if you venture to buy a newspaper, you must take a cab to carry it home, andatop at home a week to read it!

COLLISION ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.—Another collision took place early on Friday morning last, between Methley Junction, and the below Normanton station, which, had it been a passenger train instead of a goods train, might have been attended with the most fearful consequences. It appears that a special waggon train was coming from the direction of York, and that another luggage train was coming in a contrary direction. The collision took place between four and five o'clock in the morning, which was extremely foggy at the time. At this period a Midland passenger train was also due, and the man at the Methley junction, where the Midland branches off to York, and whose duty it is to attend to the points, thinking that it was a passenger train coming, turned the points in the wrong direction, by which means he placed the luggage train on the wrong line, and a most fearful collision took place between the two luggage trains, three of the carriages being entirely smashed to pieces. We are happy to state that no other damage was done, nor was any person injured. The line was speedily cleared of the obstruction, signals having been sent to Woodlesford and Normanton stations to stop any train from advancing until the line was perfectly clear.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat for our market this week have been on a full average scale, hence the show of samples here to day was good. The attendance of buyers being small the demand for all descriptions was heavy, at a reduction in per qr. of full 1s per quarter, and very little progress was made in sales. Free foreign was held at full prices, but the amount of business passing was trifling. Malt was very dull, and where the importers demanded higher rates, were a mere drug. The supplies of barley being quite as ready on the morning stand, were somewhat extensive, and the primest observations may be applied to malt. We had a fair show of our samples. The best parcels sold at full prices, but other kinds were 6d cheaper. Beans and peas were dull and the terms lower.

Flour heavy.

ARRIVALS — English: wheat, 2780; barley, 2009; oats, 4900 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; oats, 10,090 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 850; barley, —; oats, 3600 quarters. Flour, 1700 sacks and 1000 barrels.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 68s to 68s; ditto, white, 60s to 72s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 54s to 60s; ditto, white, 58s to 65s; rye, 32s to 34s; grinding barley, 22s to 30s; distilling 32s to 33s; malting, 40s to 44s; Lincoln and Yorkshire, 36s to 40s; Devonshire and Somerset, 34s to 36s; Kingston and Ware, 42s to 46s; Chevalier 51s to 62s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 14s to 16s; potatoe ditto, 21s to 23s; Yorkshire and Cork, black, 23s to 25s; ditto, pale beans, new, 36s to 37s; ditto, old, 32s to 35s; grey peas, 40s to 42s; maple 43s; white, 50s to 56s; boilers, 57s per quarter. Town-made flour, 31s to 32s; Essex and Suffolk, 30s to 32s; Stockton, and Yorkshire, 45s to 48s, per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Fine wheat, scarce; Dantzig, red, 52s to 53s; white, 60s to 62s; in Sacks.—Barley, —; oats, brew, 24s to 25s; feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 34s to 35s; peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 15s to 24s; Baltic 27s to 29s, per bbl.

The Seed Market.—A steady business has been done in canary and linseed, as well as rapeseed, at previous rates. Cakes unaltered.

Liverpool Provision Market.—Monday (this day) reading, —s to —s. Mediterranean and Odessa, —s to —s. Egyptian, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, 15s to 16s per cwt. Beans, American, —s to —s; Egyptian, —s to —s. Peas, —s to —s per quarter. Rapeseed, £27 to £28, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £12 10s to £13; foreign, £8 10s to £9 15s per 1000: Rapeseed cakes, £5 to £5 10s, per ton. Canary, 34s to 35s, per quarter. English Clover seed, red, 40s to 50s; white, 55s to 65s; extra fine to 65s; extra up to 65s. Foreign, red, 40s to 45s; extra, 50s; white, 50s to 62s; extra, 75s per cwt.

Hops.—The prices of the best kinds brought forward in the Metropolis are from 92 to 98s; of household ditto, 64s to 84s per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 50s 1d; barley, 34s 5d; oats, 26s 2d, rye, 32s 2d; beans, 45s 5d; peas, 42s 10d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 57s 5d; barley, 31s 11d; oats, 23s 11d; rye, 33s 10d; beans, 43s 11d; peas, 42s 8d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 1s; barley, 7s; oats, 5s; rye, 9s 6d; beans, 1s; peas, 1s 6d.

Tea.—A public sale of 1,600 packages of Assam has passed off quietly, at full prices. In the private contract market very little business is doing, at former quotations. About 850,000 lbs have been received.

Sugar.—All kinds of West India, Mauritius, and Bengal sugars have continued a steady sale, at an advance of from 1s to 2s per cwt. In foreign sugars, little done, but brown lumps have asserted to 64s 6d to 65s 6d; and grocery ditto, 66s to 68s per cwt.

Coffee.—There is rather more doing in this market, and the quotations have an upward tendency. Good ordinary Ceylon is worth 60s to 62s per cwt.

Provisions.—The best parcels of Irish butter command a steady inquiry, at rather more money; but inferior kinds have been in less request, and are 2s to 4s per cwt. lower. Bacon, 52s to 56s; and 13s per dozen for fresh. The best qualities of Dutch move off at 104s to 106s per cwt. Hams is in request, at 5s to 6s per cwt. higher money. Prime American lard is in fair request, but inferior, 49s to 52s, heavy, 51s per cwt. The best hams are in good request. In other sorts we have no sales to report. Barrel provisions without change in value.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 13s to £5 5s; new ditto, £3 0s to £3 0s, clover ditto, £4 10s to £5 5s; new clover, £3 0s to £3 0s; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 15s to £2 2s per load.

Hops (Friday).—The best parcels of hops, both old and new, continue in good request, at very full prices. In other kinds the business is dull, and the quotations have in many cases appeared on sale. Picking is now over, and the duty remains at £105,000. New Hops: Sussex pockets, £6 10s to £7 7s; Weald of Kent ditto, £6 10s to £7 10s. Mid Kent ditto, £7 to £8 8s per cwt. Yearlings: Sussex pockets, £6 6s to £6 16s; Weald, £6 10s to £7 7s; Mid Kents, £6 15s to £8 8s per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Charlotte 18s 6d; New Tandeld, 18s; Gosforth, 16s 3d; Hilda, 18s; Hutchinson, 16s 6d; Lambton, 17s 6d; New Adelaide, 18s 6d; Russell, 17s 6d; Wylam, 17s 6d, and Lambton, 17s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although the supply of beasts here, this morning, was not to any large, the beef trade was in a very sluggish state, and previous quotations were barely maintained. About 100 foreign beasts were on sale in excellent condition. The numbers of sheep were small, viz., 3260 head, while the demand for them was somewhat active, at prices equal to those paid on Monday. The small canes sold were dull at 4d per 8lb. Lambs were of very slow sale, at late rates. In pigs, only a moderate business was doing, yet prices were well supported. Much corn was sold at from 40s to 42s per load, nothing (left) still sold.

Per 8lb., to sink the offals:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; second quality ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large oxen, 3s to 3s 2d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 4d to 3s 6d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 4d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s to 4s 2d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves, 3s 10d to 4s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 0d to 4s 2d. Suckling calves, 18s to 28s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 21s each. Beasts, 700; cows, 121; sheep, 3260; calves, 121; pigs, 58.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—The general demand was in a very sluggish state on the following terms:—

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The tendency of the English Market during the week has been downwards, although occasionally a recovery, but the decline has been very brief. From the general impression that has existed in all monied circles that the Bank of England must in its own defence still further increase the rate of discount, the Bank has specially declared that no increase was of course in favour of the fall. Consequently, on Thursday afternoon, the announcement that the future rate of discount until further notice would be 3½ per cent., only produced a slight flurry, and the Market at once settled down closed at a slight improvement. The variations that have occurred since Monday show a fall in Consols of nearly 1 per cent. At the beginning of the week the closing prices were 88¾ to ⅞, and they left off on Friday at 87¾. This on Wednesday fell to 86¾, and afterwards to 86⅝, rallying at the close of business to 86⅞. On Thursday, from the opening, the price was depressed, and, at one period, 86⅜ was the closing quotation, but a speculative feeling set in to 86⅝ to ⅞, which was the closing quotation both for money and account. Exchequer Bills have fallen from 86 to 87—Monday's quotation—to 82, 87. Bank Stock has fluctuated from 208 to 210, the latter price for the Three-and a Quarter per Cents. have suffered disproportionately, closing 97½. Reduced is 94¾, and Annuities for terms of years, 19 9-16.

The amount of Bullion in the Bank of England is less than last week.

Bargains have been done in Brazilian at 82, in Chilian at 53. Columbian have fluctuated between 18¾ and 18. Mexican was quoted at 32 to ¾ on Monday, and closes at 31¾. Portuguese 5 per Cents. has receded from 80 to 79½, and Five-per-Cents. have fluctuated between 27¾ and 27⅝, closing at the latter price. The Three per Cents are nominally 38. Belgian is 95 ex. div., and Dutch Two-and-a Half per Cents. 58, a speculative purchase.

The business in the Share Market, during the week, has been principally confined to the settlements in the Scrip of the new lines. A general feeling of distrust has been growing lately, and the failure of the late Banker in the case of Mr. Stalleld it was so perfectly unlooked for, that the Market was, perhaps, never so taken by surprise. Under these circumstances nearly all the transactions have been for money bargains. The contributors, of course, to render business very dull; and the general tone of the Market has been declining, in anticipation of the increase on the rate of interest by the Directors of the Bank of England. It is to point out the last most deprecating is an unnecessary task, so nearly alike have all suffered. A general feeling, however, exists that such a gigantic undertaking as the London and York line will be settled by the difficulty of procuring money, even on the event of the bill passing the Lords. At the close of the week the Market was heavy generally, with the exception of some of the old lines. The closing prices of the Shares last dealt in are as follows:—Aberdeen, 8; Bristol and Exeter, 87; Ditto, New, 92; Caledonian, 10; Ditto Extension, 3⅛; Cambridge and Lincoln, 4½; Ditto, New, 3⅞; Cambridge and Oxford, 13; Chester and Holyhead, 17½; Coventry, Nuneaton, Birmingham, and Leicester, 2; Direct Manchester (Remington's), 22; Eastern Counties, 20½; Ditto New, 7¾ pm; East Lincolnshire, 13; Edinburgh and Perth, 8; Great Grand Junction, 46; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 20⅜; Ditto, Extension, 1½; Great Western, 147; Ditto, Half Shares, 86; Ditto, Fifths, 33; Guildford, Farnham, and Portsmouth, 2; Lancaster and Carlisle, 54; Leeds and Bedford, 2 pm; Leicester and Thorpe, 1 pm; Liverpool and Leeds direct, 2⅜; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, 44; London and Birmingham, 216; London and Blackwall, 9; Ditto, New, Quarter Shares, 2; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 50; London and Western, 1½; London and S. Western, 71; London and York, 4⅜; London, Warwick, and Kidderminster, 2½; Londonderry and Coleraine, 7½; Lynn and Dereham, 6½; Manchester and Leeds, 85; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 77; Manchester and Southampton, 3⅜; Midland, 145; Midland, Birmingham, and Derby, 109; Newcastle and Darlington Junction, 57; Newcastle and Berwick, 14½; Newport, Abergavenny, and Hereford, 3; North British, 2⅜; Northampton, Banbury, and Cheltenham, 3; Nottingham and Boston, 3⅜; Oxford and Worcester, 7½; Scottish Central, 16; Scottish Midland, 4; South Midland, 4¾ p.; South Eastern and Dover, 35, Staines and Richmond 1¾; South Wales, 4¾; Tean and Dove Valley, 1⅜; Trent Valley, 16; Welsh Midland, 2¾; York and Carlisle, 3½; York and North Midland, 10½; Boulogne and Amiens, 9¾; Boulogne, Toulouse, and Cette (Mazeonne), 1½; Dutch Rhenish, 7¾; East Indian, 2¾; Great North of France (Lafflite's), 6¾; Ditto, Ditto (Rosamel's), 3¾; Namur and Liege, 4; Orleans and Vierzon, 17; Orleans and Bordeaux, 6; Paris and Rouen (Lafflite's), 2¾, Paris and Rouen, 38; Paris and Strasbourg (Gannero's), 3⅜.

SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols were done yesterday as low as 86⅜, but closed at the improved quotation of Monday, 86⅝ for Money and 86⅞ for Account. Stock has fallen to 208. Exchequer Bills are 21s. to 24s pm. Shares are generally lower.

THE CORN TRADE.—The critical state the country is in from a bountiful harvest, and the failure of the Potato Crop, and the consequently serious effects upon our commercial and monetary affairs are beginning to excite great apprehension. Under such circumstances, correct information as to the probable produce of the harvest at home and abroad, and as to the stock of grain on hand on the continent and in the western world is of the highest importance. No trouble or expense is spared to furnish such information, which is brought down to the latest moment of going to press, to families subscribing for the CORN TRADE JOURNAL. This work has been for some time in the MARK LANE EXPRESS and AGRICULTURAL JOURNAL, and has been for several months in the Corn Trade in England and in foreign countries. Published many years on authority of "best Corn Trade in England and in foreign countries. Published every Monday evening in time for post, and may be had by order of all Booksellers and News men. PROSSER'S NEW WOODEN GUIDE WHEEL RAILWAY.

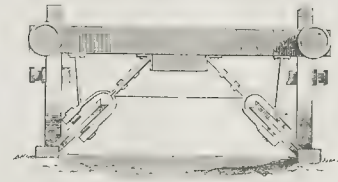
PROSSER'S WOODEN RAILWAY, WIMBLEDON COMMON.

As the Railway System progresses, the attention of men of science has naturally been directed to the great object of reducing its expense; for costly it must be considered, with all its advantages, immediate and prospective. This reduction is claimed to be effected by a System of Tram-ways composed entirely of Wood, which the inventor, Mr. William Prosser, maintains to be "equally expeditious, and more safe, more durable, and considerably more economical than the iron railway." The main feature of the invention is, however, a system of Guide Wheels, which have been patented by Mr. Prosser, and which may be applied either to iron or wooden rails. The proprietors of the patent have completed a line of Railway on this principle, on Wimbledon Common, whence our illustrations have been sketched. The details of the invention are briefly as follow:—

The rails, or rather trams, of seven to eight inches scantling, are indurated and protected against fire, rot, and insects, by the injection, by successive exhaustion and pressure, of two solutions, mineral and alkaline. These trams are laid down on the principle of the double way of the ancient tram-roads, which is also the modern principle of the Great Western Railway; that is to say, they are let into wooden transverse sleepers and secured thereon by wedges, forming one great frame of longitudinal and cross sleepers, on the levelled surface of the ground. The tires of the wheels are perfectly flat, and before and behind each carriage two Guide Wheels (the Prosser Guide Wards) are fixed, at an angle of forty-five degrees, revolving upon independent axles; a deep groove in their circumference embraces the upper and inner edge of the trams, and the friction being thus thrown upon the oblique axle, the carriages are guided with perfect safety, and without any perceptible abrasion of the rails. The friction and oscillation, and general wear and tear involved in the use of the conical tire and the flange, are thus obviated, and the friction of attrition is converted into a friction of rotation. All the wheels, moreover, are on separate axles, so that, in a curve, the inner and outer wheels adapt themselves necessarily to each sinuosity: on the present system of common axles, the outer wheel revolves, while the inner one is dragged along upon a curve. Upon a level, experiment has proved that one-fourth less power is required to move an equal weight upon a railway of this construction, than upon the flanged-wheel carriage of an iron rail; at the same time, the bite of the wood affords a greater power of ascending gradients, and the bevel wheels give the facility of traversing the sharpest curves. A machine of seven tons can thus mount and descend gradients of less than one in twenty, and traverse curves of five hundred feet radius at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. On the one hand, the durability is attested by the fact that wood, properly prepared, has recovered the deflexion occasioned by the pressure of one hundred and forty tons upon a segment of an iron wheel three inches in the tire; and that an experimental traffic equivalent to seven years of an ordinary line, did not obliterate the saw-marks upon the wooden trams, which, on the contrary, actually polished the bevelled surface of the guide wheels. While the guide wheel is equally applicable to the ordinary iron railway, a peculiar advantage, besides that of primary economy, in the use of the prepared longitudinal beams, is to be found in the action of the deliquescent salts which enter into their preservative composition, and which effectually prevent slipperiness from frost, and from the opposite extreme of intense summer heat.

The comparative cost of the superstructure of wooden and iron railways is stated to be as follows, per mile:—Wooden Rail, £1,746 8s. 0d.; Iron Rail, £3556 0s. 0d. It is also stated that there will be, at least, one-fourth less cutting, and a continuous saving in wear and tear of machinery, carriages, &c., which may be two-thirds less in weight, with equally tractive power. On the present system, a saving in the expense of embankments necessarily involves an additional cost of working. "A better illustration of this," says Mr. W. Bridges, in a letter to the Irish Railway Committee of the House of Commons, "cannot be found than in the comparison of the two surveys of Sir John Macneil, in his valuable Report on the North Irish Line (Report, Appendix, No. 4) Here are scarcely any gradients or curves in the Irish Railway Report, which need be avoided by the Guide Wheel System of Wooden Railways."

By the Guide Wheel system, it is maintained that tunnels, deep cuttings, embankments, and bridges, will, in most cases, be entirely obviated; seeing that gradients of 1 in 20, and curves of 500 feet radius, may be readily surmounted at a speed of 25 or 30 miles per hour: the purchase of land is reduced in amount; the material is greatly cheaper than iron; and as the rails are laid down on the existing face of the country, no disfigurement of the ground is necessary upon private estates, whilst the crossings from one part of an estate to another may be maintained in every direction. It is to be noted particularly that the system involves no central rail, or indeed any complexity to preclude its adoption on existing Iron Railways.



GUIDE WHEELS.—FRONT VIEW.

Safety is insured by the use of the Guide Wheels, which, being adapted to the upper and inner edge of the rail, and attached at an angle of forty-five degrees, preclude the possibility of an overturn; while, by their peculiar construction, scarcely coming into play except when a great centrifugal influence arises, there is no calculable amount of abrasive action on the tram, as by the use of the conical tyre on the iron lines.

Among the more important experimental results are these:—A very important function performed by the bevel wheels is, that in case of an accident occurring to the running wheels, they would act as supporters to the carriage, and carry it on in safety. The truth of this assertion was clearly demonstrated by experiments made in the presence of a number of scientific gentlemen, on a trial line at Vauxhall. When the fore-wheels of the steam carriage were removed, it ran without them at full speed, throwing the whole weight of the front portion of the carriage and its passengers on the bevel or guide wheels. The length of the experimental line laid down near Vauxhall-bridge was 174 yards, with gradients of 1 in 95, 1 in 22, and 1 in 9, and a curve of 750 feet radius. The speed attainable on so short a line was of course limited, but the power given to the engineer by the bite of the wheel on the wood, (for this line was laid with wooden rails,) enabled him to drive it at the rate of 24 miles an hour, and to stop the carriage in a distance of 24 yards. In the presence of several engineers, the carriage laden with passengers ascended an incline of 1 in 9, the rails being in a very bad state at the time from wet. The curve was near the centre of the line, where the carriage necessarily passed over it when going at its greatest speed, thus testing the safety of the bevel wheels. A curve of 600 feet radius may be traversed with safety at a speed of 25 to 30 miles per hour by means of the bevel wheels; and a model of a locomotive engine and train, constructed to a scale of 1½ inch to the foot, travelled round a curve of 9 feet radius, at a speed equally to 40 miles per hour, and traversed over upwards of 50,000 miles without the slightest accident.

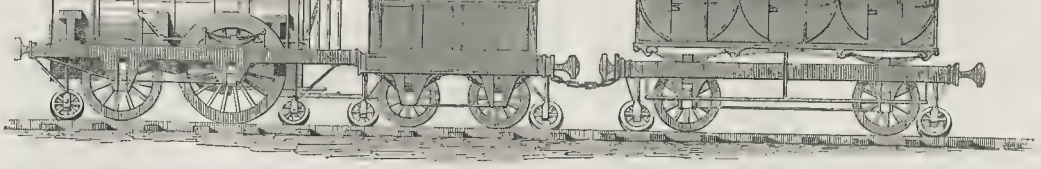
The result of a series of experiments, made to ascertain the proportionate power of the bite of wood over iron, has fully borne out the assertion of the Patentee, that the bite of the driving wheel on wood is nearly double that on iron.

The line at Wimbledon Common, shown in the large illustration, has been completed expressly to shew the advantages which the Guide Wheels possess over the flange; and, in this short line, part of which is laid with wood, and part with iron rails, the Proprietors have all the difficulties they profess to overcome, viz., various gradients, say 1 in 50, 1 in 75, and 1 in 100, a circle, the radius of which is ten chains: they are running a train of carriages upon this line, with the view of practically testing the durability and efficacy of wooden lines compared with iron, also proving that carriages fitted with their Guide Wheels can travel on either iron or wood with equal effect.

One of the economical advantages is that the proprietors of main trunk lines of iron may, by this system, construct their branches with wood, where the traffic will not admit of the expense of iron rails.

With regard to the durability of the wooden rails, or trams, we have the testimony of Mr. Burrell, the eminent Civil Engineer, that, in a piece of beech laid down at Union-wharf, Millbank-street, August 15, 1843, and taken up May 6, 1845, the wear averaged but three-eighths of an inch; although it was laid in the angle of a curb, so that every wheel had a grinding as well as a rolling motion over it; and the daily traffic averaged 120 tons of goods, exclusive of empty waggons and carts not weighed.

Such are the main statistics of the plan, which is, certainly, sufficiently attractive to warrant us in submitting them to the reader, as a portion of our Series of Constructive Illustrations of the great Railway System.



ENGINE, TENDER, AND CARRIAGE.—SIDE VIEW.

RISE AND PROGRESS OF RAILROADS.—The first railroad was made at Newcastle-on-Tyne in the year 1686, and was used for conveying coals. This railroad was made by laying down large flat stones for the wheels of the waggons to pass along—a stone tram. This railroad was in use perhaps half a century, when wooden sleepers and wooden rails were introduced. Iron rails were first used at the Colebrook Dale works in 1767. About fifteen years afterwards, a railroad with iron rails was made at Sheffield. The Wandsworth and Croydon Railroad, made about forty years ago, was the first which was sanctioned by Parliament. Darlington Railroad, formed in 1821, was the first which adopted the steam-engine; till then, horses were used upon all railroads. About this time cast-iron rails were exchanged for wrought-iron, being lighter and less liable to break. Passengers were first conveyed by railroad transit upon the Liverpool and Manchester line in 1826.

TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY.—The works of the Trent Valley Railway will be commenced on Tuesday next, Nov. 11, at Tamworth, with the usual ceremonies. The first sod will be turned on this occasion by the Right Hon. Sir R. Peel, Bart., M.P.

RAILWAYS IN FARRINGDON-STREET.—At a Court of Common Council, held on Monday, the Report of the Committee appointed to examine the allegations in the petition of the directors of the Direct London and Manchester Railway Company for leave to purchase Farringdon market for a great central terminus, and also to examine the allegations on the petition of the Birmingham Railway Company for leave to purchase the north side of the site of the late Fleet Prison, with other premises, for the purpose of a city terminus, was brought up. The Committee stated that they had heard explanations in support of both propositions, and after considering the statements of the respective parties, the Committee were of opinion, "that it is desirable both for the prosperity and advantage of the citizens of London, to have railway termini within this city, that the sites proposed to be purchased by both companies are desirable, as they interfere but in a small degree with the public streets within the city, and that the plans will afford great accommodation to the traffic passing east and west." A long discussion ensued, and amendments were moved, but ultimately the Report was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENTS.

While so much money is being thrown into Railway speculation, in many cases with a distant, and in more, with a dubious prospect of profitable results, there is a risk of other means of employing capital being unduly neglected. A Railway is the substitute of the old road, and good roads are an essential element of national prosperity. But there are other things necessary besides roads for traffic; for instance, in the Metropolis and other cities, the extension of Railways themselves, and the improving tendency of the present generation, who are getting too numerous for the streets and squares that sufficed for their fathers, are fast levelling to the ground whole districts which it is very usual to call "nests of filth and depravity," but which are really, whatever their character, the abodes of whole masses of honest and laborious poverty. Dirty they are, and squalid for cleanliness is a more difficult virtue than the rich imagine, where water has to be bought of a Company that cares not to give credit in such localities; dark and ill-ventilated they are also, for light and air if admitted, involve a reckoning with the Exchequer in the shape of a window-tax, quite as hard to meet as the water-rate. That they are the resort of the vicious as well as of the poor is also true; obscurity and numbers are the veils of crime. Most repulsive they are to all the senses of the man of easy means, to whom they are places read of rather than seen, and to him it is a matter of perfect indifference whether they are swept away or not. A wide road, or a well-paved street, with handsome shops, are much more agreeable objects to find in their place; but when the one class of houses is destroyed and the other built, the question arises, what is to become of those to which the "nests of filth" gave the only shelter their means could command? The dwellings are destroyed, but the dwellers survive, and, though driven from one place, must go to another. The poor and dirty of one locality will not become rich and clean in a new one, and the change of residence will not turn the vicious from their evil ways; if one neighbourhood is "improved" by their dispersion, it will merely be to the deterioration of the place where the houseless horde may settle down to live and die as before.

Thus, things, on the whole, remain much as they were; the evil shifts its seat, but does not cease to exist; and what is gained by St. Giles's and Westminster is lost by some other parish which may have sunk something below respectability, but has not yet become the haunt of destitution. As soon as the invaders settle down on it, its struggle to keep a character is hopeless; it is expunged from the books of the tax-gatherer, and becomes better known to the police.

This process has been going on for ages, and nothing would be more curious than a history of the "decline and fall" of different localities, could their several stages in the downward course be correctly registered. Wealth and fashion, like civilisation, get farther and farther from the East, which was once their abode. Kings once lived in the Tower—not, as in later times, as prisoners; Bishops dwelt in Aldersgate-street and Holborn. The mansions of some of the highest nobility stood in Drury-lane, and between the Strand and the river: Northumberland House is the last of a great race that have passed away, leaving only their names to streets and lanes.

The battle between trade and aristocracy has everywhere left its traces; coal wharves occupy with their blackness the sites of trim gardens and terraces; factories smoke where mansions gleamed, producing more wealth than the ancient owner of the soil ever spent on the same spot. But the dwellings of the aristocracy have but retired to "a more removed ground," and placed a wider space between the slovenly unhandsome vicinity on which commerce so ruthlessly encroached, and their own nobility. They have not really lost; wealth shifting from one place easily finds a seat in another; widely different is the case of the poor, with which we have now to deal.

The absolute necessity of extensive alterations and improvements in the Metropolis, is becoming every day more evident. The traffic of a city of two millions of people has far outgrown the accommodation furnished by streets built when that could be numbered by hundreds, and built in the worst possible manner, without arrangement or foresight. Had the plans of the great Wren, after the Fire, been followed, space would have been left for the increase of trade, business, and numbers which he seems to have anticipated. But the old channels of communication in the City are the worst in Europe, those of Cologne perhaps excepted. The delays, inconvenience, and danger to which they give rise are becoming every day more formidable, and must be remedied. Our old streets must be widened or new ones driven through dense masses of bricks and mortar, districts crowded by poor inhabitants, who will infallibly reduce other districts to the same condition of dirt and disease, by providing themselves with dwellings, unless, which would be far wiser, and more profitable too, some of our superabundant capital be applied to building, along with the houses and shops for the more wealthy, a class of dwellings suited to the means of those whom improvement dispossesses of their wretched, but only homes.

To congratulate ourselves, when we have destroyed them, on having razed to the ground a centre and resort of crime, is quieting the public conscience by the semblance of an excuse for any exertion beyond what is necessary to benefit ourselves. Much vice there is in such places, but it is that sort of vice which is everywhere the accompaniment of destitution: the people suffer under it rather than create it. We have no right to justify our crusade against it by indiscriminately charging all poverty with criminality. The real, active, dangerous criminals of a great capital are rarely poor; they will much more frequently be found well lodged, and rioting in extravagance, than fearing the ills of the dwellers in these refuges of want. When, therefore, we drive forth those who must lodge somewhere, it would be as well to ask where they can go? We have capital enough to build a whole town in a year, if the speculation would pay; and it only has to be proved that a fair return might be made in the shape of the rents, which even the poorest of the unhoused must give (and the poorest, in proportion to their miserable accommodation, pay the highest), to set enterprise at work in supplying the wants we are creating. It is in this direction that a great social experiment has yet to be made.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

In another page will be found detailed the great pageant of this memorable day in Civic history. The illustration upon the preceding day, however, represents what may be termed an episode in the spectacle.

On the morning of the memorable Ninth of November, it has been customary for the Stationers' Company to attend the Lord Mayor, in their superbly gilt barge, to Westminster; and to convey the Silver in their barge to Lambeth Palace. On their arrival, certain members of the household of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury come on board the barge, and bring with them hot spiced ale, buns and cakes, and a quantity of wine, wherewith the worthy "Stationers" are regaled. The potations are not served in glasses, but in small wooden bowls, with handles; they are termed "Sack-cups," and are provided for the occasion by the Beadle of the Stationers' Company. At a certain period of the year, the Company present to the Archbishop of Canterbury copies of the several Almanacks printed by them.

There are certain fees paid by the Company on the Ninth of November for, in the Payments in the Second Report from the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations in England and Wales, we find the following entry:—

"Lord Mayor's Day.

Paid the Archbishop of Canterbury's Servants on Lord Mayor's Day, viz —

Butler, 21s., Servant, 10s 6d		1	11	6

These appointments are requisite to enable the Company to "attend my Lord Mayor" with fitting State. After the visit to Lambeth Palace, "the Stationers" regale the Lord Mayor at Westminster, and thence the gold-a flotilla returns to Blackfriars.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The medical congress to which I drew your attention a few weeks since convened their first experience on the 3rd. Three thousand doctors, apothecaries, surgeons, veterinarians, &c., &c., were united in one fatal body at the Hotel de Ville. The incursion of the Goths into the four fields of southern Europe could not have been more alarming. Imagine these three thousand M.D.'s armed with prescriptions, senna, coloquintida, scammony, and gambouge—with lancets, tourniquets, pestles, and mortars, and other fell ensigns of their craft poured out upon a population; the very idea is sufficient to create insanity. One M. Latour opened the meeting with a discourse as verbose as Dr Johnson, and as lengthy as a President's Message; the object of which was to organize a permanent committee for the diplomatic and permanent commission, and the powers which were entrusted to their watchful keeping being considered an almost divine right. He adverted strongly to the known politeness of his medical brothers, quite oblivious to the unpolite-ness of having all the talk to himself. After divers and sundry eulogiums passed on all doctors—past, present, and future—the young Hippocrates finished by announcing himself as Secretary General of the Physicking Congress. After him, M. Serres, seated and with his hat fixed tightly on his caput, read a discourse, the excellence of which consisted in not a soul present paying to it the slightest attention. There was to be another act of this drama acted to-morrow, of which I will send you as graphic a report as my pen can afford. I think the affair will turn out a mere speculation; the quiet thinking people consider it an ill-acted farce.

It is said that there has been submitted to the Government an invention which has caused a most vivid impression amongst the high functionaries of the State. The inventor is a Prussian, and I am told the secret was originally offered to the King of Prussia. The invention is certainly calculated to inspire alarm when the incalculable results are taken into consideration—not only in State affairs, but mercantile, and all the solicitudes of domestic intercourse. It consists in the imitation in the most marvellous manner of every description of written document, in ancient or modern character, bank notes, &c., that the most practised eye cannot distinguish the copy from the original. What is most surprising is, that the author of this invention can, in a comparatively short time, produce more than a hundred copies—indeed, in as short a time as a printer could compose and print the documents. M. de V—— sent to the inventor an old deed to copy, which, in the opinion of the best judges in such matters, offered apparently insurperable difficulties. In less than two hours the copies were produced, which it was impossible to distinguish from the original. At the bottom of the document were many written signatures, in different inks—all were perfectly imitated. A bank note was then sent, some days after were produced twenty fac-similes; the original note being placed among them—no difference could be discovered between the false and the real Simon Pures. The danger of such an invention not only menaces the safety of States, but every social transaction. The Government has wisely, it is said, purchased the secret at a million and a half of francs

Your railway mania in London is generally confined to the male portion of the community—you have your Stags, but here we have not only Stags but Does. The scene is curious here about twelve o'clock—for that is the hour at which the Bourse begins. Here are assembled in crowds gamblers in petit coats, in dress hats, and in humble straw; fine ladies and gay grisettes; servants an proprietaires, to whom the entrance to the Temple of the Bourse is interdicted. Men pass and repass, and penetrate into the sanctuary, bearing them intelligence and procuring their signatures to bonds ready drawn. Neither rain, nor sun, nor snaring, nor ill-favoured jests from the passers by, can turn them from the business of the moment. Nearly all the jobbing is effected with ready money; the motto is, "Hand to hand." It is a small Exchange, in which is followed at a distance the passions of the Bourse. It has its money changers and its brokers on a small scale; the ladies, with whom stock and shares have become a passion, still have the prudence to secure the services of a friend, perhaps a father or a brother, or an agent to whom they entrust their money, that the bond fide nature of the transaction may be legally secured. The speculators hastening to subscribe to all the companies are prodigious, each day sees the birth of a new line, and the scenes which are hourly taking place are curious and amusing. An amateur in railway shares presented himself a few days since at one of the company's offices; he had forgotten his spectacles—he could not see to sign—he begged the friend who accompanied him to read him the necessary service of signing for a hundred shares. His friend seized the pen, and signed for a hundred thousand in lieu of one hundred, and for a reference he wrote—His Majesty Louis Philippe.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers just now are much occupied with discussions upon the comparative strength of English and French navies. Among the journals that have taken up this question are the Débats, to speak the sense of Government, the Presse, reported to be under the influence of a certain coterie at the Tuileries and of Count Molé, and La Patrie, which rumour states to be under the direct and personal control and direction of his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville.

The Débats demonstrates the relative positions of France and England in commercial affairs The Presse contends for the increase an creation of all the elements necessary to the subjugation of British maritime power. La Patrie sums up its statement of facts in the following significant terms:—

"1. That the French Navy is numerically about one-third of that of Great Britain

"2. That this immense inequality is, moreover, greatly increased by the great number of three deckers which the English possess.

"3. That the number of vessels upon the stocks is nearly the same in both countries

"4. That our neighbours are far from having any advantage over us as regards the construction of first class vessels and frigates

"5. That they are considerably superior to us as regards the construction of inferior vessels, such as corvettes, brigs, schooners, &c.

"6. That if the artillery on board our (the French) vessels is in general as well disposed as that on board English vessels, there is considerable improvements to be made on board all our vessels, by arranging our guns so as to be used either when giving chase or when in retreat, and also in the manner in which our vessels are equipped."

The Duchess d'Aumale was, on Monday, safely delivered of a prince.

Private letters from Paris state that the crisis in the Share Market has already been productive of many suicides. Two causes are stated to have given rise to so rash a proceeding—the one the immense losses sustained; the other the inability of persons of small income, or who are engaged in trade, to meet their engagements in consequence of their money being tied up.

The question as to the changes in the French Ministry, in consequence of the retirement of Marshal Soult from the office of Minister of War, is at length set at rest. The Moniteur publishes two Royal Decrees on the subject, the first of which is to the following effect:—

"Marshal Soult, Duke de Dalmatie, having represented to us, to our very great regret, the impossibility, in his state of health, of continuing the functions of Minister Secretary of State of War, and being desirous of preserving the co-operation of his talents and long experience in affairs, we have ordained and do ordain as follows: Marshal Soult, Duke de Dalmatie, ceasing his functions as Minister Secretary of State of War, will retain the Presidency of our Council of Ministers."

A second ordonnance, of the same date, appoints Lieutenant-General Moline de St. Yon Minister of War; a third appoints the Baron Martineau des Chenes Under Secretary of State for War; a fourth confers upon General Moline de St. Yon to the dignity of the peerage; and a fifth appoints General Baron Gazan Director of the personnel and military operations of the Ministry of War, and Count de Molue de St. Yon, and Major General Count de la Rue Director of the Affairs of Algeria, in place of M Vauchelle, who has given in his resignation.

The latest news from Algeria is of the 30th instant, and is by no means of a satisfactory character. The Moniteur Algérien has the following:—"The troops under the immediate command of the Governor-General effected on the 27th Oct. a very large razzia on the insurgent tribes south of Tlemet-el Hadd. A column of cavalry and infantry proceeded against the rebels who had fled, and fell in with them after two night marches. Large numbers of cavalry and a considerable quantity of booty of all kinds, remained in our hands. The enemy, who had at first made a vigorous resistance, fled, leaving nearly 300 dead on the ground. Our losses are insignificant, in comparison with so great a result. Thus, ten days after reaching Algiers, the troops under the orders of the Marshal are striking energetic blows at a distance of 90 leagues from this place, and showing the tribes that they may be reached at whatever distance they may be. We learn by the last courier from the west, that an Aga of the Sbéhas, Si-Mohammed Bel Hadj, who was very devoted to us, has been assassinated in the middle of the market of Ain Kramnia. The assassins fled to the mountains. The body of the Aga was carried to Orleansville by the horse men who had accompanied him. This is a severe loss, for Si Mohammed was an devoted active man. His intelligence and bravery, Colonel St. Arnaud, who had proceeded to the west, to support General de Bourjolly against the Flittas, will not delay the chastisement of the authors of this crime. Ben Maza has taken the command of the Sbéhas, and will march to the Dahra, and renew the agitation which had manifested itself amongst the tribes at the east of Orleansville, on the banks of the Chéliff. The Kabyle tribes of the circle of the Deliys remain perfectly tranquil."

BELGIUM

The Belgian Chambers were opened by King Leopold on Tuesday, with the usual formalities. His Majesty, in his Speech, after stating that he continued to preserve favourable relations with Foreign Powers, stated that negociations were in progress for extending Belgian commerce. His Majesty proceeded to say

"The general situation of commerce and industry is satisfactory. Several branches of national riches have recovered the prosperity which they had lost. The Government does not neglect any means of attenuating the effects of the malaise from which the linen trade is still suffering.

"The agricultural interest continues to be the object of the constant attention of the Government. The corn harvest has been on the whole a good one; and although one of the most valuable articles of consumption for the poorer classes has been in a great part destroyed, the resolutions which you have adopted during your extraordinary session have already led to favourable results. They will alleviate the effects of that visitation, and, moreover afford the means of providing for the wants of the operative classes, by encouraging useful public works."

The next topic referred to the Fine Arts. His Majesty said:—"The exhibition of the Fine Arts has maintained the Belgian school in the rank assigned it by the admiration of the country, and the just appreciation of it by neighbouring nations. I indulge in the pleasing hope that the national exhibitions, which will take place in 1847, will show that our industry has made further progress."

The only other passage of interest was the following:—"Ever since the national Railways have reached the French and German frontiers, the conveyance of goods and passengers, and the amount of the receipts, have rapidly increased, increasingly progressed. The results obtained this year have surpassed my expectation. Your last session was distinguished towards its close by the vote of several projects of Railways and Canals The favourable reception given to foreign capitalists has led to many demands for the concession of lines. Some of those demand-, after being examined, will be submitted to your deliberation"

SPAIN

Letters from Spain give an account of another and unsuccessful attempt at insurrection at Valencia, on the 3d inst. A sergeant and twenty-five soldiers in the barracks of San Francisco, revolted, attacked the guard, and wounded three officers. They then proceeded to another barracks, having been joined by some of the populace, but they were repulsed there and fled. Eighteen soldiers and some of the populace were afterwards arrested. Tranquility was restored, but General Roncali declared the town and province in a state of siege, and convoked a court-martial for the trial of the rebels. The soldiers who revolted belonged to the regiment of Girona, which has long been suspected of disaffection to the Government.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL.

The Avon arrived at Southampton on Saturday, with the West India mails.

Our news from the West Indies is favourable, though scanty. The weather was fine, and an abundant supply of rain in most places. The sugar crops were looking well. The coffee crop would yield badly, having suffered more by the drought than the ordinary and inferior qualities, which are less damaged.

The Hill Coolies continue to give great satisfaction to their employers.

Everything was quiet in Mexico when the Avon left, but matters looked somewhat warlike.

POLICE.

ALLEGED MURDER AND MUTINY ON BOARD THE SHIP "TORY."

On Tuesday night, on the arrival of the ship Tory in the West India Dock, Mr. James Evans, jun., an inspector of Thames police, and other officers, went on board, and took into custody seventeen of the crew, who were charged with mutiny and murder. One man, named Joseph Morris, who had been shot in the knee during the disturbance on board, and who has ever since been confined to his hammock, was conveyed by the Thames police to the Greenwich Hospital ship. The others were lodged in the Poplar station-house for the night.

On Wednesday, the prisoners were examined on the charge at the THAMES POLICE OFFICE. They answered to their names as follow.—Franklin Tucker, Julian Cordeiola, William Benton, David Johnson, William Beresford Wilham Dunn, Thomas Gair, John Allison, Thomas Lee, Andrew Nelson, Barry Edmonton, Stephen Cone, James Blackless and Robert Thompson.

Mr. Clarkson, the barrister, and Mr. Hawley, clerk to Crowder and Maynard, solicitors, conducted the prosecution.

The case appears involved in a vast deal of mystery.

After the prisoners had been arraigned, in and about the dock, the magistrate's attention was particularly called to the prisoner Gair, who was in a very weak state. His face was terribly disfigured, and the right side of it was covered with a cloth extending from the top of his head to his neck. He has lost the sight of his right eye, and has received other injuries of a serious nature

Mr. Clarkson stated the case for the prosecution. He charged the 16 men at the bar with a conspiracy to run away with the ship Tory, on her passage from Hong Kong to London, under circumstances that make the crime piracy by law. It would also be his painful duty to implicate some of the prisoners in a charge of murder.

Captain George Johnston, the commander of the Tory, was the first witness called. He is a mild-looking man, and laboured under nervous excitement. He was under examination for two hours. He stated that the Tory was a ship of 598 tons burden, and belonged to Mr. Duncan of Liverpool, from which port she sailed in the summer of 1844, on a voyage to Bombay and Hong Kong. She was navigated on the voyage from Hong Kong to London by a crew of 33 men and boys. William Rainert was the first mate, and William Mars was the second mate. Both mates were dead; one had lumped overboard and drowned himself, and the other was murdered. A man named Thomas Reason was also killed during a similar occurred on the homeward voyage from Hong Kong, until she fell in with a French ship, the Auenes, in about 30 deg., S. latitude, when he had occasion to send the chief mate and others to the French vessel in a boat to obtain a supply of water and provisions, of which they had begun to run short. On their return the boat was damaged, and something took place re.ating to it of no particular moment. Next day he was informed by Barry Yelverton, one of his apprentices, that a plot was laid to take his life.

Mr. Broderip Why, that is one of the prisoners

Mr. Clarkson Yes, sir. It may be necessary to state that, on the ship reaching London, she was placed in the charge of the Coast Guard officers, who remained with her until she came into dock, and it was considered necessary that the whole of these men should be placed under his custody; but it will, no doubt, be found, in the course of the inquiry, that there are great distinctions to be made in their guilt, and that two or three of them may be absolved altogether

The inquiry then proceeded, and stated that French, as well as Yelverton, informed him that the crew had sharpened their knives, with the intention of taking his life. He immediately made French walk the quarter-deck of the ship, and took him away from the people forward, to prevent his being tampered with, and directed him to keep in the after part of the ship. He then sent for the chief mate, and put some questions. He found the chief mate knew something of the plot; and soon after he had left the cabin, he was informed he had come to the fore part of the ship, to instigate the men to revolt. He sent after him twice, but, finding he would not come aft, he sent Alexander Sinclair, the carpenter, who was true to him from first to last, and French, to bring him aft. They found him in the lower forecastle among the men, and, in consequence of a report made to him, that he had been stirring up the men to mutiny, he put him in irons. He was immediately afterwards informed by Franklin Tucker, and by French, that the chief mate had been forward, and dragged the men out of their berths, for them to come aft, and kill him

Mr Broderip: You have rambled a good deal. Now, be careful, sir. Am I to understand that two men gave you that information?

Captain Johnston: Yes, sir. The witness, after some other disjointed statement, said he learned from Tucker and French that the principal part of the crew were armed against him, and intended to run away with the ship. He empowered the boatswain to take his life. In consequence of the report made to him, he put three men, named Thomas Lee, Thomas Reason, and Stephen Cone in irons, and placed two men as sentinels, one at the main hatch and the other on the top of the companion leading to the cabin, and armed each of them with a musket and a bayonet fixed to the end of it. Johnson and Thompson were the sentinels, and he selected them, believing them to be good characters. The greater portion of the crew came aft with bolts and bars in their hands, and said they would fire upon French and Sinclair if they did not come forward again. The men were ordered to retrace their steps, but they never rushed aft on the poop with the view of releasing the three men in irons, but did not succeed. The chief mate took the musket from Johnson, and said he would drive it through him (the captain), and John soon acknowledged that, after the mate had jumped overboard and committed suicide.

Mr. Broderip: Are you conscious of doing any acts of unkindness, or behaving ill to the mate and crew before this, to cause them to revolt?

Captain Johnston said, he always acted kindly to his crew, and had no disturbance with them previously. His ship and the cargo were worth £50,000, and he had a heavy charge upon him. After the disturbance on the 24th ult., off the island of Ascension, everything went on quietly. The men imputed the whole of the disturbance to the chief mate, and said they would do their duty. Everything went on well for about thirty five days, till he made the island of Fayal, when he observed a suspicious intimacy springup up between Mars, the second mate, who had succeeded the chief mate, and the people, but no open violence. He liberated Reason, Lee, and Cone from their irons two or three days after the rest of the crew had returned to their duty, and there was no man under restraint till the ship reached Fayal, on the 19th of October, when another mutiny took place. He had occasion to go ashore, and, having his suspicious of the second mate, he directed the carpenter to be very particular and keep the ship near the harbour. He went ashore on obtaining provisions.

Mr. Broderip: You are about to relate a second case of mutiny. Be particular and narrate the circumstances in the order in which they occurred.

Captain Johnston said he made a full report of the mutiny to the British Consul at Fayal, who advised him to bring the ship to an anchor, and secure the crew. He tried to do so, but there were baffling light winds, which kept the vessel knocking about the island for two days, and he could obtain no seamen at Fayal. While he was speaking to the Consul, one of the boys who came ashore in the boat told him, that the men who rowed from the ship to the shore had all left the boat. He returned towards the place where he left the boat, and found Johnson very drunk, and he saluted him in a very familiar manner, and sung out, "Halloo, Captain Johnston, halloo." He desired him to go quietly into the boat, and he did so. The other men who formed the crew of the boat were, Cone, Reason, and Lee, who were all more or less drunk, and two boys. On returning to the vessel in the offing he called Mars, the acting as chief mate, to witness the condition of the men. On the following day French informed him, that Mars was in private conversation with a portion of the crew who intended to rise upon him (the captain) and murder him, and those who would not join them. He sent for the men aft, and lectured them, and told them to mind what they were about. He then sent for Mars, who had no sooner entered the cabin than he seized him (the captain) by the throat, and during a struggle he had with him, tore a piece of flesh out of his hand. Mars also cut his head with a bayonet. He struck Mars on the head in return, and sent him out of the cabin. French came to him and said he would withhold nothing. That was before Mars left the cabin. French said, that on the night the ship was off the island of Ascension. Mars came on deck to relieve the first mate, and asked him if he saw the land yet, and on his answering in the negative, Mars said, "If you don't see the land before ten o'clock the captain is dead man. French also informed him, that the chief mate incited Gair, and said to him, "Tom, the captain is not going to starve us, and we must stand together."

Mr. Broderip—Before you go any further, will you inform me how Gair became wounded in the melée between you?

Captain Johnston: He got a blow from the butt end of a pistol from French, and one of the boys fired a pistol in his face.

Mr. Broderip asked Captain Johnston if he was to understand that he charged all the prisoners with piracy?

Captain Johnston replied all but the Italian.

After some discussion the Italian was ordered to leave the dock, but it was afterwards suggested that he might be implicated in the charge of murder, and it was ultimately agreed that he should be forthcoming at the next examination.

The Italian, a stout sun-burnt mariner, said, in broken English, that he was quite innocent of being mutinous, that he always did his duty, and that he would tell the truth. If he knew anything against his shipmates or the captain he would say it regardless of the consequences.

Alexander Sinclair, the carpenter of the ship, was next called, and he answered many of the questions put to him as vaguely as the witness before being asked if, from what he had observed, he believed the crew intended to seize the ship and sacrifice the life of the master, he said that no commander could have permitted such conduct. He could not tell how Mars came by his death. There was an attempt at mutiny at the island of Ascension; but he was not aware of a revolt at Plymouth. He was on deck when the captain was wounded, and had never seen it in injury.

The prisoners then received the usual caution from the Magistrate.

Tucker said he should at present say nothing. Burton said he was one of the men pulled out of his berth and told to come aft to secure the captain, as the captain was coming forward to take his life. The first and second mate pulled him out of his berth. He said he was as happy to die in his berth as on deck. "As for any charges," continued the prisoner, "emphatically as "begging your worship's pardon and forgiveness, I am innocent of them, as I have to appear before the awful tribunal of God, who knows the secrets of all hearts." David Johnson was sicnal, and William Beresford said he had nothing to speak about, he had done his duty, and was no mutineer. Dunn was next called upon. He is a fine young man, and was cook of the ship. He said he went down into the cabin at the commencement of the row, and the statements that were down in the log-book were all false. The captain had been in a state of intoxication every row that occurred, and there were two female passengers in attendance to prove it.

Hue, one of the women referred to, exclaimed "Yes, that is true—the captain was repeatedly drunk"

Thomas Lee was next called on, and he said that on the 23d of September, at daylight, he saw a French barque on the weather bow. The chief mate ordered the hands to take in the larboard studding-sail, and the yards were braced up. They stood for the barque, cleared away the boats, and went on board the Frenchman and obtained provisions, then hoisted the boat in and made sail again. That day the allowance of water was increased from one to two pints. The captain and mate then went down into the cabin, and sat down drinking all day. At nine o'clock he was in the larboard watch, and the captain came on deck and ordered al. the larboard watch aft. The watch did not stay to put on their clothes, but went aft. The captain was armed with a sword, and the mates with bayonets. The captain said, "You rascals, you have sharpened your knives to take my life." The three men nearest the captain were himself, Cone, and Reuben, since killed by the captain, and he ordered the carpenter to put them in irons, and they were secured with handcuffs and leg irons. About every two or three hours, while he said his shipmates were in irons, the captain came to the cabin-door with a cutlass. On the 23th, the captain took the shackles off the best bower anchor and shackled them round each of their necks, and hoisted Reuben and Lee into the mainstay, and Cone into the mizentop. They were lashed down to the tops. Just before four o'clock in the morning of the 26th, the captain was cutting the chief mate about, and the chief mate came into the mizentop and tried to get the shackles off their necks. The captain sung out for him to come down, and he went down the main stay, and the captain began cutting him again with the cutlass he had in his hand. The mate ran away aft and jumped over the larboard quarter. The captain did not use much effort to save him. The sails were shook up in the wind a little, and the ship then kept her course. The captain took him and his shipmates out of irons the same afternoon.

The wounded man, Gair, on being called upon, and who previously appeared in a fainting condition, rallied a little, and throwing himself back in his chair, said he would not have his life sworded. Last Friday night the watch was in irons in the lower forecastle, and the captain, who was drunk, sent for him into the cabin, and ordered him to go on his knees. He did so, and the captain said he would not have his life, and then cut at him about the head with his cutlass, and at the same time ordered French to load his pistol and fire at him, and threatened to take his life if he did not. The man, to preserve his own life, fired into his face several times with a pistol, and then had amused himself in that way for some time he was taken into the forecastle, bleeding profusely from his wounds, and his face disfigured from the discharges of powder into it. He was put in irons again, and he became insensible, and was so for some time.

Harry Silverton, a tall youth, one of the apprentices of the ship, was next called upon. He is a respectable and very intelligent lad, and his evidence made an extraordinary sensation. It appeared that some of the men complained of the treatment they endured, and were determined, on reaching the island of Ascension, to hoist a signal (a blue shirt on the mizen-top), and bring the officers of one of her Majesty's ships on board, an intimation at the same time being given that those who would not complain of the captain's treatment would have a very uncomfortable time of it during the remainder of the passage. He then gave an account of the boarding of the French barque, and said the captain abused the chief mate for injuring the boat. The chief mate turned round and said, if it were not for his wife and family he would jump overboard. During the afternoon there was another quarrel between the captain and mate; and after that the captain called all the apprentices into the cabin, and asked them if their wives were in danger? The captain sent for a great portion of the crew, and asked them what they knew about a mutiny? and Curtis and Burton said that the two mates had hauled them out of their berths to come aft and secure the captain, as they was their sent for, and put in irons; and the captain said he would cut an inch off him every half hour, and did so.

Mr. Broderip warned the youth to be cautious in what he said. Did he mean to say the captain cut the second mate in the way he represented?

The Prisoner: He did cut him with the cutlass most cruelly. He cut a piece off his head half the size of my hand. This statement produced a shudder of horror in court, which was very audibly expressed.) The .ad continued as follows.—The captain, sir, took Mr. Mars into his own cabin, his own place; he got a strand and a bucket he did throw it on deck, and he cannot say, but we could hear him sing out, as if he was choking. The captain then brought him into the principal cabin again, and set him at the cabin door, and sat on the locker beside himself, and kept pitching the cutlass at him. The cutlass sometimes stuck in his skull, and sometimes in his breast. The prisoner then went on at great length to detail other circumstances, from which it appeared that the captain had been tampering with the apprentices to give a false colouring to the transaction, and particularly as related to the murder of Mars; and that, in order to get at the prisoners in the court unplicated, and possibly one of them becoming a witness for the crown, and the other, he concocted the disturbance at Plymouth, and told French to fire away pistols at the men.

Some others, in their defence, alleged that the captain was constantly intoxicated after visiting the French barque, and that he had cut several men with a cutlass in a most barbarous manner. They also alleged that it was to escape the tyranny of the captain that the chief mate threw himself overboard.

Mr. Broderip exhorted the inspector to pay great attention to this important and extraordinary case. He would give no opinion on the guilt or innocence of any parties; but this case must undergo a most searching inquiry. The prisoners were then formally remanded for a week.

The female passengers, who felt disappointed at not being called, said they also did attend next week to give evidence in favour of the prisoners.

The Meeting of Parliament.—A Privy Council will be held at Windsor Castle on Thursday next, the 20th inst., when a proclamation will be agreed upon for further prorogation of Parliament from the 27th to an early day in January, then to meet for the dispatch of business.

Opening the Docks.—On Tuesday evening a very numerous meeting of the Parishioners of St. Paul's, Covent garden, was held in the vestry-room, to petition the Queen for the admission of foreign corn and cattle duty free, at which, resolutions, expressing the feelings of the meeting, that it was their duty as men and as Christians, to endeavour by every means to avert the coming danger of threatened famine, and that the most effective means would be to open the ports, were passed, and a petition to the Queen, to that effect, agreed upon. Similar meetings have been held in different parts of the country

On the estate of Lady Headly, within a few miles of Tralee, a woman named Julia Hickey died on the 4th instant, having attained the advanced age of 114 years. She retained full possession of her faculties up to the early part of the present year. There are now living of her descendants 84 grand children, 160 great grand children, and four great great grandchildren.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

The meeting of the Association on Monday was remarkable for a speech of an exciting, if not violent character, from Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P. He commenced it by handing in a large amount of money intrusted to him by Catholic priests in Asheaton and other places in the county of Limerick, and, having thus supplied a text, proceeded to descant upon the poverty of Ireland—the famine which was apprehended. He said he shared in the feeling of despondency which prevailed in and which had shed a gloom over the country. He could not conceal from himself the awful calamity impending over it, which nothing but the interposition of Providence could avert. He did not allude to the threatened calamity with the view to encourage the sentiment of despair; for he called upon the Irish nation to show themselves worthy of the high character they were accustomed to among the nations of the earth. (Hear, hear.) He called upon them to exhibit firmness, foresight, and resolution, such as the exigency required. He hoped that in no case likely to arise they would ask for English charity. (Cheers.) There was still enough of food for the population, and until I was all exhausted he hoped there was not a man in Ireland who would a subscription from England. (Hear, hear.) The were recently told by the London press that if they asked the English people for assistance, and obtained it, they would be obnoxious to the charge of ingratitude if they did not abandon their attempt to recover their national legislature. (Hear, hear.) They should, therefore, prepare to meet any calamity that might arise, like men worthy and desirous of freedom. Never were the people of Ireland made to feel the necessity of a domestic Legislature so completely as at the present crisis. He told the Government they would commit a sin against God, and a crime against man, if they did not call Parliament together before Christmas to consider the state of this country. (Hear.) They ought to tax the property of Ireland for the protection of the people, and they ought to begin by taxing the absentees. (Cheers.) For his part he felt satisfied the resident gentry of Ireland would do their duty in this exigency, but he was not content with the men who attended Newmarket, who resided at Brighton and in the continental towns, who cared little for the condition of their Irish tenantry. Mr. O'Brien, in continuation, said: One of the grounds of the English press were hallooing for coercion against the Irish people—they called for the suppression of the Repeal Association. He told them, for one, he defied them. (Great cheering.)

A Voice.—France and America. (Cheers.)

Mr. O'Connell.—I beg that man may be turned out at once. (Uproar, in the course of which the man who was turned out.) I was saying, continued Mr. O'Connell because I know there are spies abroad, and we must place ourselves out of their power. There has been a paper distributed in the northern parts of this county, intended to create animosity between the landlords. I had the paper sent to the Castle by Mr. Arkins, but no steps had been yet taken to arrest the persons distributing these papers.

Mr. O'Brien proceeded. He would add another word in reference to that topic. He would warn the Government of England not to make an attempt at coercion. At no part of her history was England in greater danger than at present. He would not speak of the elements of danger which existed in her Constitution, both domestic and colonial. (Hear, hear.) He spoke of her position in reference to her foreign power. At this moment she had not in the universal world one friend amongst the nations of Europe. Opposite her shores, within a few leagues of her coast, she had a rival nation, whose chief joy would be to encounter her in arms. (Hear.) That nation had an armed force, possessing every military equipment, unrivalled in power, amounting to 400,000 men, which was supported by a national militia of about a million of armed men; and, as soon as Louis Philippe was no more, an aspiring Prince could not establish his dynasty more firmly in the hearts and affections of the French people than by going to war with England. (Protracted cheers.) England's naval supremacy was no more. France had altered the relation of states to each other as regarded maritime warfare. Now, as regarded steam vessels, the French were very nearly equal in number and force to the English (hear, hear); but the French steam fleet could burn every coast town in England (cheers); and now, he asked his countrymen, what might not take place in the course of the coming year? Who had England to fall back upon, in the event of that calamity? He told her, the Irish people. (Great cheers.) The Irish people had, he now, protected England, and badly were they requited. (Hear, hear.) The dangers he contemplated were not imaginary. The Irish people must be the protectors of the English shore, or the Irish shore as regarded maritime warfare. Now, as regarded steam vessels, the French were very nearly equal in number and force to the English (hear, hear); but the French steam fleet could burn every coast town in England (cheers); and now, he asked his countrymen, what might not take place in the course of the coming year? Who had England to fall back upon, in the event of that calamity? He told her, the Irish people. (Great cheers.) The Irish people had, he now, protected England, and badly were they requited. (Hear, hear.) The dangers he contemplated were not imaginary. The Irish people must be the protectors of the English shore, or the Irish shore as regarded our fleets. (Cheers.) Tell him not of coercion! At this moment Ireland controlled the destinies of the British empire. (Protracted cheers.) He did not wish to trench on this topic with a view to excite hostility against England, but he wished to caution her as to her position. He concluded by telling England that it was to her interest to make friends with the people of Ireland, and sat down amidst a hurricane of applause.

Mr. D. O'Connell rose to hand in money, which done, he proceeded to address the meeting. He condemned the issuing of a commission as being to obtain by a side wind, what they could not obtain openly, and as a means to procure food. Some persons said that high prices would soon throw the ports open, but that was to raise the price of food to famine pitch—so high that the Irish peasant could not purchase it, and before that time, perhaps, other nations would have purchased up all the disposable corn in the markets. From these and other considerations the hon gentleman declared to be secretary of Repeal. The rent for the week was declared to be £300 17s. 6d.

Another Murder.—The Longford Journal details the circumstances of a barbarous murder in that county. Three brothers named Bergus, returning from Longford market on Saturday night, were attacked by a gang of men seen by them, who lay in wait for them, and so brutally used that one of them, William, died on the spot; the two remaining brothers were much injured. Two of the gang have been arrested, and committed to prison.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway.—The acting engineers have nearly completed their operations, and the contracts for the line will be duly deposited, in accordance with the standing orders of Parliament. It is also understood that the negotiations which were entered into in the early part of this year with the Eastern Counties Company, relative to a combination of interests between the two Companies, are likely to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, under arrangements intended to prove highly beneficial to both, and to secure to them such a large amount of traffic. The Right Hon. the Earl of Mornington has become the Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway Company, and the Viscount Wellesley has become a member of the Provisional Committee.

London, Salisbury, and Yeovil Junction.—A special general meeting of this company took place on Thursday, at the London Tavern, John Chapman, Esq., in the chair, who stated that the meeting was called for the purpose of amalgamating this company with the Exeter, Yeovil, and Dorchester, and the Cornwall and Devon Central Railway Companies. Before he put the resolution to the meeting, he would mention that the capital of £1,500,000 had been subscribed for, and the deposit of 10 per cent. paid up. The plans and surveys were completed, and the company had every reason to expect the support of the South Western in the next session of Parliament. The Secretary then read two resolutions authorising the amalgamation, which were agreed to.

The Line from Shoreham to Worthing.—We understand that it is the intention of the London and Brighton Railway Company to open the line from Shoreham to Worthing on Monday next, should the weather continue favourable.

The Great Western Railway.—Increase in Traffic.—A great increase of traffic has taken place on the Great Western Line within the last four months, viz., in July, over the corresponding period of last year, £4499; in August, £7303; September, £6980; October, £7079. This will show an average increase of upwards of £6000 per month, and it is stated that the increase for the half-year ending in December next, will amount to not less than £30,000. Such great increase of traffic has taken place, although some time since a very great reduction was made in the fares.

New Lines Abandoned.—Amongst the railway companies which have notified their intention of temporary abandonment of their undertakings are the following:—Direct London and Manchester, and Bedford, Railway Company; the Stourbridge, Dudley, and Birmingham Railway Company, the Sedgley and Wednesbury Junction Railway Company, and the Torquay and Newton Abbot Railway Company.

Amalgamations.—The Essex and Suffolk, and the Chelmsford and Hury Companies have amalgamated, having amicably arranged their differences. The Southampton, Gosport, and Portsmouth Companies have come to an arrangement with the Southampton, Manchester, and Oxford, on terms which are creditable and will be advantageous to both concerns.

NEW RAILWAYS.

York and Bradford.—This line is intended to take as direct a course as possible from Bradford to the city of York, with the accompanying Act by proceeding by the way of Shipley, and passing near to Baildon, Esholt, Guiseley, Yeadon, Otley, Poole, and Arthington, and there crossing the Leeds and Thirsk Railway, and thence continued in an easterly direction, by Harewood Bridge, Collingham, Linton, to Wetherby, where it will become connected with such railway from Leeds and Wetherby to York as may be sanctioned by Parliament during the ensuing season.

Leeds, Midland, and Lincolnshire Junction.—This line is intended to commence at Swinton, on the Midland Railway, and terminate at Retford by a junction with the London and York and Sheffield and Lincoln Railways.

Regent's Canal.—The allotment letters in this line have been issued, and contain an announcement which might be imitated by other new companies with credit to themselves and to the comfort of the public, namely, "that the committee guarantee the return of the deposit, less a sum not exceeding 7s. 6d per share, should the application to Parliament not succeed in the coming session."

FOREIGN RAILWAYS

Paris and Strasburg.—According to the plans for this line, so far as regards its course over the ground in the neighbourhood of the Seine, the station will be near that of the Northern Railway. The engineer has traced it between the two streets of the Faubourgs of St. Denis and St. Martin. One end will touch the Rue Neuve Chabrol, to the southward, where it will have its principal façade. On the northern side it will extend as far as the projected Rue des Abattoires. The length will be 324 metres, the width and the superfices 2 hectaires 48 centaires. The form will be a paralelogrammatic rectangle.

The Northern Railroad. The Journal des Chemins de Fer states that the first section of the Northern Railroad between Paris and Clermont, in all probability, be opened in the beginning of March, and the s as far as Amiens, in the month of May LOCOMOTIVES ON RAILWAYS.

(To the Editor)

I noticed in your paper of last week a paragraph respecting the rise and progress of Railways. I take the liberty of informing you that you are considerably in error, although I am scarcely old enough to put you right Of one thing, however, I am certain, viz. that Locomotive Engines were used on three Railways in this neighbourhood (Gateshead), at least twelve or thirteen years before the Stockton and Darlington Railway was opened; and, in 1829, I believe a Locomotive Engine to have been first employed on the Killingworth Railway, a colliery, three or four miles N.E. of Newcastle; and, if I be not mistaken, it was in 1813. The first I ever saw was in 1818, at Lemington, four miles W. of Newcastle, where it had then been in operation a considerable time. It is singular that so much misapprehension prevails on a matter of such interest, and so comparatively rec nt.

I should almost venture to suggest a monument to Mr. Chapman, at Killingworth. The Newcastle and Berwick Railway will pass within half a mile of the spot where the first Engine travelled on a Railway. Geo. Prindle.

ELOPEMENT AND MARRIAGE OF LADY ADELA VILLIERS.

In part of our impression last week we announced the sudden disappearance from Brighton of the beautiful and youngest daughter of the Earl of Jersey, on the previous Wednesday. It has been since ascertained that the lady was married on Thursday (last week), at Gretna Green, to Captain Ibbetson, of the 11th Hussars. As the circumstances connected with this occurrence have excited considerable interest, we lay before our readers some authentic particulars connected with it.

As soon as the elopement of Lady Adela was discovered, her brother, the Hon. Captain Villiers, left Brighton in pursuit of her. It was, however, fruitless. Information reached the family from York that Lord Jersey's daughter and Captain Ibbetson breakfasted at the York station on Friday (last week), and were married at Gretna in the afternoon of the same day. Captain Villiers passed through York on Friday morning in pursuit of the fugitives, but on learning the above facts returned to London.

It appears that Captain Ibbetson and the lady arrived in London on the Wednesday evening. On that night, at a few minutes before nine o'clock, the hour for the departure of the Night Mail train, the parties were observed on the platform, and the gentleman, addressing one of the officials, requested to be accommodated with a coupé for himself and his fair companion, an act of attention which was immediately complied.

On arriving at the York station of the North Midland Railway, they breakfasted in the refreshment room.

The fugitives reached Carlisle shortly after one o'clock on Thursday, having thus run a distance of upwards of four hundred miles between that hour and six o'clock on the previous evening. Here they entered the gallant Captain's carriage, and post horses having been furnished in a very few moments, the party dashed through the sheold city en route for "the Border."

To unlearned "Southrons" it may be interesting to know that "mine host of the Hall" unites the somewhat irreconcileable characters of Priest and Boniface in his own person. At the moment of the arrival of the fugitives he was presiding at a dinner, the guests at which consisted chiefly of a staff of engineers, who had come down to survey the line in this Border peaceful neighbourhood. A very short interval occurred, however, before a person entered the room, who delivered what appeared to the guests to be a sort of mysterious message to the chairman, but which in reality was simply a summons to attend "a lady and gentleman who had just arrived from London, and were waiting his presence in 'the saloon' up stairs." With a promptitude which says much for

GRAND FESTIVITIES AT HAREWOOD HOUSE.

TRIUMPHAL ARCH.—PROCESSION OF TENANTRY, &c.

The festal interest of the present Number of our Journal is, fortuitously, of a remarkable character. In the adjoining pages we have illustrated the glittering pageants and the magnificent hospitalities by which the inauguration of London's Chief Magistrate was commemorated on Monday last. This is, altogether, a state exhibition of the metropolis, the cost of which is, in great part, defrayed from the public purse; though, we should not omit, that one of the prime objects of its institution was to signalise private worth, and that honourable course by which merit rises, in this happy country, from the ranks of humble life to posts of administrative dignity and splendour.

Partaking alike of the hospitable spirit of "Old England," and running in the same joyous vein, are the Festivities we are now about to illustrate and describe to our readers. It need, however, scarcely be explained that they are a brilliant example of individual munificence and princely dispensation of the world's wealth, such as it has occasionally been our province to chronicle: but rarely do we remember an instance in which the enjoyment of the masses has been so studiously and successfully kept in view as in the Harewood Festivities. The seat of these rejoicings is the "ancestral home" of the noble house of Harewood—a superb mansion, placed in a park of great extent and beauty, and presenting many sites and scenes especially adapted for an "Old English Festival"—in the splendid saloon, and the rustic glade; on the spacious greensward or the circling course; and massive woods and groves, in themselves presenting lengthened vistas for giving effect to the processional pageants, and yielding an unlimited supply of material for picturesque decoration. The noble property lies near the village of Harewood, at about eight miles from Leeds, a place which good fortune has long stamped her own, and a locality in which the extent and prosperity of manufactures exercise a most beneficial effect upon agriculture. Thus, Harewood lies amidst the elements of enjoyment—in the refined resources of the large manufacturing town, and the more substantial appliances of rustic cheer.

The events which gave rise to the Festival were the Coming of Age, and Marriage, of Lord Viscount Lascelles, the eldest son of the present Earl of Harewood. His Lordship, on removing from his former residence, at Goldsbrough, to Harewood, in October, 1844, was greeted with a "right hartie welcome" by his tenantry and many of the tradesmen of Leeds. We gather further from the Leeds Intelligencer, that, at the public dinner then given to the Noble Earl, he alluded to the coming of age of his eldest son, Lord Viscount Lascelles, on the 18th of June, 1845, and promised that he would endeavour to manifest his sense of the hearty welcome he had received, by celebrating the attainment of his eldest son's majority in a fitting and becoming manner. The Noble Viscount having subsequently (on the 17th of July last) married Lady Elizabeth Joanna de Burgh, the daughter of the Most Noble Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde, and grand-daughter of the late Right Hon. George Canning, it was determined to commemorate the two events—the coming of age and the marriage—simultaneously. The time fixed was from the 4th to the 9th of November instant, and we shall now proceed to illustrate and describe the principal scenes of the style in which the Noble Earl has redeemed his generous promise.

FIRST DAY.—TUESDAY.

A battery of eight carronades was fired at eight o'clock in the morning from a slight eminence to the north of the House, in announcement of the opening of the joyous proceedings. These carronades were subsequently fired at intervals; and the bells of the parish church, which is sweetly embowered in a secluded nook in Harewood Park, were rung merrily during the day.

A very fine Scotch bullock, weighing upwards of fifty stones, was roasted at a spit erected for the purpose, at the northern part of the Park, and afterwards cut up into small portions, and distributed to the multitude. The bullock was put to spit on Monday morning about ten o'clock, and was taken down on the day following at noon.

In different parts of the grounds were placed several butts of "good brown October," brought from their long secure depository—the well-filled cellars of Harewood House. The ale, with some 1000 four-pound loaves of bread, cut into portions, was distributed to all who liked to partake of it; and many were the liege subjects of her Majesty who got jolly on the auspicious day.

We now approach the scene of our first Engraving. First, is the main entrance to the Park, at the village of Harewood. In the centre was a large triumphal arch, formed of evergreens and flowers, in which were depicted the Harewood arms, with the word "Welcome," in flowers—or Anthography. The arch was flanked with laurel columns, from the apex of each of which gaily floated a blue, white, or red silken flag. From the above arch a colonnade, connected by festoons, led to the main arch, at the lodge entrance. The latter arch was surmounted by the Harewood Arms, (in flowers;) and from the centre of the interior of the arch was suspended a costly lamp, emblazoned with the quarterings of the De Burgh and Lascelles arms, &c.

The whole of these festive decorations were well executed, from designs by, and under the direction of, Mr. Parsons, the superintending architect of the works now proceeding at Harewood House; and who, also, materially assisted in designing the interior fittings and decorations for the occasion.

At noon, a procession of the Tenantry and others, on horseback and foot, with two bands of music, was formed at the village of Harewood; whence they advanced, with several richly emblazoned silk banners, to present addresses of congratulation to the Noble Earl.

The procession was headed by William Maughan, Esq., Land-Steward of the Noble Earl; J. G. Smith, Esq., Mr. Parsons, and Mr. Downes, on horseback; followed by the excellent band of the 59th Regiment.

Our first Illustration shows the arch, on entering the park from the village, with the closing of the procession of Tenantry and Deputations.

On the procession arriving at the north or principal entrance of the mansion, on the platform, outside of which were the Earl and Countess of Harewood, Viscount Lascelles, and his amiable and beautiful bride, Lady Elizabeth Lascelles, with many of the junior branches of the Lascelles family, and the distinguished visitors at Harewood House—a deputation presented addresses, engrossed on vellum, to Lord Lascelles, Lady Elizabeth Lascelles, and the Earl of Harewood. We have only space for two of the replies. Lady Elizabeth Lascelles, under feelings of evident emotion, but with dignity and grace, said:—"I cannot, Gentlemen, resist the opportunity of returning you, in person, my most sincere and heartfelt thanks for your cordial and gratifying welcome to my future home. Believe me that it will be my earnest endeavour to prove myself worthy of the esteem and good-will you have so kindly expressed towards me, and I feel confident that, in following the example of those who have received me as a daughter, and emulating their kindness to all around them, will be the most certain means of insuring your indulgence and friendship." (Loud cheers.)

The Earl of Harewood, who was received with loud cheers, returned thanks for the renewed expressions of affection and esteem towards himself and family contained in the address, and added:—"I cordially accept your congratulations on an event that must naturally be so interesting to my family and myself, as that of the marriage of my son. It is to me the cause of the highest gratification, that, while I reflect that his union with a most amiable and excellent person has secured his own happiness, it, at the same time, offers the strongest guarantee that his future career in life will be such as to merit the continuance of that confidence and esteem, which it is my pride to think has always existed between my family and the tenantry by which it is surrounded. (Applause.) Lady Harewood begs me to thank you most gratefully for the warm sympathy and congratulation which you have expressed to her." (Three times three cheers, one cheer more, and much applause.)

Next came

which was served in the splendid banquet-room of the mansion, with the addition of a spacious apartment erected on the West Terrace. The walls of the former were hung with amber and white drapery, and those of the latter bore agricultural and sporting devices. These decorations were cleverly executed by Messrs. Hammerston, of Leeds. At the upper end of the vast saloon was a cross table, at which presided the Noble Host, the Earl of Harewood, supported by the Marquis of Clanricarde, Viscount Lascelles, Lord Edward Hall, Hon. J. S. Wortley, M.P., the Hon. Egremont Lascelles, the Hon. James Lascelles, George Lane Fox, Esq., the Hon. Arthur Lascelles, Edward Yorke, Esq., of Wighill, Lord William Thynne, Lord Dunkellin, the Hon. G. Cavendish, M.P., Thomas Fairfax, Esq., G. Fox, Jun., Esq., Wm. Maughan, Esq., John Maughan, Esq., Thomas Bowle, Esq., Northallerton, the Rev. Jacob Marsham, Colonel Lane, John Gregory Smith, Esq., Colonel Markham, the Rev. Thomas Shepherd, Mr. Starr, Mr. Starkey, Mr. Sturdy, of Harewood; Mr. John Beetham, of Harley, Mr Clarke, of Barforth; Mr. Myers, of Goldsbro', &c. &c.

The Countess of Harewood, Lady E. Lascelles, and a numerous party of female relatives and friends, were also present during the greater part of the proceedings.

The company numbered, altogether, about 400 persons. The dinner was served in excellent style, and the wines were excellent. A party of glee-singers attended.

The band of the 59th Regiment were stationed in the orchestra which had been erected for the occasion, and beautifully decorated by Messrs. Constantine and Ingham, of Leeds, who also fitted up the Ball and Promenade Rooms.

The report of the post prandial proceedings occupies a closely printed column of the Leeds Intelligencer. In proposing the first toast—the Queen—the Noble Chairman mentioned that her Majesty, when Princess Victoria, on her visit to Harewood, occupied the very spot he then stood on. The health of the Noble Chairman was drunk with immense applause.

Mr. George Lane Fox, in proposing "The Lord Viscount Lascelles, and Lady Elizabeth Lascelles," which was drunk with nine times nine, alluded, in a feeling manner, to the grandfather and father of the present Earl of Harewood: the former had served his Sovereign at the Battle of Minden; the latter had distinguished himself as a senator, and done much to improve the manufacturing prosperity of the country. The present Noble Lord had likewise been engaged in public duties. He had held his Sovereign's commission, and on the plains of Waterloo he was one of those heroes who assisted the great general, the Duke of Wellington, in putting down a tyrant, and freeing Europe from his yoke.

The Noble Chairman next proposed "The Tenantry of the Harewood Estate.' He expressed his readiness to co-operate with his tenants in the improvement of their farms, and to assist by every means in his power the encouragement of agriculture. He reverted to a conversation which took place some years ago, between his late father and the then Mr. Coke, of Norfolk. At that time, agriculture was depressed, and Mr. Coke asked his father if his tenants were not in arrears of rent? The answer was "No." "How did that happen?" inquired Mr. Coke; his father quaintly replied, "I never raise my rents." (Cheers.) The Noble Lord continued to observe that the devotion and esteem which his tenantry had evinced to him would not be forgotten, and it was his anxious wish that they should find in him a just and generous landlord. (Cheers.) He would now drink all their good healths—long life and prosperity to them—and when next they met might it be with the same degree of cordiality and affection. (Cheers.) "The Tenantry of the Harewood Estate."

This toast was aptly responded to by Mr. Sturdy, of Harewood, a thirty years' Tenant, who observed, they did not live under a cotton-lord, who, on seeing his tenants getting a few shillings extra, or their families appearing better, began to devise pretences for augmenting the rent. That was not the case with Lord Harewood.

Among the remaining toasts were, "The Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde," "Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding," "The Members of Parliament for the West Riding," "Prosperity to the Town of Lascles," "Success to Agriculture," &c. Mr. George Lane Fox, jun., proposed the concluding toast—one well known in the Harewood Hunt—"The Bramham Park, and Five-and-Twenty Couples."

The company then retired to witness a magnificent display of fireworks, on an eminence a little to the north of the mansion, under the superintendence of Darby, of Vauxhall Gardens. Amongst the devices especially appropriate to the occasion were two of great beauty, one of which contained an inscription, in pyrotechnic characters, of "God Save the Queen—Prosperity to Agriculture;" and the other a motto, "Happy Union!"

SECOND DAY.—WEDNESDAY,

THE RACES.

The principal features of this day's proceedings were Horse-races, in Wheat Cr[illegible] of land well adapted for a course, on the south side of the river Wharfe, and very near to Harewood-bridge. The number of persons who attended the races was estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000; and during the whole of the day the race-field presented a very animated appearance, with its host of well-filled vehicles, hundreds of horsemen, and thousands of pedestrians.

The Earl of Harewood, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and a numerous party of the nobility and gentry from Harewood House, were on the ground shortly after ten o'clock, and remained till the conclusion of the sport. The Countess of Harewood, Lady Elizabeth Lascelles, and several other ladies from Harewood House, arrived on the ground in two open carriages and four, with outriders, and took their seats amidst the applause of the spectators, in a temporary grand stand, erected for their reception, in time to see the last heat for the Silver Cup (head prize for tenants' horses) and the rest of the races.

A plentiful supply of "nut brown ale," from the cellars of the Noble Earl, was distributed on the ground to each of the competitors who chose to apply for it.

The prizes were all the gift of the Earl of Harewood, and were contended for by his tenants only; except "The Lascelles Cup," which was subscribed for by several of the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood, who were also the competitors for the prize: it is of the value of about Eighty Guineas.

The course staked off for the races was nearly in the form of a circle, and about a mile in circumference; and the rest of the ground was shown in one of our Engravings. In the distance, on the brow of an eminence looking over the Wharfe, are the ruins of Harewood Castle, still noble in decay.

THE TENANTS' BALL

was given, in the evening, in the elegant and spacious saloon, wherein the Dinner took place on the previous day. About 800 guests were present, including, besides Tenantry from all parts of the Harewood estates, several ladies and gentlemen from York. Horsfall's excellent quadrille band, from Manchester, was placed in the orchestra, at the end of the gallery, and played a succession of country dances, quadrilles, polkas, &c. Dancing commenced shortly after eight o'clock, and was kept up, almost without intermission, until half-past four on the following morning. The ball was led off in a country dance, by Lord Lascelles and Mrs. John Smith, of Haraley; Lady Harewood dancing with Mr. Smith, Lord Harewood with Miss Smith, of Harewood; Lady Elizabeth Lascelles with Mr. Lancaster, of Morton; and Lord Dunkellin, and several of the junior branches of the Lascelles family, courteously dancing, during the great part of the evening, with the wives and daughters of others of the Harewood tenantry. Refreshments were served in the White Drawing-room

About midnight, a sumptuous supper, with wines of good mark and vintage, was served in the Music-room.

Among the household of the Noble Earl, Mr. Gilbert, the house-steward; Mr. Jenkins, the butler; Mr. Williams, the head cook; Mr. Gibbs, the groom of the bedchamber; and Mr. Barnard, the lady's-maid, are entitled to the best thanks of the Earl of Harewood, are entitled to special mention for their successful exertions in their respective departments.

The last dance was "Sir Roger de Coverley;" the band played the National Anthem; and the happy party separated.

THIRD DAY.—THURSDAY.

The weather, on this as on the preceding days, was fine, and favourable for out-door sports.

The foxhounds of the Noble Earl met in front of Harewood House in the morning at half-past ten o'clock, where there was a large field of horsemen and pedestrians, who afterwards enjoyed several hours of excellent sport.

Subsequently to "the throwing off" of the hounds, a variety of sports and pastimes (with prizes to the successful competitors) took place, in which the humbler classes were the principal participators; the day being more especially devoted to the entertainment of the cottagers, labourers, and workpeople engaged upon the estate. These amusements included foot-races, ball-races, hurdle-chase, climbing soaped poles, jumping, throwing the sledge or bone, bobbing for apples, and other rural sports of "Merry England," such as old Herrick has quaintly enumerated. One of our Illustrations shows the rustic carnival; with a view of the north front of the mansion, and the Corinthian pile, built by the first Lord Harewood: it has a finely-enriched interior, panted ceilings, &c. The grounds and gardens were laid out by "Capability Brown."

About one o'clock, a very numerous party of the labourers and workpeople were treated with an excellent dinner in a spacious pavilion erected for their accommodation close to the west wing of the house. The Earl of Harewood, Lord Lascelles, and other members of the family were present; and the healths of Lord and Lady Lascelles, of the Earl and Countess of Harewood, and several other toasts, were drunk with great enthusiasm. Indeed, the enjoyment of all classes appears to have been universal;

"Whether with ale irrigurous or Champagne."

A numerously-attended and well-conducted dance of the humble classes on the Harewood estate wound up this day's proceedings.

FOURTH DAY.—FRIDAY.

The morning beamed auspiciously; the cannons fired at intervals; meat and bread were given away at the house to the poor, so that none were forgotten. Ale in considerable quantities was also distributed, without regard to "men or measures," in the North Park Yard, notwithstanding the applications were very numerous, they were good-tempered and orderly. In the evening, a magnificent Ball was given to upwards of 700 of the nobility and gentry, which was kept up with great spirit until five o'clock. The Banqueting Room was most superbly refitted for the occasion. It is represented, with the brilliant company, in one of our Illustrations.

FIFTH DAY.—SATURDAY.

This day, the whole of the children, from the ages of seven to fourteen, belonging to Harewood and the adjoining villages and hamlets, were entertained with a good dinner of roast beef and plum pudding, and other good things; after which they had fruit and negus, and drank the toasts to the Lord and Lady Lascelles, and the Earl and Countess of Harewood, as heartily as their elders. The juvenile company adjourned to the lawn opposite the north front, where the boys amused the girls by paying at football, bobbing for apples in water, dusting the sir.ver in flour, dancing, &c., until dark; when they returned home, and were amused in their way in the village with fire balloons and fireworks; thus ending a most joyous succession of fêtes which will be long and gratefully remembered by all who were present.

In conclusion, every thing was planned and carried out with energy and spirit; entered into with great zest; and passed off delightfully. The principal object was to afford amusement to all classes; from the peer to the peasant. And, though certain of the "Sports and Pastimes" may be, by some persons, regarded as obsolete, and better left to the musty pages of Strutt, or the dusty shelves of half-a-dozen libraries, they were in their own way, Time Nobility and Gentry had their gay and glittering ball; the Tenantry their well-spread table; the Rustics their ludicrous revels; and the Children their antic games. Duquestionably, the grand secret of success in all chance together, is to assemble them in scenes of common enjoyment, has those which have just taken place at Harewood. You thus prove that all possess like sympathies, and that the greatest happiness of society must spring from social intercourse.

Yorkshire is proverbial for its hospitalities: on this memorable occasion, the consumption was stupendous. Thus, we find the general Bill of Fare to include: 14 bullocks, 40 sheep, 7 calves, 6 pigs, 400 fowls, 40 turkeys, 100 brace of grouse, 200 brace of partridges, 24 brace of pheasants, 300 brace of hares, 20 brace of woodcocks, 100 couple of rabbits, 95 hams, and 200 tongues. The consumption of "beer and porter" was, we presume, extending to 33 butts. There were also drums 4 hogsheads of wine, 1½ hogshead of punch, and 1½ hogshead of negus

The Ball Supper, on Friday evening, displayed the more recherché elegancies of the cuisine in its soups, hams and tongues, galantines, raised pies, boars' heads, bechamelle chickens, boned turkeys, roast chickens and game, gelées and creams, pâtes, entremets, and pâtes de fois gras: the tables were replenished with the above sumptuous fare; and the three other tables six times

The following is as complete a list as we have been able to obtain of the Nobility and Gentry to whom invitations were sent, and the great portion of whom, with accompanying friends, were present at the Grand Ball on Friday:—

Mr and Mrs. Wharton, Mr. and Miss Lascelles, Aberford; Col. political alliance. In the marriages of the daughters of the Russian Emperors, it is stipulated that they shall remain of the Greek form of faith; but the Grand Duchess Olga is about to marry the Arch-Duke Stephen, of Austria, and, to secure this match, the Emperor consents that the Duchess shall become a Catholic. Thus he has educated his child in a form of faith, which he, without scruple, now orders her to renounce. Nothing can lend more to foster an indifference to religion than the rulers of the world thus making it the mere tool of political and State purposes.

THE scandalous state of our Medical system has been strongly exemplified this week. A man has lost his life by taking an overdose of colchicum, served by a chemist's errand-boy, allowed to sell medicine and poisons, though utterly ignorant of their names, and scarcely understanding English! Here is an extract from his evidence before the Coroner:—

He was in the habit of selling simple medicines. He did not know Latin. He knew that colchicum was a poison if taken in an over-dose. The bottle was labelled "Vin. S. Colch.," which meant colchicum wine, though it was spelled wrong, for the s should have been a e (laughter). Whoever wrote must have been a cockney (continued laughter). He could not tell what the z in the label meant. The reason he sold so much colchicum for a penny (he sold at least sixpenny worth) was, that the little girl who came for it asked for a little drop more, and he gave it to her (laughter).

This may make the "unskilful laugh," but it will certainly also make the "judicious grieve." What can be thought of a system, under which such a thing is possible? Mr. Wakley imputed blame to the deceased man for prescribing for himself; but, what security have the public that a physician's prescription might not be made a death-warrant in the same manner? Six times the quantity asked for was given; had it been the "pennyworth" the poor man seems to have been in the habit of taking, it does not appear that any harm would have been done. It appears that the boy "had orders to sell only such simple things as salts, magnesia, and rhubarb." An ignorant boy ought not to be suffered to sell anything in the shape of drugs; how is he to know a medicine from a poison? In France, a master who permitted such a practice would, in a case like this, be sent to the galleys. What with the general adulteration of drugs, and the carelessness and ignorance of those who sell them, our system of pharmacy sadly needs regulation.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Thursday evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent breakfasted at the Castle this morning, with her Majesty and the Prince Consort, and her illustrious relatives, who are upon a visit to the Queen. Her Majesty and the Prince, with their distinguished guests, afterwards promenaded in the private grounds, visiting the Royal kennel on their return to the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by several of the distinguished visitors, and attended by Colonel Wylde, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Lord Charles Wellesley, proceeded to the Great Park at eleven o'clock, and shot over the Royal preserves in the vicinity of Norfolk Farm. The Duke of Saxe Coburg visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore House, this afternoon. The infant Royal Family took walking and equestrian exercise in the Home Park this morning. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was taken for a carriage drive this afternoon. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort walked this afternoon in the slopes and private plantations. The Royal dinner circle at the Castle this evening will include her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Spaeth, and Lady Anna Maria Dawson. The Court is expected to leave the Castle for a short sojourn at Osborne House, in the course of next week.

BIRTHDAY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The anniversary of the birthday of the Prince of Wales falling on Sunday, it was celebrated at Windsor on Monday. The bells of St. George's Chapel and the parish church rang merrily; and at twelve o'clock a Royal salute was fired from the Corporation ordnance in the Bachelor's Acre. Some of the houses of the Royal trades men were illuminated in the evening, in honour of the event. A Royal salute was fired at noon from the Belvidere Battery, at Virginia Water.

PROPOSED MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—It is said that Captain Lindsay, the hon. member for Wigan, will next month lead to the hymeneal altar the beautiful daughter of the Earl of Mexborough.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE EARLY CLOSING OF SHOPS

On Tuesday night a meeting, promoted by the Metropolitan Drapers' Association, was held at Exeter hall to enhance the object of that body, viz., an earlier termination to the hours of labour in all trades.

Lord R. Grosvenor, on taking the chair, said, the meeting had been called to devise some means of checking a most serious evil. Since 1814 a great indifference had grown up to the wants of the producers of that wealth which was the glory of this country. The fruits of this feeling were to be found in the prolonged hours of labour of the agricultural and shop classes. (Hear.) The Metropolitan Drapers' Association had been working on behalf of an abbreviation of the hours of labour firmly, but properly, and in a conciliatory manner. Many of the large establishments had already set the noble example of shortening the hours in all trades, in which, as Lord Grosvenor) regretted to say, that in the majority of shops in this metropolis, the old debasing system was continued.

Mr R. A. Grainger said, that he was able to hear testimony to the serious, moral, and physical injuries inflicted on the labouring classes by prolonged hours of labour. The Metropolitan Drapers' Association had nobly stepped forward in the van of the movement, for in advocating their own cause they were advocating that of all who suffered under the same evil. (Hear.) He (Mr Grainger) would state all he knew of the physical formation of man, and say that protracted labour was but another name for illness, sickness, and death. (Hear.) He concluded by moving the following resolution —

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Wakley, M.P., who was received with cheering, proposed the second resolution. He said :This great question, which has been mooted by this magnificent association, intimately concerned the whole social system of the country, and it would prove the greatest social movement ever made or instituted in the United Kingdom. (Hear.) It had been urged that if the hours of business were abridged, the profits would be reduced. Well, he (Mr. Wakley) did not care much about increasing any profit at the expense of human life. (Hear, hear.) But it was not the fact that profits would be influenced. All the Government offices were closed at five o'clock, and what absurdity to say, that a piece of calico or a pair of socks could not be bought except at eleven at night. He concluded by moving the following resolution :—

That the meeting, believing the mainstay of the late hour system to be the habit, on the part of the public, of evening shopping, are fixed in the opinion that every [illegible] with numerous [illegible] the evil they are [illegible] Drapers' Association to [illegible] tan Drapers' Association [illegible] collectively, to [illegible] [illegible] set its ob[illegible]

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE BELLS.—The new set of bells have been at length permanently fixed in the tower of the new Royal Exchange. The entire weight of them is about 257 cwt., and the notes are as follow:—B flat, A, A flat, G, F, E flat, D, D flat, C, B flat, A, A flat, G, F, and E flat; the key note C being the largest, which weighs about 54 cwt. will be the hour bell. The former bells, which were put up previous to the splendid edifice being opened by her Majesty, and which weighed only about 14 cwt. were not found sufficiently powerful; when the Gresham Committee ordered the present peal, the tones of which have been heard by several eminent musical gentlemen, by whom they are said to be highly approved of. Some weeks are yet expected to elapse before the tunes which are played upon them will be arranged. There are to be four tunes, two of them as yet determined upon being "God Save the Queen," and "Rule Britannia." The quarter hour is also to be struck by them.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—In consequence of the new improvements taking place in the City, the parish church of St. Benetfink, at the eastern corner of Threadneedle street, in the year of the Royal Exchange, and which was built in 1675, is to be forthwith pulled down, and the parish will be united to the adjoining one of St Peter-le-Poore; some of the bodies interred in the family vaults have already been removed. Those whose remains lie under the body of the church, will, it is said, be placed in the churchyard. The site of the church when taken down (together with old houses at the back), it is contemplated, will be formed into an ornamental piece of ground, surrounded with iron palisading.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.—The total length of Railways now carrying on traffic on the narrow gauge is 1667 miles, and upon the broad 278. The length of miles of rail upon the narrow gauge now in course of construction is 822, and of the same on the atmospheric principle 67. The length of miles of rail on the narrow gauge for lines obtained last session is 2395, and for the broad gauge 455, making a total mileage of 3275. The amount expended on lines open is estimated at £79,327,264; the amount required for lines in progress £12,425,000, and for lines obtained last session £644,332,235, giving a total of £137,034,499. The estimated nett annual earnings of the lines obtained last session is calculated at £8,817,911.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE FIRST SOD OF THE TRENT VALLEY TURNED BY SIR R. PEEL

Thursday being appointed for Sir R. Peel to turn the first sod of the Trent Valley Railway, near Tamworth, considerable interest was excited in the neighbourhood. Shortly after one o'clock, the Mayor of Tamworth and the members of the Corporation proceeded to the Town hall, where they were entertained by the directors of the company at a déjeuner. The company rose to meet Sir R. Peel and party, who approached in several carriages from Drayton Manor. A procession was formed to the ground, and was accompanied by a band. The right hon. baronet looked in but indifferent health; he wore a tall slipper on his right foot, of which he has evidently not yet recovered the full use. Silence being obtained, and the chief personages having got out of their carriages, and assembled round Sir R. Peel, an appropriate address was presented to him.

Sir Robert Peel, leaning on the spade, said—Mr. Edmund Peel, Mr. Mayor of Tamworth, and Gentlemen,—I have great satisfaction, in my capacity as a representative of this borough, and have been

L O R D M A Y O R'S S H O W.

Never! Nor, in fact, is there—ever was there—or ever will there be in any city, or upon any river in the world, such unapproachable and splendacious pageantry. Other waters have been celebrated, but what are they to the Thames on the Tenth of November; other people have embarked upon them, but who were they compared to Lord Mayor Johnson taking water at Blackfriars Bridge! Moore mentions a Lough, with a kind of Horse name (Neigh, we believe), where ——the fisherman strays,—

(he doesn't speak of any other class of the community)—

And sees the round towers of other days
In the waves beneath him shining.

Well, what of that? On Lord Mayor's Day, it isn't to say a single fisherman, but the whole Fishmongers' Company, with Goldsmiths, Spectacle-makers, and Merchant Tailors to boot, are witnesses of the big City's grandeur, blazing away, not "beneath the waves," but all above water, and illumining the bosom of the Thames.

There was some fuss made with Cleopatra when she embarked upon the Cydnus; and, as she flabbergastered some of the Cæsars, and caused Antony to throw away a world, we take it for granted she was a woman worth making a fuss about. So they got up for her golden skies, and purple sails, and amber breezes; and a fine dashing queen she looked as she committed her beautiful freight to the diamond-watered river: but what was Cleopatra to a virtuous Mayor?—the purple-winged vessel to the City Barge?—the Cydnus to London's Merchant River?—and the whole pageant to the embarkation at the bottom of Bridge-street?

Then there was in Venice a puppet, called a Doge, who used to get married to the Adriatic, and jewel her with rings, amid pageantry most magnificent. But your smart Italians were not to be compared to the "Sunday best" people, who line the bridges from London to Westminster; there never was a gondolier like a Thames wherryman; your ginger boats of the blue waters were nothing to the fourpenny steamers; and the fleet of Corporation gingerbread beats a Venetian navy into fits. The result is, that, if any Doge of Venice ever produced a pageant like that of Alderman Johnson, Lord Mayor Confirmed for the metropolis of the British Empire, you are not to take the Illustrated News, containing an account of it—and that is a punishment, at the very least, equivalent to transportation for life!

However, as it is now becoming our vocation to describe the Show—here goes!

The morning of the Tenth was foggy, with a transparency of sun—beautiful for November! The two Mayors got up with the dawn—if there was any—so early, in fact, that it became hardly veracious to call Alderman Gibbs the late Mayor. The Parisians, in their revolutions, erect barriers in the streets—the Police do the same in London on Lord Mayor's Day!

It is much to the annoyance of the two and the four-wheelers,
But Whittle Harvey has it done by all the City-Peelers!

Way was made, however, for the big wigs, through the large thoroughfares, and the carriages of the Mayors and Sheriffs soon arrived at Guildhall,

Where Gog and Magog watch'd the preparations
Superbly making for the Evening's Rations!

Now formed the procession, and it becomes us respectfully to see of what it consisted:

THE LORD MAYOR TAKING WATER AT THE NEW PIER, BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.

First, neatly-rigg'd—to all the people dear—
Marched the blue Constables, the way to clear;
Then, lots of little wags,
With flags—
Urchins in great variety—
Belonging to the R. Marine Society.
Next, 4 Committee—with a man on horse,
Bearing a banner, tattered not a bit, O!
And following them, without the least remorse,
The same repeated, Ditto! Ditto! Ditto!
At last, the City Marshal,
With more Police, to whom we're all so partial.

After this poetical procession came the Distillers' Company—probably, to pay their duty to the Mayor; they advanced with great spirit, and their horses—belonging to men of whiskey—were so frisky, that there was great difficulty in keeping them still. This was a little fermentation which they rectified on their way home. The Spectaclemakers followed the Distillers—and it is a fine old pun to say, a pretty spectacle they made: it was only to be regretted that they did not walk in pairs, for the benefit of those who wished to get a stronger sight of the procession. A great many officials walked upon their legs, and bore the arms of the Wardens and officers.

We have no room to Chronicle the Heralds, nor to blow the trumpets of the Trumpeters, nor to mention the Standard-bearers, Men-at-Arms, Yeomen of the Guard, &c. The Knights, however, increased the splendour of the day; and the Squires fulfilled the people's desires—as, in fact, did also the Common Criers. The Sword-bearers, Water-bearers, and Chaplains were orderly to perfection. All the State Servants looked famously grand; and so, to tell truth, did the Life Guards' Band.

The Lord Mayor, with his coach and six,
Came on in grand array;
On him all hearts and eyes did fix,
He seemed to crown the day.
They blessed him as he rode along,
They wished him happy years;
And they burst the welkin fifty times
With fifty thousand cheers.

We have already intimated that the procession to Westminster bangel Banagher; and the cannon fired to its honour from the shores of the Thames was so explosive, that it nearly burst its banks. But the heroes of the day landed in safety after all the salutes, and were duly escorted to the Courts of Westminster, being there introduced to the Judges by the Recorder in a flaming speech. The Biography of the new Lord Mayor was given by this public lecturer in appropriate terms of compliment, which the Lord Chief Baron echoed in his address to the new functionary, like a good hearty Irish echo, whose lungs were perfectly sound.

From Westminster back to Blackfriars departed the Civic Procession, and there, on its way to glory, it filled the gaze of the admiring people. It was also speedily joined by all the great officers of State, Ministers, Judges, Lawyers, and the like.

Who look'd exceedingly anxious indeed,
To be in time for the Lord Mayor's feed.

The 9th of November, so important an era in the civic history of the ancient city of London, happening this year to be Sunday, Monday last, the 10th, was, in due course, set apart for what has been known from time immemorial by the good people of the metropolis as the "Lord Mayor's Show." At an early hour, the day which was to witness the decadence of one civic monarch, and the rising sun of another, was ushered in by the ringing of bells and other popular demonstrations of rejoicing. Barriers were thrown across all the thoroughfares that communicated with the Guildhall or the streets through which the line of procession was to pass, and the city police, under the superintendence of Mr. Commissioner Harvey, were stationed at suitable distances to preserve order throughout the route.

About half past ten o'clock, the newly elected Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Johnson) arrived in the state carriage, and was received on alighting with considerable applause. The Sheriffs and the late Lord Mayor arrived about the same time. After partaking of an elegant déjeuner provided for the occasion the procession formed in front of Guildhall. The procession left the front of the Guildhall shortly before twelve o'clock, in the following order:—

On leaving the Guildhall, the procession passed through King-street, Upper Thames street, Arthur street West, King William-street, Mansion-house-street, the Poultry, Cheapside, St. Paul's Churchyard, Ludgate-street, Ludgate hill, and New Bridge-street, to Blackfriars-bridge, where the embarkation took place.

Along the whole route, the day being fine, a vast concourse of people had assembled, while nearly every window was occupied by well-dressed ladies, anxious to get as good a view as possible of the "show."

The Lord Mayor elect was received throughout with every demonstration of respect, and occasionally with considerable cheering; not so his predecessor. Hence at various points in the route, especially at Walbrook and the junction of Cheapside with St. Paul's Churchyard, the ex-Lord Mayor was met with loud and repeated expressions of disapprobation.

The embarkation of the Lord Mayor and suite for Westminster took place at one o'clock, amidst a discharge of cannon and loud general cheering. The effect of the procession as it went from Blackfriars-bridge at this moment, was very fine; the river, in addition to the state and city barges, being covered with a vast number of boats, many of which accompanied the procession to Westminster-hall.

The ceremony of swearing in the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor then took place, according to ancient custom, before the Barons of the Exchequer.

About two o'clock, the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Alderman John Johnson, entered the Court of Exchequer, accompanied by the late Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, the Recorder, and the whole of the civic officers, and, as heretofore, took his station, supported on the right and left hand by the Recorder and Sword bearer, in the place appointed to the use of her Majesty's Counsel. As is usual on this occasion, the court was densely crowded, a large portion of the auditory being composed of ladies.

The various parties concerned having duly taken their respective places, The Recorder, in appropriate terms, presented the new Lord Mayor to the Court.

The Lord Chief Baron then said My Lord Mayor, I congratulate you upon your accession to the high office of Lord Mayor of the city of London, to which you have been called by the choice of your fellow-citizens. You have devoted many years, it appears to a life of industry and enterprise, which seem to have been crowned with complete success You have, before the reason been called to the discharge of various public duties, wherein you have distinguished yourself by their faithful and effective performance, and have thus earned the gratitude of your fellow citizens, which appears to have been recognised in the manner just alluded to by the learned Recorder I doubt not that a faithful discharge of the high duties to the performance of which you are now summoned, will, at the close of your term of office, entitle you to the further gratitude and esteem of your fellow citizens. My late Lord Mayor, I congratulate you, that, after a faithful, a zealous, and a satisfactory performance of the duties of your late high office, you now retire into comparative private life with the esteem, the respect, and the gratitude of your fellow citizens

The Queen's Remembrancer (Mr. Vincent) then administered the customary oaths to the Lord Mayor.

Mr. Baron Alderson next administered the usual oath to Mr. Alderman Gibbs, the late Lord Mayor, whereby he undertook to make and render a true and faithful account to her Majesty's Exchequer of all moneys, &c., which had passed through his hands by virtue of his late office.

Whilst this form of oath was being read by the learned Baron, there was a general titter throughout the court.

The usher of the Exchequer then called upon Mr Alderman Gibbs, late Lord Mayor of London, to come forth and render his account

This sum ons was followed by a burst of laughter from nearly every person in the court

The other customary formalities having been gone through, the ceremonial terminated by the withdrawal of the civic functionaries

A procession then proceeded by water to Barkwiars bridge, where it debarked, and proceeded in the same order as before passing up New Bridge-street to the Obelisk, where it was joined by the Ambassadors, her Majesty's Ministers of State, the Nobility, Judges, Members of Parliament, and other persons of distinction invited to the banquet at Guildhall. It then passed up Ludgate hill, through St. Paul's Churchyard, along by King street, to its destination

THE BANQUET AT GUILDHALL.

In the evening, the Lord Mayor gave the usual inaugural dinner, in the Guildhall on the most sumptuous and magnificent scale

The hall was most tastefully and appropriately decorated. The walls were covered with waving flags and gorgeous banners, "escutcheons and signs of conquests," and manifold memorials of men and events of civic celebrity in former times. The light was supplied by three splendid chandeliers, pendent from the roof, and innumerable gas jets, so disposed as to delineate in lines of light the fine Gothic arches, lofty pillars, and other architectural characteristics of this ancient edifice.

At four o'clock the guests began to assemble, but the company did not sit down to dinner till after seven. Sir J. Graham entered the hall shortly after six o'clock, and was loudly cheered as he passed on to the Councilchamber. Among the company present were—

The late Lord Mayor, his Highness the Prince Hilal of Muscat, several of the Foreign Ministers, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Eldon, Lord William Lennox, Viscount Sidney, Viscount Jocelyn, Lord Dudley Stuart, Lord Ernest Bruce, Lord Robert Grosvenor, Lord Mountford, Lord Harris, the Lord Chief Justice Tindal, the Lord Chief Baron, Mr Vice Chancellor Wigram, Mr Justice Patteson, Mr Baron Alderson, Mr. Baron Platt, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, the Right Hon. Sir James Graham, Bart., the Right Hon Admiral Sir G Cockburn, the Right Hon. Henry Pierrepoint, Mr. H. Thomas Lowry Corry, M P., Mr W Bingham Baring M P., the Dean of Westminster, the Hon. Henry Pierrepoint, Sir William Curtis, Sir Byam Martin Bond Head, Sir Edmond Antrobus, Sir Hesketh Fleetwood, Sir Harry Goring, Sir Robert Inglis, the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the East India Company, Colonel Wood, M P., Colonel T Wood, M P., &c.

The following is the general bill of the fare which was provided for the occasion —

240 tureens of real turtle, containing 5 pints each; 200 bottles of sherbet, 6 dishes of fish 30 entrées, 4 boiled turkeys and oysters, 60 roast pullets, 60 dishes of fowls, 45 ditto of capons, 6 ditto of Capt White's Selim's true India curries, 50 French pies, 60 pigeon pies, 53 hams, ornamented; 43 tongues, 2 quarters of house lamb, 3 barons of beef, 3 rounds of beef, 2 stewed rumps of beef, 14 sirloins rumps, and ribs of beef, 6 dishes of sago ragus, 60 ditto of mashed and other potatoes, 44 ditto of shell fish, 4 ditto of prawns, 140 jellies, 30 blancmanges, 40 dishes of tarts, creamed; 40 dishes of almond pastry, 30 ditto of oranges and other tourtes, 20 Chantilly baskets, 60 dishes of mince pies, and 36 salads

THE REMOVES —60 roast turkeys, 6 leverets, 80 pheasants, 24 geese, 40 dishes of partridges, 15 dishes of wild fowl, 2 pealfowls

DESSERT.—100 pine-apples, from 2lb. to 3lb. each; 200 dishes of hot-house grapes, 250 ice-creams, 50 dishes of apples, 100 ditto of pears, 60 ornamental Savoy cakes, 75 plates of walnuts, 80 ditto of dried fruits and preserves, 50 ditto of preserved ginger, 50 ditto of rout cakes and chips, and 46 ditto of brandy cherries.

WINES.—Champagne, Hock, Claret, Madeira, Port, Sherry

After the accustomed toasts, the Lord Mayor proposed "Her Majesty's Ministers"

Sir James Graham, in responding to the toast, apologised for the absence of his Right Hon. Friend, Sir Robert Peel. Nothing but severe indisposition, from which he had partially recovered, could have prevented him from being present on this occasion. But for that Right Hon Gentleman, and for himself Sir James Graham, he begged to state that it was to them an object of real pleasure and satisfaction to accept the invitation of the citizens of London, on an occasion like the present. The Government felt what had been so truly stated by the Lord Mayor, namely, the trade and commerce of this great city, that the prosperity and interest of London were connected with the welfare and prosperity of the whole empire. The administration of the Government of such a country as this must be subject, from time to time, to occasional difficulties which, which no human foresight could anticipate, and no human prudence could avert. In fact, there would be unexpected difficulties arising in the progress of the trade and commerce of this great city, that the prosperity and interest of London were connected with the welfare and prosperity of the whole empire. Mr. Westrop was the director, and Mr. Dorrell, the accompanyist. The next meeting will be on Monday week. NATIONAL SPORTS.

At the instance of Government, steps have been taken to procure deposit in the British Museum of charts or maps of all the Railways executed and projected in Great Britain, up to the present time. It appears to be high time that the gridiron atlas, exhibiting in one full view the network which covers the face of our Island seamed and scarified by the most malignant disease that ever fell upon fair Nature, or threatened an untimely end of the picturesque. Happy be the hour in which we write it, "the crisis is over, and has left the patient much better than could be expected." But, although the danger is past, it is well that a memorial of it should be preserved for future generations. Above all, the lover of woodcraft is concerned in the health and well-being of the rural districts. The very existence of his craft was menaced by that iron epidemic which raged during the past summer in every nook and corner of merry England. For him, therefore, the 30th of November—the necromancer whose coming laid the evil spirit of the Rail—should be a day of solemn ceremonial, such as the 5th of that ilk is to every good patriot. On each anniversary of such propitious day, a copy of the atlas aforesaid should be burned in front of every kennel of hounds in the kingdom; and if the whips were to dress up, out of their cast off coats, in imitation of a "Guy," a "Hudson," and hang it on the dog-horse gibbet, it would greatly add to the eclat and character of the rite. Now that the drought, which prevailed since the season set in, has been quenched by some genial showers, for hunting will go on, and may it prosper. The mixed treatment of fixtures is general, and it does our old heart good to see one of our own chronological rats advertise himself the hunt every day in the week! Tom Smith! may the shadow never on less; neither the hunted which propels that

PROVIDING FOR THE WANTS OF MARTINMAS AND THE COMING WINTER, DISPOSING OF STOCK, OR VICTUALLING FOR HOME CONSUMPTION; AND WITNESSING THE BULL-RUNNING.

Suppose that you have seen
The new appointed Mayor at Queenstairs
Imbarke, in royalty, his own company
With solem streamers, the young gazers
pleas'ure,
Pastred with different fancies;—have beheld
Upon the golden galleries manie p'aying,
And the horns echo, which do take the land
Of other sounds: now view the city barge
Beare its huge bottom through the farrowed Thames,
Stretching the adverse surge. O do but think
You stand in Temple Gardens, and beside
London Lereell, on her proud stream afloat;
For so appears the fleet of magnificy,
Holding due course to Westminster.—Henry V.

Martinmas, (Nov. 11,) was formerly kept with great feasting: one of the delicacies being a fatted goose. In some Church expences on this day, we find entries of "bred and drynke for the syngers," "rose garlands, wyne, and ale." Victualling, or laying in of meat, and curing it for winter consumption, was the business of this day.

THE WOODCOCK.

Queen Elizabeth's Accession, (Nov. 11,) was long observed as a Protestant Festival; and with the Society of the Temple; the Exchequer; Christ's Hospital, Westminster, and Merchant Tailors' Schools; it is still kept as a Holiday.

St. Cecilia, (Nov. 22,) is regarded as the patroness of Music, her skill having been, traditionally, so great, that an angel who visited her, was drawn from the mansions of the blessed by the charms of her melody; to which Dryden alludes in his celebrated Ode to Cecilia. Milton has, also, some lines on this day, in his Il Penseroso. Concerts were common on St. Cecilia's Day, in the times of Dryden and of Pope.

St. Andrew, (Nov. 30,) is the tutelar Saint of Scotland: he suffered martyrdom on a cross in the form of an X; which is introduced as part of the insignia of the Scottish order of the Thistle. St. Andrew stands first among the Saints in the Prayer Book arrangement, because he first found the Messiah (John i. 18). Advent Sunday is, therefore, the Sunday nearest this Feast. St. Andrew's Feast is kept as a Holiday at the Bank, Customs, and Excise.

November was said by the ancients to be under the tutelage of Diana; from hunting and field-sports being general in this month. The cheerful and lively music of several packs of Harriers and of Beagles, in full cry, are now often heard, reminding us of

The hounds shall make the welkin answer them,
And fetch shrill echoes from the hollow earth.—SHAKESPEARE.

Our artist has depicted the old barbarism of Bull-running, formerly practised in certain places, on the day six weeks before Christmas; as at Stamford and Tutbury. The hivle-skivle, and tag-and-rag of the scene are thus described in a ballad of the early part of the last century:—

Before we came to it, we heard a strange shouting,
And all that were in it looked madly;
For some were a Bull-back, some dancing a Morrice,
And some singing Arthur O'Bradley.

I. T."

The Illustrations of the Natural History and Astronomical Sections have been engraved from drawings by Mrs. Glaisher. We annex two specimens:—

"The month of December is distinguished this year (1845) by the great number of stars occulted by the Moon. On the 29th there will be two stars in Taurus, which will disappear at the dark limb of the Moon, and will reappear at the bright limb, and one other star will just graze the Moon. And on the 31st day there will be two other stars, which will disappear and reappear. To facilitate these observations, and to enable persons to know at what points of the Moon to look for these several disappearances and reappearances, we give the following engraving. The letter V on the top of the Moon refers to the highest point of the Moon, at the times of the phenomena. The Moon at the time is about 11 or 12 days old.

The disappearances are all at the dark side of the Moon, and of course at some distance from the illuminated portion; that of β^1 Tauri will disappear at that part of the Moon marked 1 at 6h. 55m., in the evening, and it will reappear at the bright limb at 7h. 44m., at that part marked 2; at 7 57 the Star β^2 Taur. will just touch the Moon at the part marked 3, or it will graze along the Moon's border. At 8h. 19m., the Star β Tauri will disappear at the place marked 4, and it will reappear at the place marked 5, at 9h., 33m. These occurrences will all take place on the 29th day; and the stars are of the 4th magnitude. On the 31st day at 2h, 22m, in the morning the Star 119 Tauri will disappear behind the Moon at the part marked 6, and at the part marked 7 another Star 120 Tauri will disappear at 3h. 28m, A M; these two stars will reappear respectively at the bright limb, at the parts marked 8 and 9, at 3.1. 49m., A M., and at 4h. 26m., A M."

TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY—SPADE.

On Thursday, the ceremony of turning the first sod of the Trent Valley Railway was performed by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, at Tamworth. A Spade was manufactured for the occasion, at a very short notice, by Messrs. Elkington and Co., of Birmingham. The metallic part is in electro-silver, and shaped somewhat in the form of an heraldic shield. On the front are engraved the arms, crest, and motto, of the Right Honourable Baronet, and underneath is the following inscription:—

ORNAMENTAL SPADE, USED BY SIR ROBERT PEEL IN COMMENCING THE TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY.

The works of the Trent Valley Railway, from Stafford to Rugby, were commenced on the 13th day of November, 1845; on which occasion, the first sod was turned by the Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., upon lands in the Parish of Tamworth, and County of Stafford.

On the reverse of the Spade is engraved the Official Seal of the Trent Valley Railway Company; together with the names of the Chairman, Edmund Peel, Esq.; the Directors, Engineers, Solicitor, Secretary, &c.

The shaft, or tree, is formed from a piece of old English oak—the upper part dividing into two branches forming the handle—appropriately carved with oak-leaves, acorns, &c., and highly polished.

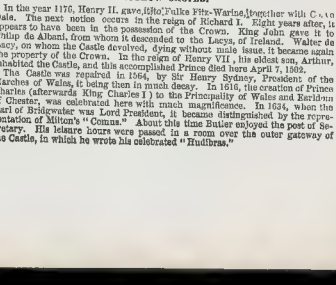
Our artist was present at the ceremony, of which we shall, next week, present to our readers an Illustration.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

LUDLOW CASTLE.

This beautiful Ruin is situated on the west side of the picturesque and much-admired town of Ludlow. The Castle was built in the year 1070, by Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, and was called Dinan, and Llystwytog, or the Prince's Palace.

Roger, son of Roger de Montgomery—surnamed by the Welsh, Gosh, or red-headed—succeeded to the Earldom, upon whose decease his eldest son, Robert de Belesme, possessed the Castles of Ludlow, Shrewsbury, and Bridgnorth. He was deprived of these, and all his other possessions in England, by Henry I., because he favoured the cause of Robert, Duke of Normandy. Nothing more is recorded of this Castle till the reign of Stephen, who besieged it, and captured it; the Governor having deserted his Sovereign, and joined the Empress Maud.



LUDLOW CASTLE.

In the year 1176, Henry II. gave it to Fulke Fitz-Warine, together with Corve Dale. The next notice occurs in the reign of Richard I. Eight years after, it appears to have been in the possession of the Crown. King John gave it to Philip de Albani, from whom it descended to the Lacys, of Ireland. Walter de Lacy, on whom the Castle devolved, dying without male issue, it became again the property of the Crown. In the reign of Henry VII., his eldest son, Arthur, inhabited the Castle, and this accomplished Prince died here April 7, 1502.

The Castle was repaired in 1564, by Sir Henry Sydney, President of the Marches of Wales, it being then in much decay. In 1616, the creation of Prince Charles (afterwards King Charles I.) to the Principality of Wales and Earldom of Chester, was celebrated here with much magnificence. In 1634, when the Earl of Bridgwater was Lord President, it became distinguished by the representation of Milton's "Comus." About this time Butler enjoyed the post of Secretary. His leisure hours were passed in a room over the outer gateway of the Castle, in which he wrote his celebrated "Hudibras."

During the usurpation of Cromwell, the Castle was garrisoned with the King's troops, but was surrendered to the Parliamentary forces on the 9th of June, 1646. The Lords Presidents were abolished in 1688. From that date the decay of the Castle may be reckoned. No longer guarded, it fell into neglect, and the inhabitants enriched themselves with the spoil of its curious and valuable ornaments. Over the entrance to the interior still remain the arms of the Sydney family, above which are the arms of England and France quartered.

The dilapidation of this Castle was much hastened by its being unroofed by order of George I. Its present condition, despite the heraldic remains, emphatically records the triumph of time over the proudest efforts of human labour.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

COLONEL REID, M.P.

George Alexander Reid, Esq., of Bulstrode Park, Bucks, is a Colonel in the Army, at present commanding the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards, the Household troops stationed at Windsor, and is the successful candidate for the representation of that borough. Throughout the canvass, the election was contested by Mr. Walter, the influential proprietor of the Times, who stood on the Anti-Ministerial and Anti-Poor-Law interest. Finding, however, that his chance of success at the poll was very doubtful, he resigned the contest, and Colonel Reid had a very easy victory over Mr. Rupert Kettle, a barrister, who started at the eleventh hour, but did nothing save make a speech at the hustings on the day of nomination. The show of hands was declared to be in favour of Colonel Reid, and Mr. Kettle did not demand a poll. Mr. Moss, his proposer, protested against the election, and it was stated that the matter would be noticed in another place. Colonel Reid was then declared duly returned.

The Hon. and Gallant Member may be described as a Conservative, "seeing nothing at all objectionable in the spirit" of the New Poor-law, supporting the Ministry, but reserving a right to form his own judgment as to their measures. As the Household troops are exempted from the operation of the act requiring soldiers to be withdrawn from towns during an election, some collision took place between the men of Col. Reid's regiment and the inhabitants, which, though producing no serious result, has been made the subject of some discussion.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS.

On Monday evening, Mr. Mitchell entertained his visitors with a rich feast of amusement, treating them to three vaudevilles, produced in this country for the first time, a better selection than which could not have been made. The incidents of the first piece, "La Demoiselle Majeure," turn upon the means resorted to by a certain male to get a husband for his niece; to effect which, he passes her off as his wife, in order the more successfully to ensure to her attention and admiration. Madlle. Martelleur made her first appearance on the English stage in the part of the niece, Athenais Boisjolin, and is herself one of the most agreeable novelties yet presented at this theatre. She has a pleasing and expressive countenance, is very graceful and lady-like in her manner, and acts with great ease and finish. The part allotted to her was of a very trifling description, but she made a great deal of it. We must also notice Monsieur Narcisse, who is a very amusing actor, and played carefully throughout the piece; imitating Arnal, however, rather too closely to be original. The vaudeville was followed by a little piece, "Deux Filles à Marier." Madame de Rocheral (Madame Dumeny) possesses a farm, and two daughters, which articles she wishes to dispose of as soon as possible. But those seeking to engage the farm are mistaken for those seeking to be engaged to the daughters, and there necessarily occurs great equivoque and confusion. Herviel (M. Cartigny) calls about the farm, and is departing in high dudgeon at the misunderstanding, when he is lured by the winning smiles and seducing words of the younger sister, Rosse (admirably played by Mdlle. St. Marc), to remain, and sue for the hand of the elder one, Athenais (Mdlle. Anna Grave) —it being necessary that the latter should be married before the former, who is already betrothed to a sous-préfet, whose acquaintance and consanguinity Herviel willingly forms, by marrying the elder sister. Cartigny was quite at home in his part; and with his happy aptitude for delivering the clever and racy calembourgs with which the piece abounds, the grotesque situations in which he is placed, and the hearty shouts of laughter he brought down throughout, made the play most successful.

The concluding piece was "Le Capitaine Roquefinette," a comedy which had an immense run in Paris, and was also played at our Adelphi, but with less success, owing to its deterioration by translation. The character of Roquefinette is taken from that of a hero in Alexandre Dumas' novel of the "Chevalier d'Emmental;" but the incidents and plot of the piece are original. Lafont—in the principal character (which closely resembles that of Don Cæsar de Bazan), continually falling into scrapes and intrigues, and as continually getting out of them, with great benefit to himself—acted with all that buoyant drollery and merry swagger which characterises his performances. He remains on the stage almost throughout the piece; and, indeed, deserved the honour—the only one of the kind conferred during the evening—of being called before the curtain at its conclusion. The plot is exactly similar to that of the translation at the Adelphi, which was there called "The Soldier of Fortune." Cartigny again caused our sides to shake in the part of the Baron de Valebranche, whose wife is the intrigante of the piece—a part, by the way, which might have been much better filled, rich as Mr. Mitchell's troupe is in graceful and pretty actresses. M. Narcisse made great fun by his amusing assumption of the Chevalier de Castagnac, a court poet. The scenery of the last piece was very magnificent; and we may remark upon the happy taste of the decorator in making the flat nature of the drawing-room scene of the same character with that of the theatre itself, rendering the coup d'œil singularly novel and striking. Altogether, seldom has there been a merrier or more satisfactory performance at this theatre; and the presence of the usual concourse of the aristocratic and fashionable world proves that the lessee's exertions do not pass unrewarded.

SCENE FROM "LA PARTIE DE CHASSE DE HENRI QUATRE," AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

Our Illustration is from the comedic-vaudeville of "La Partie de Chasse de Henri Quatre," of which we gave a notice last week, as performed at the St. James's Theatre, by the French company. Henri (M. Lafont) has lost his way during the hunt, and, being benighted in the forest, falls in with a peasant, Michaut (M. Cartigny), who, at first, takes him for a poacher; and, afterwards, upon Henri representing himself as a gentleman of the King's suite, offers him a situation for the night. The story, as we before observed, resembles that of the "Miller of Mansfield."

With the exception of the pieces noticed above, there have been no novelties brought forward this week in the dramatic world. A five act comedy by a son of Mr. Sheridan Knowles is, however, underlined at the HAYMARKET; and Mr. Webster has just returned from Paris, whither he has been in search of something new for the winter. The attraction of Mr. Macready, at the PRINCESS', appears to be on the increase, if possible, as his engagement approaches its termination. His Othello drew together an audience, in every respect, as crowded as on the first night of his appearance. He was excellently supported by Mr. Wallack as Iago, Mr. Cooper as Cassio, Mrs. Terman as Emilia, and Mrs. Stirling as Desdemona. The ballet is also of service to the treasury, and, from the excellence of construction, does not appear in any degree to interfere with the Adelphi adaptation of "Le Diable à Quatre." Both are most entertaining. The engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy at the OLYMPIC has been a wise piece of policy on the part of the management. They have been playing in Mr. Oxenford's clever farce of "Gone to Texas" during the week, to very fair audiences, and the piece has gone off with roars of laughter. We cannot omit to mention the admirable performance of Mr. James Browne, at this house, in a drama called "The Last Man." The piece is, if we mistake not, a very old one, and the character was originally sustained by Mr. Davidge. Mr. Browne's acting, in the second act, was one of the cleverest bits we have seen for a long time. The LYCEUM closes this evening, until after Christmas, the fortunate lessees, Messrs. Strutt, Keeley, and Wilmott, having again cleared a very considerable sum.

It is the general remark of persons acquainted with theatrical matters, that the principal houses have never been doing so well, taking them altogether, as at present. From this fact, we may possibly except DRURY LANE, the failures of "The Fairy Oak," and "The Princess who, &c.," having proved as complete as the direct enemies of the management could desire. Great expectations are, however, formed of Mr. Wallace's opera, advertised for production this evening. To revert to the other houses, their flourishing condition is more remarkable at this precise time of the year, which managers have been accustomed to look upon as anything but profitable. The secret has been, however, in a happy catering for the public taste, and a spirited production of novelties in place of the conventional resuscitations, which lessees were wont to exhume about this time under the impression that the wants of London had scarcely settled down again after its autumnal travels, and that "anything would do until after Christmas." Managers may rest assured that as long as they produce what is really good, and acquire the character of being energetic and liberal, with the public (who are getting vastly keen and perceptive in such matters) there will always be a sufficient quantity of play-goers in town, let the season of the year be what it may, to remunerate them most amply.

"GOWN AND TOWN ROW," AT OXFORD.

On Wednesday evening (Nov. 5) a scene of much tumult occurred in the usually quiet streets of Oxford, occasioned by the getting up of a "Gown and Town Row."

In olden times great animosity existed between the "Gown" and "Town;" and serious frays often occurred, weapons were used, and historians relate that lives were often sacrificed in these frays. There is a tradition that in Brewer's-lane (an old thoroughfare leading out of St. Aldate's-street), the gutters ran with blood; certain it is that a terrific combat once took place there, and that much blood was shed.

The rabble of the "Town," and the "Gown," with their friends, still, at certain times, continue their "rows," more particularly on the 5th of November, when the "Gown" parade the streets in ranks, and, being met by the "Town," fireworks are thrown about, fighting commences, and a regular mêlée ensues. However, nothing serious happens, but a few bruises, loss of caps, &c.

Last Wednesday evening the "row" was kept up with more vigour than it has been for some time.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Lucerne State Gazette announces the detection of the assassin of the Councillor Leu, who has finally confessed the crime. The culprit, named S. Muller de Stechenzen, deposed that he shot M. Leu with a fowling-piece toward wi h a carbine ball; which was afterwards discovered hidden in a secret passage. Muller, moreover, confessed that he had way laid his victim on two previous occasions. The murderer declares tha he was bribed by the political enemies of M. Leu, and one of the persons compromised by his confession, Dr. Casmir Pfyffer, has been already arrested; 50,000f. was the bribe offered. The Libera. Paris papers discredit this confession, and denounce it as having been extorted by the Jesuits for their own detestable purposes.

A letter from Palermo, dated Oct. 30, has the following: "Yesterday the King of Naples gave a grand dinner at his chateau 'La Favorite,' and in the evening an opera was performed at the Gaia Theatre by some of the best singers from Naples, who were brought over for that purpose. Both entertainments were given in honour of the Emperor and Empress of Russia, and it was expected that both would have been present, but shortly before the dinner hour apologies arrived, and it is supposed, from the Emperor not appearing, that the Empress is worse than usual." The route of the Emperor of Russia, after leaving Sicily, is not exactly known, beyond the fact that he will visit Naples and remain there for two days. It is thought that he will visit Rome, for the purpose of having an interview with the Pope, and that thence he will proceed, by way of Vienna, to Warsaw.

In consequence of the fear of a scarcity of corn, the Council of Administration of the Kingdom of Poland, has resolved to maintain in force, until further orders, the prohibition to export rye, barley, and oats, and likewise to forbid the exportation of peas, oatmeal, straw, and hay.

Jacob Stutz, a Swiss writer, well known for his excellent "Pictures of Popular Life," written in the Zurich dialect, recently died, near Sternenburg (Berne). His poems are more than a mere happy imitation of German writers, and, although not possessing the highest order of genius, much talent. He built with his own hands a hut of small planks in the woods, which he christened Jacob's cell, and here he ended his days, after a short illness from disease of the chest.

The Journal des Débats publishes accounts from Constantinople of the 23rd ult., announcing that the difference which had arisen between the Porte and the Ambassador of France, on the occasion of the murder of Father Charles in Syria, had been adjusted, and that the Divan had fully acquiesced in the demands of Baron de Bourquenev.

Letters from Stuttgard, of the 29th October, mention the return of M. Rouge to that city on the previous day. They add: "Yesterday he celebrated divine service at Esslingen, which was very well attended, and will officiate on Sunday next at Stuttgard, and, on his return to Silesia, again visit Frankfort."

Accounts from St. Petersburg mention that some important changes have been made in the Turkish Ministry. Reschid Pacha, Ambassador in Paris, is appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs, an appointment which is likely to give satisfaction Sarim Effendi, at present Ambassador in London, goes in the same capacity to Paivas, and Chekib Effendi, the late Minister of Foreign Affairs, and at present commissioner in Syria, goes as Ambassador to London. Bahri Effendi, the secretary of the Embassy in Paris, remains in Paris in the meantime as Chargé d'Affaires

A letter from Copenhagen announces that M. Reinhardt, Professor of Geology at the University, died of apoplexy on November 30. The deceased was a Councillor of State, and one of the Directors of Public Instruction He was the author of some valuable works, and had translated into Danish Cuvier's works. He succeeded in the museum of natural history and his library to the University of Copenhagen

The St. Petersburgh Gazette of the 27th ult., publishes a bulletin from the Russian army of the Caucasus, which states, that after the expedition of General Schwartz into the territory of the Didoizes, tranquility remained undisturbed throughout the month of September at every point occupied by the Russian troops, that the insurgents are exhausted by the effects of the year's c.. sign, but at the same time that the forces of the Russian troops are kew constantly under arms, ready to repel any attempts that may be made by the enemy.

On the 31st ult., the following murder took place near Garlene, in Corsica. A young man of some property, named Quuchini, had paid his addresses to a dress maker, named Angelina Francesconi, and had promised to marry her, but broke his engagement a few days after. On this she ran s elter wards, Angelina, who had procured a pistol, seeing her former lover, went to his house, and after a short conversation fired. Her victim fell mortally wounded and died at the end of a few hours. The murderess fled, and had not been captured when the account left.

A Vienna letter of the 2d says:—"The fall in our funds during the last few days was occasioned, independently of a false report of the death of the King of the French, by the sinking of the funds of Paris, London, and Berlin, and not from any embarrassments experienced by our capitalists The publication of a notice from the President of the Council of Finance, that all persons who designedly spread false news on the Exchange will be prosecuted, will not fail to intimidate fraudulent speculators. It is most upon railroad shares that reports are hitherto principally based therefore we may be thankful to our Government for having taken upon itself all the great lines of railroads."

The New York Sun has a paragraph on ship-building affairs, from which it would appear that the Americans are striving to outdo the builders of this country in the construction of large steam vessels. It states that "there are now building at New York a steamer to be called the Hudson, which will be fifteen feet longer than that monster ship the Great Britain; another, which will be of the burden of 1200 tons; and one, not named yet, which will be 200 tons more, will carry 2500 passengers, and, if on the Mississippi, would freight 5000 bales of cotton."

A German journal publishes the following reply of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge to the address of the Municipality of Hanover: —"I rejoice sincerely that Hanover is so happy as to have her King in his own country. The conviction I have long felt that this is a great blessing, is confirmed in a striking manner, by seeing the great and numerous reforms which have been made since the accession of my brother to the throne. I have also ever regarded it as a great benefit to a country that the succession to the Crown should remain assured in the line prescribed by the decrees of Heaven, and I am delighted at the happy event of the birth of an hereditary Prince, upon which I could not refrain from coming to congratulate his Majesty in person."

THE RIGHT HON. JOHN JOHNSON, LORD MAYOR.

Mr. Alderman John Johnson, who has just been chosen by his fellow citizens to fill the highest civic office for the ensing year, represents the ward of Dowgate, to which he was elected in the year 1839. He served the office of Sheriff, with Sir James Duke, Alderman of Farringdon Without, as his colleague, in 1835.

The Recorder, in presenting the Lord Mayor in the Court of Exchequer, at Westminster, on Monday, thus referred to his Lordship's high character:—

"By the laws of their municipal constitution, to be an Alderman of the City of London, and to have served the office of Sheriff, were necessary qualifications in the person of the gentleman who was selected to fill the high and distinguished position of its chief magistrate. The very effective manner in which Mr. Johnson had filled these offices had been mainly instrumental in causing him to be elevated to the high station to which he had now been appointed. But the earlier and equally honourable career of his life had first attracted the attention and fixed the regard of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Johnson had formerly been the lessee of the celebrated Dartmoor quarries, and had undertaken and executed many very great and national works in the construction of bridges, in the formation and improvement of the dockyards of the country, and, above all, in the erection of that effectual barrier against the violence of the ocean, the stupendous structure, the Plymouth Breakwater. It would be alien to the singleness and sincerity of Mr. Johnson's character were he to arrogate to himself the undivided merit of these amongst the noblest and most useful undertakings and efforts of modern times. Mr. Johnson, on the contrary, rejoiced to have had the opportunity of acting under the superintendence, and to have been stimulated by the example, genius, and spirit of enterprise, of the late Mr. John Rennie; and Mr. Johnson, at the same time, equally disclaimed the praise of being the sole originator and architect of his present ample fortune. He acknowledged with feelings of deep gratitude and reverence that the foundation of his fortune had been laid by, and had had its origin in, the ability, integrity, and industry, of his forefathers; whilst in raising and in attempting to carry on upon that foundation a superstructure worthy of those who had preceded him, his efforts had been as honourable as their success had been complete. To avail himself of every opportunity of public usefulness had been the leading characteristic of Mr. Johnson's life. During his shrievalty, the defective accommodation of the great metropolitan prison had, in a great measure, been remedied by the important improvements which had been planned and effected by that gentleman in the internal arrangements of the gaol. For these and other valuable services Mr. Johnson had been greeted by his fellow-citizens on his retirement from the office of Sheriff with the unanimous thanks of the livery, and he had moreover received, in token of these services, the present of a valuable piece of plate from the Corporation of the City of London itself. As a magistrate, Mr. Johnson had been exact and indefatigable in his attendance, and in the performance of all his duties; and he now entered upon the new and arduous office of Lord Mayor, fully impressed with the responsibility it imposed, and with all and every honourable feeling of ambition to fulfil to the utmost of his power all its requirements. Mr. Johnson possessed, in the entire confidence of his fellow citizens, no inconsiderable element of his success. They felt, in truth, that his new duties had already become, as it were, habits of his life. A devoted loyalty to his Sovereign, a warm attachment to the laws and Constitution of his country, a zealous regard for the interests of his fellow citizens, and a firm determination to maintain these, and a liberal hospitality, and a comprehensive charity, would, the citizens of London felt assured, be the characteristics of his future Mayoralty."

It may be remembered by some of our readers, that the Lord Mayor is a liberal patron of aquatic sports; and, during the last yachting season, gave a superb prize cup. His Lordship has become popular by his numerous acts of benevolence; and it would be impossible to name an Alderman who stands higher in the esteem of his fellow citizens.

PENSION TO LADY SHEE.—Her Majesty has bestowed a pension of £200 per annum on the lady of the accomplished President of the Royal Academy.

INDEPENDENCE UNDER TRYING CIRCUMSTANCES.—At the recent fatal coal mine accident, near Bristol, George Britton, the only survivor, although one of his arms was broken to pieces, slid his head and back out in several places, quietly took out his pipe, and began to smoke, which he continued to do till brought to the mouth of the pit; and, within a couple of minutes after the amputation of his arm, by Mr. Grace of Downhead, he asked that gentleman if he might again smoke, and receiving an answer in the affirmative, he commenced blowing a cloud out of his short pipe, with the utmost composure.

RAILWAY RESPONSIBILITY.—In the Edinburgh Court of Justiciary, W. Paton, superintendent of locomotives to the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, and Richard M'Nab, engineman, have been tried and convicted on a charge of culpable homicide, the death of an individual having been caused on that line. On Monday they were brought up to receive sentence, when Paton was ordered to be confined for twelve months in Glasgow gaol, and M'Nab for nine months. The Lord Chief Justice Clerk passed a high eulogium on Mr. Paton's general character.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE CAPTAIN LEICESTER.—The remains of the late Hon. Captain Leicester, who expired at his apartments in the Infantry Barracks, on the 7th inst., were interred on Wednesday at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, with military honours.

FRIGHTFUL CASE OF CHILD MURDER.—An inquest was held on Monday, at the Marylebone workhouse, on the body of an infant, name and parents unknown. The body, which was brought into the inquest room, was partially calcined, and otherwise so mutilated, that the jury declared that it was with difficulty they recognised it as human. Richard Gladwell, a vender of firewood, stated that, on last Friday morning, he found the body, in a blue wrapper, sewed up with red thread, in a passage off Park-lane. Mr. Boyd, house-surgeon, examined the body. There was a large wound in the head, whence the brain protruded. The arms, breast, and legs down to the knees, were burned. He judged, from the appearance of the body, that after the deceased infant had died, it had been placed on a fire, with a view of consuming its remains. The Coroner said, he believed such to be the case, and there being no further evidence, the jury, having remarked on the atrocious and brutal circumstances connected therewith, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown."

CHESS.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—"J. Mc C."—On reference to Mr. B. A. Brown's collection of Chess Problems, we find that No. 85, the position alluded to, is the end of a game between Mr. Staunton and Mr. Cochrane, which was won by the former, but which, according to Mr. B. and Mr. J. Mc G., he must have lost had his opponent adopted the line of play laid down in the solution. In this both are mistaken, and we thank our Correspondent for the opportunity of correcting their error. The key move suggested by Mr. B., "R to R 7th (ch)," was clearly foreseen by Mr. Staunton, at a moment's reflection upon his previous play will show, and, instead of winning the game for White, it would as surely lose it as did the move really made. As the game is short and full of spirit, and the position one of much interest, we give the moves below.

PROBLEM, NO. 95.

The following remarkable position, acknowledged by the few who have seen it, to be entitled to rank among the happiest efforts of this description of ingenuity, we owe to the kindness of the inventor, M. Horwitz, a very distinguished member of the Hamburgh Chess Club, who has just arrived in England.

White having to move, engages to mate his opponent in four moves.

* White would have played it in taking the Q R's Pawn.

† This is better than playing the Q at once to her 2nd.

Should Black, instead of his last move, venture to take the Rook with K B's P, he will be mated in two moves.

‡ The situation prior to this move being made, forms one of the Problems in Mr. A. Brown's collection. In his solution, Mr B makes White play R to K R's 7th (ch) for the 30th move, Black capturing the K, the White Kt is played to Q's 4th (discov. ch); the Black K is moved; White Kt takes Q, and wins. As we have remarked above, Mr. Brown is mistaken in supposing this move was overlooked by the players: it was certainly observed by them, and dismissed, because they saw one or two steps further than his variation carries us. Let us suppose it played out as they would have played it, had the Rook been moved to K's 7th at the 30th move:—

And play as White can, the Rook will win his pawns, and finally the game

THE COMING SESSION.

Whether the present state of affairs may, or may not, be considered by the Cabinet urgent enough to require an anticipation of the usual period at which Parliament is called together, it is certain that, when it does meet, it will find ample materials for the most careful deliberation; nor must its time be spent in deliberating and debating only—it must act. Such a mass of actual and imperative business was never before presented to a Legislative Assembly. Questions of policy and principles, on which were formerly fought the battles of parties and sections of parties, have lost their interest. What the Opposition may wish to do, what the Ministry may refuse to do, has become a matter of secondary importance to that which both sides, and all parties, must unite in doing. Speculative politics are no more; material interests have overridden them, and pushed them completely beneath the surface. A change has come over the spirit of our political dreams. It was once possible to anticipate, long before Parliament met, what would be the great subject of the Session on which the battle of the opposing hosts would be delivered; now men are more prone to speculate on what points the two great parties will be likely to agree. This arises from the immense development of our material and commercial interests by thirty years of peace and accumulation. The energies and resources that were formerly exhausted in a destructive war, are diverted into other and better channels. The loss and gain of battles, the censure of uncalled for expeditions, the condemnation of the appointment of this or that commander; in short, all of the many opportunities a state of war and difficulties can furnish to a keen-eyed Opposition, that has nothing before it but the easy task of fault finding, do not now exist to such an extent. Questions that some, and not many, years ago convulsed the kingdom, are heard of no more. A motion on the Ballot would scarcely command a House to listen to its advocate; the Extension of the Suffrage, or indeed any of the once violently agitated constitutional changes, are scarcely mentioned. No party could now make them a weapon of attack on a Government; they may revive hereafter, but they are dormant for the present. The old watchwords of party have lost their power: the spirit of the age is practical, and cares not to fight for abstractions. The questions that now agitate men's minds are those connected with our material well being and our social advancement. Instead of the Ballot, we talk about the draining of Towns and Cities, how the people shall breathe being a more immediate question than how they shall vote. The vapourings about Universal Suffrage are superseded by the consideration whether factories cannot be made to consume their own Smoke.

Questions of the government and revenues of the Church have, ere now, thrown out Ministers; now that result is far more likely to be produced by a decision as to how Corn is to be bought and sold. The management of our workhouse system, and the mode in which the relief of the poor is administered, is altogether a social question, and one at present of paramount importance. As a decisive proof, the last majority against Sir Robert Peel, strong as he is in numbers, was obtained on the question of how many hours the labour of children employed in factories should continue during the day. Political theories have fallen into disregard, and Legislators and Ministries must henceforth deal with practical measures calculated to amend our social condition. The discussion of such topics tends to break down the distinctions of party, and suspend the animosities that arise when topics that bring hostile principles into collision are broached. A Poor Law debate does not divide men into their strict party ranks; and on a question merely commercial, Whigs and Tories may often be found agreeing; Dissenter and Churchman cannot find a cause of difference on the merits of a Railway Bill.

A great mass of the business of the coming session will be of this "amalgamating" tendency. The enormous quantity of railway business alone will compel a co-operation of one party with the other, in order to dispose of it; and with every effort it will be difficult to do it satisfactorily. A general impression is beginning to be felt that the machinery of legislation is rapidly becoming unequal—even physically unequal—to the amount of labour thrown upon it. The wealth and capital of many years is seeking employment in every direction. The Treasury, with a revenue more than equal to the expenditure, does not require loans; and the amount that used to be absorbed by this public want, is left free for other investments. For some years it has upheld those gigantic undertakings to which in no other country has private enterprise been found equal. The necessary powers have to be given by Parliament, but the money has been, and will yet be to a still greater extent, found by the people. It is the necessity of examining the evidence of the practicability of these schemes, of their utility, and the means of executing them, that has thrown this overwhelming mass of occupation upon Parliament. It was great to inconvenience last session; it will be greater in the coming one; and, from every appearance, will increase in the future beyond computation. It is evident that a pressure of this kind must be met by some special arrangement calculated to meet it. The forms that sufficed for the exigencies of the country forty or fifty years ago are utterly inadequate to the present juncture. Important as our railway system is, the whole energy of the Legislature cannot be sacrificed to it. There are imperial questions which must be attended to while time and human strength have their limits. Some revising and controlling power over the whole mass of railway business must be established. It has been left to too many separate bodies acting without concert; the Executive Government itself must take a more active part in the matter. Some prompt decisions from an authority that would carry weight with it, would crush at once four out of five competing schemes, of which only one can be of any use; why should they be left to fight each other before the Committee at a vast expense of money, that benefits no one but lawyers and agents? Then the Government, with the immense means it has at its disposal, might surely make the selection of the line to be taken, solely with a regard to the public convenience; and, having made it, sanction the construction of that and no other. Such a board might also act in some degree at discretion, without being tied and bound by a whole net-work of standing orders, which are not necessarily a protection to the public. Only those plans which have complied with all the forms by a certain day, can be brought before Parliament this year. In some cases the most eligible routes between point and point have not been brought the earliest into the field: precedence, in point of time, will now gain the success that ought only to be given to merit. The bad line having been able to go through the forms, will perhaps pass; the good one is made impossible for ever. Discrimination to make the selection, determined by evidence, and power to enforce it, is what is wanted; the parliamentary sanction might be afterwards given. We do not even think that a Committee of members of the House of Commons is capable of deciding on such questions. It may be mystified and misled by counsel and witnesses to almost any extent; a Board of Engineers, not interested in the decision, would be far better as a preliminary tribunal. Something to winnow the chaff from the wheat, decide on what is really wanted, and crush the crude and badly got up schemes, by the mere prospect of going before a body able to detect their imperfections, would restore confidence to the fair and bona fide speculators, and check the excess of enterprise which has been encouraged by a feeling like that created by the uncertainty of the law: no cause can be so bad that has not a chance in court if skilfully managed; no railroad can be so defective but it may pass in the lottery of committee inquiry. The Government must not only make itself felt in the construction of New Lines, but keep in its hands some control of them afterwards. If the first fortnight of the coming Session should be spent in discussing this questioa alone; it would be time well bestowed, and we should be glad to see Parliament summoned at an early day for the express purpose of doing it.

ARRIVAL OF THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE OF RUSSIA.

On Saturday morning last, at daylight, the Russian line-of-battle ship Ingermanland, 74 guns, Captain Moffit, bearing the flag of Admiral Lutke, and having on board his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine, entered Plymouth Sound, and brought up inside the Breakwater, near her Majesty's ship Queen, 110, Captain Sir B. Walker. The Ingermanland was accompanied by the Russian corvette Vsarshefsky, 30 guns, Captain Glasseeap. The corvette is very large; mounting 30 guns, besides swivels. She has been towed up Hamoaze, to be repaired at the dockyard.

These ships left Cronstadt on the 23rd of October, and have had rather a long passage. In the Baltic, during a heavy squall, the corvette lost her boats, sprang several knees, and was much strattened, as to require caulking here before she can again proceed to sea. On Thursday night, off Beachy-head, they engaged two Dover pilots, who navigated the ships to the Eddystone, where they were joined by two pilots belonging to the Plymouth branch.

In consequence of the boisterous state of the weather, the Grand Duke did not land on Saturday. His Excellency Baron Brunow, the Russian Ambassador, who had, since the 5th instant, been waiting the approach of the Royal visitor, paid his respects immediately on his arrival. Mr Lascombe, the Russian Vice-Consul, also paid his respects to the Grand Duke.

The Royal visitor, who is the second son of the Emperor, assumes only the honours of a lieutenant in the Imperial navy, in which rank he is now serving on board the Ingermanland. Our Illustration, from a drawing by Mr. N. M. Condy, shows the Ingermanland saluting the Admiral. In consequence of being thus incog., a Royal salute was not given on his arrival, but Admiral Lutke's flag was honoured by firing the usual number of seventeen guns.

His Imperial Highness landed on Sunday afternoon, between four and five o'clock, at the Barbican pier, from the Ingermanland, accompanied by Admiral Lutke, and by Mr. William Luscombe, of the Consular-office, and proceeded to Elliott's Royal Hotel, where the Russian Ambassador, Baron Brunow, had also taken apartments. Admiral Lutke, Baron Frestricha, Dr. Hawrovitz, and Captain Loutkowsky are with the Grand Duke.

On Monday morning, among other distinguished noblemen and gentlemen who waited on his Imperial Highness, were Mr. Luscombe, the Russian Vice-Consul; Port-Admiral Sir John West, General Sir H. Murray, K.C.B., the Right Hon. the Earl of Morley, Sir T. Follows, Admiral Superintendent Sir Samuel Pym, Colonel Oldfield, and Major Oliveira: Royal Engineers—Colonel Barlow, 14th Regiment; Major Daubigne, 55th Regiment, &c. A guard of protection, from the 14th Regiment, was stationed at the eastern entrance of the hotel, and a detachment of the Plymouth police force was also in attendance. The Royal Naval Arsenal, and Royal William Victualling-yard were inspected in the afternoon by the Grand Duke, who, accompanied by Baron Brunow, Admiral Lutke, and suite, dined in the evening at Mount Wise, with Sir John West.

On Tuesday, his Imperial Highness was to witness the performance of the Viennese dancers, at the Theatre Royal, Plymouth; and on Wednesday, to partake of the hospitalities of Earl Morley, at Saltram.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

FRANCE.

The Paris papers are still much engaged with the state of affairs in Algeria.

The following is from the Moniteur Algérien of the 16th:—

"Accounts have been received of the operations directed by the Governor-General, who was on the 9th in the country of the Beni Menasser. The Governor-General, after several movements, having for object to deceive the insurgents, had sent a light column against the Beni Tighristo. This column had effected a considerable razzia. A hundred Arabs were killed, 200 were made prisoners, and nearly 6000 head of cattle were captured. The Beni Amears instantly surrendered at discretion. As a measure of policy the Marshal ordered them to be disarmed and sent to the camp of Temel el Heat, under the authority of the Bach Aga, Ameur Ben Ferrath, whose fidelity is unshaken. In consequence of the information which had reached him, the Marshal, marching to the Beni Menasser by the valley of Chelif, changed his direction to the right, in order to explore the high mountains which border the Ouel Harsem. A scherif, whom the Arabs also call Bou Maza, like all those who at this moment preach the holy war, had succeeded in rousing to revolt the tribes of the Cheliff, between Orleansville and Miliana, and had, on the 3rd, effected a razzia on the Ouled Segnia, six leagues west of Miliana. Informed of this event, General Comman hastened the march of his column towards Miliana, in order to tranquillise the faithful tribes, and to repulse new attempts. The Beni Zoug Zougs, convinced of the falsehood of Bou Maza, and dreading chastisement if they joined him, adopted a resolution which has restored calm in this subdivision. At the instigation of our Aghas, they arrested this fanatic, and took him to Miliana, where they delivered him into the hands of the commandant. This man is only 26 to 22 years of age, and of incredible fanaticism and arrogance. He declared to the persons who interrogated him that he was the envoy of God and of the Prophet, to raise the populations of the East, and secure the triumph of the holy religion of true believers. The circle of Dellys is in the most perfect calm, and the Fikssat el Banars pay the Aoucr lately imposed upon them by Marabout accounts from Mostaganem of the 2nd, give satisfactory details of what was passing near Mascara. General Lamoricière was receiving the submissions of the Hachems Cheragas, Beni Chougrane, Sedjerates, Sbamas, &c. General Bourjolly had, on the 31st ult., and on the 1st inst., effected two razzias on the Flittas, in which the enemy lost nearly 200 men, of whom forty to fifty were combatants."

The infant son of the Duke d'Aumale has received the title of the Prince of Condé. On Saturday evening he was christened at St. Cloud by the names of Louis Philippe Marie Joseph d'Orleans.

The Gazette de France notices the marriage of the sister of the Duc de Bordeaux to the hereditary Prince of Lucca, which was performed on the 10th, at Frohsdorff.

UNITED STATES.

The Great Britain arrived at Liverpool at a late hour on Monday night, with New York papers to the 29th of October. The Great Britain experienced very severe weather since she left New York, on the 29th ult., so much so that her propellers lost all except one fan six days after she left, and for the last fourteen days she sailed under canvas only. It is gratifying, even under this disadvantage, to find that she made the voyage in twenty days in perfect safety, although the weather, as before stated, was very rough. She has brought twenty three passengers. The Great Western arrived at New York on the 28th, the day the Great Britain left.

At New York and the neighbourhood a smart shock of an earthquake had been felt but no damage had been done.

The Montreal Courier contains the following, relative to the health of Lord Metcalfe:—

"MONKLANDS, October 20, 1845.

"The afflicting malady under which his Excellency the Governor-General has been labouring for a number of years, and which has slowly and almost imperceptably been producing a morbid alteration in the cheek, has, within the last ten days, assumed a disagreeable character, by which a portion of the soft parts of the cheek have been destroyed. The virulence of the action, in a great measure, yielded for a day or two, but has not yet subsided.

"His Excellency's health has been materially suffered, although it has been necessary for him to observe a very rigid abstinence.

"JAMES CRAWFORD, M.D.

"ROBERT L. MACDONNELL, M.D."

"A 'phagedenic' condition is one resulting from local gangrene, attended by sloughing or disorganisation of the integument."

On the other hand, the Montreal Herald of Oct. 27, announces, upon official authority, that the health of the Governor General is improving, and that he is able to transact business. The Herald adds that his lordship has not been confined to his bedroom even for a single day.

The chief feature of political interest in the New York papers relates to the Oregon question, which is the subject of universal discussion amongst the journals. The Journal of Commerce gives the following rumour:—

"It is rumoured that Mr. Pakenham, the British Minister at Washington, finding there is little hope of adjusting the Oregon question either by compromise or arbitration, has proposed to leave the whole territory in its present condition for twenty years, under the joint protection of England and the United States, and with the stipulation that at the end of the said period its then inhabitants may attach themselves to either country, or erect themselves into an independent sovereignty, as they may prefer. If such a proposition has been made we trust that it will be accepted; for the effect would be to give the whole territory eventually to the United States. If the whole territory is open to settlers from England and the United States on equal terms, it will, at the end of twenty years, contain ten American to one Englishman. Such are the migratory habits of our people, and so accustomed are many of them to frontier life, that they will go to Oregon in crowds, while Englishmen will only go by dozens. This arrangement will settle the question of the future nationality, or in sections, one (say) comprising all the territory north of latitude 49, another the territory between Columbia River and latitude 49, and a third the territory south of Columbia River, we are unable to say. At all events, it might be that the northern part would attach itself to Great Britain, and the southern part to the United States."

Subsequently, the Hibernia arrived at Liverpool, and brought New York papers to the 31st ult., but they add nothing of consequence to the news supplied by the Great Britain.

She left Boston on the 1st, and Halifax on the 3rd instant, but during a very dense fog, had the misfortune to get on shore on the 5th, on the southernmost point of Cape Race. She was got off again, but found to have sprung a leak, which made it advisable to go to St. John's, Newfoundland, to repair. The damage, however, was found to be only slight, and she was enabled to sail again on the 9th instant. In this transaction no blame is to be attached to the captain or officers of the Hibernia.

The business of the New York Stock Exchange was brisk, and nearly all descriptions of State stocks had materially advanced PRESIDENT POLK AND THE OREGON QUESTION.—The following most important extract, from private advices per Hibernia, was posted in the Underwriters' rooms, Liverpool, on Tuesday: "On the subject of the Oregon, the President will maintain firmly, and even in stronger language in his message of December next, the right of the United States to the territory thus he did in the message of December last, unless, in the meantime, some conciliatory proposition emanate from your Government, which is permitting the matter to rest for twenty or more years, which, as it would be considered here as virtually surrendering the territory, would be accepted by the United States. Should there be very indignant at the remarks made in and out of Parliament, and will use angry language in his forthcoming message. Of course you can decide better than we can whether this course will create difficulty, or, in other words, whether England will maintain her position on this subject. Of the literal correctness of these remarks regarding the feelings, views, &c., of President Polk, rest assured. They come direct to me through one of our —— who, for two weeks past, has dined daily at the table of the President, and heard him, on these occasions, express himself openly, unreservedly, and determinedly."

SPAIN.

ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT WESTERN."—The Great Western arrived at Liverpool yesterday (Friday) morning. The papers received by that vessel are to the 6th instant, a week later than the above accounts. There is no actual news in them, but their contents are nevertheless of importance—indicating, as they do, that a good deal of excitement exists in America upon the subject of the President's Message, which it is supposed will assume a determined and hostile tone upon the subject of the Oregon question.

THE RIVER PLATE.

Monte Videan advices to the 9th of September, and Buenos Ayrean accounts to the 29th of August, have reached us.

The port of Colonia, in possession of the troops of Rosas, had surrendered on the 31st of August, after a few shots, and was then occupied by the allies. The remaining ports of the republic, Buceo, Moldonado, &c., in possession of the banditti forces under Oribe, were placed under a vigorous blockade, thus effectually cutting off from that general all supplies; and, deprived of them, it was anticipated that he must very shortly abandon his position off Monte Video. Under the improved aspect of affairs, an improvement in commerce was anticipated. Exchange, 42d. By the next packet a rise may be expected. The British and French Ministers were at Monte Video. It was currently believed that Buenos Ayres would be blockaded.

The Journal des Debats gives some official details of the combined operations in the River Plate, and the possession of the town of Colonia. Previously to the proceedings of the united squadron, assistance had been given to the Government of Monte Video in fitting out a small flotilla, in order that the possession of Colonia might be given up to the troops of Monte Video as soon as it should have come into the hands of the allied forces. On the 29th of August, two English vessels, the Satellite and the Philomel, and three French vessels of twenty guns each, the Assas, Coquette, and Ducouedic, had come to an anchorage off Colonia, and on the 30th two Admirals made preparations for the attack. A few days before their arrival, the Commandant of Colonia had sent away all the foreigners, and they had taken refuge in the Brazilian territory, where they were amply provided with the means of subsistence by the French and English vessels. In the evening of the 30th, the batteries of Colonia opened their fire upon the allied squadron, but did no injury. The Assas was the only vessel struck by a ball, and that slightly. At the same time that the batteries began to play upon the vessels, a fire broke out in several parts of the town, and the flames threw a pall of smoke

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE EARL OF VERULAM.

James Walter Grimston, Earl of Verulam, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, Viscount Grimston, in the peerage of Ireland, and Baron Forrester, in that of Scotland, was the son of James Buckall, first Lord Verulam, and third Viscount Grimston; he was born the 26th September, 1775; he succeeded his mother's cousin as Baron Forrester, the 3rd December, and his father as Viscount Grimston, the 30th December, 1808. His Lordship was created Earl of Verulam in 1815; he was also Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Hertfordshire, High Steward of St. Alban's, and a Commissioner of the Metropolitan Roads.

The Earl of Verulam married the 11th of August, 1807, the Lady Charlotte Jenkinson, only daughter of Charles first Earl of Liverpool, by whom he leaves, beside four other sons, and four daughters—one of whom is Countess of Clarendon, another Countess of Craven, and a third Viscountess Folkestone—an eldest son and successor, James Walter, now Earl of Verulam, who married on the 12th September, 1844, Elizabeth Joanna, daughter of Richard Wayland, Esq., of Woodeaton, in the County of Oxford.

The late Earl of Verulam expired at Gorhambury, the family seat in Hertfordshire, on Monday, the 17th inst.: he had been suffering during the last three months from an attack of dropsy, combined with disease of the heart. At Gorhambury, and the neighbouring town of St. Alban's, his Lordship was very popular: his affability and kindness had endeared him to all: his loss will be deeply felt and regretted. The family, of which his Lordship was representative, is one of the oldest in the realm, having descended from a Sylvester de Grimston, who settled in England at the Conquest. The Grimstons obtained a Baronetcy in 1628, and their first Patent of Nobility bears date in 1719.

LORD HARTLAND.

Maurice Mahon, third Baron Hartland, of Stokestown, in the Peerage of Ireland, was the third son of Maurice, first Lord Hartland, by his wife, Catherine, daughter of the first Viscount Mountcashell. Maurice, third Lord Hartland, was born the 6th October, 1772, and succeeded to the Peerage the 8th December, 1835, on the demise of his eldest and only surviving brother, Thomas, the second Baron, who married Catherine, eldest daughter of James Topping, Esq., but left no issue; his widow is now the Dowager Lady Hartland. Maurice, the third and late Baron, was in holy orders. He married, the 24th November, 1813, Isabella Jane, third daughter of William Hume, Esq., by whom—who died the 12th December, 1838,—his Lordship has had no children. Lord Hartland died on the 11th inst., at his seat, Stokestown House, in the county of Roscommon; and the title becomes extinct at his demise.

THE DOWAGER LADY HOLLAND.

Elizabeth, Baroness Holland, was the daughter of an opulent West Indian planter, Richard Vassall, Esq. She was first married to Sir Godfrey Webster, Bart., but that marriage was dissolved by act of Parliament in June 1797. On the 9th of the following July, her ladyship wedded the late eminent and excellent Henry, third Lord Holland. By this second marriage, Lady Holland leaves issue a daughter, now Lady Lilford, and a son, Henry Edward, present Lord Holland, and British Minister at Florence. Lady Holland died, after a short illness, on the 17th inst., at her residence in Stanhope-street, Mayfair.

LADY CANTERBURY.

Ellen, Viscountess Canterbury, was the daughter of Edmund Power, Esq., of Waterford, and the sister of the present talented novelist and writer, the Dowager Countess of Blessington.

Lady Canterbury was first married to John Hume Purvis, Esq.; and, after his demise, wedded, the 6th of December, 1828, the Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton, Speaker of the House of Commons, who was created Viscount Canterbury in 1835. An account of the recent death and a Memoir and Portrait of his Lordship, will be found in No. 169, of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Lady Canterbury died on Sunday, the 16th instant.

THE REV. DR. PROCTER.

The Rev. Joseph Procter, Master of St. Catherine's Hall, in the University of Cambridge, graduated in 1788, and was Third Wrangler and Second Smith's Prizeman. He was shortly afterwards elected to a Fellowship; and, in the year 1799, succeeded Dr. Lowther Yates in the Mastership of his College, which he held for 46 years. He was also, by Royal mandate in 1801. Dr. Procter was, ex officio, a Canon of the Cathedral Church of Norwich. This eminent and learned dignitary and divine died on the 10th instant, at the Lodge of St. Catherine's Hall.

THE REV. ARTHUR SAVAGE WADE, D.D.

Dr. Wade, who was rector of a valuable living in Warwickshire, and is stated to have enjoyed a considerable private income, was known to the public for the active part which he took as a speaker at all the principal Radical meetings for the last quarter of a century. His death occurred on Monday morning, the 17th inst. On Monday morning, he went to a tailor's shop in Regent-street, and, just as he was leaving it, he appeared to stumble, and would have fallen, had not one of the attendants ran to his assistance. He then exclaimed, "God bless me, I am afraid I am attacked with paralysis. I have lost the use of my left side." The unfortunate gentleman never spoke more, but died in the course of the day. He was in his 58th year. The Coroner's inquest returned a verdict of "Died from apoplexy."

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD. Nov. 15.

Yesterday an election took place at Brasenose College, to fill the vacant fellowship; the successful candidate was Mr. John Henry Brookes, Commoner and Hulme's Exhibitioner of the same College.

Nov. 19

The Rev. Frederic William Faber, M.A, Fellow of University College, is understood to have joined the Roman Communion. Mr. Faber is known to the public as the author of "The Cherwell Water Lily," and other Poems, and as editor of a portion of the "Lives of English Saints."

A special general meeting of the Oxford Architectural Society was held at their rooms, Saturday evening, when Dr. Harington, Principal of Brasenose College, was chosen President for the ensuing year.

Nov. 20.

At a Congregation held this day, the following degrees were conferred:—

M. A.—Rev. J. Groom, Wadham College; Rev. L. M. Humbert, St. John's College; Rev. J. Baines, St. John's College; J. Grenside, Exeter College; T. Bell, Exeter College; Rev. L. Oldley, Exeter College; Rev. H. Tindal, Brazenose College; W. H. Richardson, Oriel College, C. W. W. Wynn, Christchurch; C. P. Phillips, Christchurch, H. R. Farrar, Fellow of Merton College; J. D. Haskins, Magdalen Hall.

B.A.—A. F. Carey, Wadham College; C. H. Murley, Wadham College; H. Browne, Trinity College; T. W. D. Humphreys, Trinity College; C. M. Church, Oriel College; R. Jackson, Oriel College; R. A. THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE.—We are glad to learn that the Bishop of Carlisle is improving in health, and that great hopes are now entertained of his perfect recovery in a short time.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FIRE AND LOSS OF TWO LIVES IN FINSBURY.

On Sunday morning, between twelve and one o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises termed the St. Agnes le Clair baths, situate in Tabernacle-square, Finsbury, which, unfortunately, was attended with the loss of two lives. The premises were divided by a thin lath and plaster partition, one portion being occupied by a Mr. Moore, the proprietor of the baths, which were at the rear of the dwelling house, and the other by Mr. C. Peel, as a coffee shop. The inmates, upon being aroused, were met by a large sheet of flame entering their bed room. On accepting his wife, and their little one's escape by the staircase, they found it impossible, owing to the dense body of smoke rising from the lower part of the building. They hastened to the back windows Here their position was soon discovered, and they were desired to wait for the arrival of the escape ladders. Ere they reached the scene several of the terrified inmates, it seems, jumped to the ground, but those at the more lofty windows were persuaded still to wait a few minutes longer. The ladders were at length brought to the spot, and after several persons had been got out, active measures were adopted to preserve Mr. C. Moore, a lodger in the premises, his wife, and their little one, who were supplicating for assistance at one of the upper room windows, looking towards Pitfield street. Mr. Moore succeeded in making his escape, and on gaining the ground was perfectly exhausted; his unfortunate wife, however, and child perished. He states that he used every means to preserve them, and if he had waited a minute longer in making his retreat he must have perished also.

On Tuesday, Mr. William Baker held an inquest, at the Black Horse, Kingsland-road, on the bodies of Sarah Moore, aged 42, and George Hall, aged 11, the unfortunate individuals who perished.

Mr. Richard M. Moore said that he was the proprietor of the St. Agnes Le Clair swimming-baths, in Tabernacle square, Finsbury. The deceased, Sarah Moore, was the wife of Charles Moore, his assistant at the baths. On the morning of Sunday last, about a quarter before one o'clock, he was awakened by his brother Frederick, who told witness that he thought the place was on fire. He then ran down the stairs and perceived the smoke to the parlour, and upon opening the door smoke rushed out, but he could not see any fire. Witness told his brother to go down into the kitchen and procure a pail of water, which he did, and which he threw in the direction the smoke arose from. Witness afterwards escaped upstairs, and was nearly suffocated upon the roof of the cold bath, and was rescued by a policeman. His kitchen was the parlour. Mr. Charles Moore, his assistant at the baths, deceased George Hall, slept in the same room. They were all alarmed; but Mrs. C. Moore and her son were unable to escape, and they were burnt in the building. He could not tell how the fire originated.

Mr. Frederick Augustus Moore gave similar testimony.

The Coroner having summed up, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

EXTRAORDINARY ATTEMPTS AT SUICIDE

In part of our impression last week, we mentioned that a discovery had been made at Cobham Park, near Gravesend, which had created much excitement in that neighbourhood.

It appears that, on Friday morning (last week), the keepers or watchers in the service of the Earl of Darnley, on duty in the preserves of the park, heard the report of fire arms in the direction of the main road, but no one was discovered. One of the keepers, shortly after daylight, in going off duty, and passing through that part of the park where the unfortunate Mr. Dadd was murdered by his son some months ago, discovered a trace of pistols lying in the grass, and, in the immediate vicinity, were found the case for the pistols, a pocket handkerchief, and a ginger beer bottle. On his further examining the pistols, he found that one of them was loaded with ball and cocked. The other was unloaded, and apparently had been recently discharged. The handkerchief, a cambric one, was saturated with blood; one part in particular appeared to have pressed against a wound, and was stained with blood This discovery gave rise to many awful reports, and some of the papers indulged in anticipations about a supposed murder. It was since been discovered that there had been an attempt at suicide in the park. The individual, a Mr. Palmer, subsequently made a second attempt. He contrived to reach Woolwich, and embarked on board the Waterwitch steamer No. 8 on Saturday evening; and, while the vessel was on its passage up the river, he jumped overboard. He was picked up, however, and was taken into the fore-cabin, and, as he complained of being very cold, he was supplied, at his own request, with a glass of rum and water. On the arrival of the vessel at Blackwall, Mr. Smith, the captain, gave his passenger in charge to a policeman on the wharf, who said he could not detain him, unless the captain proceeded to the Police station-house, and signed the police sheet. Mr. Smith declined leaving the paddle-box, and said that, if the policeman thought proper to detain him, he would do so on his own responsibility. About half past nine o'clock the same evening Mr. Smith had occasion to go aft, when he found a large pocket book, which he opened, and the first thing he saw was a sealed letter, with the following address:—"To the Captain on board the Steamboat I go on. I believe it will be one of the Waterman's boats; but whether five or half past five, I cannot say." The captain opened it, and found the contents to be as follows:—

Woolwich, Nov. 15, 1845, Two o'Clock.

Sir,—I, whom may the great God forgive, expect to be no more before you receive this. This is my second attempt at suicide. I am now suffering with a black eye, and part of my face blown away, through a pistol shot. I was cool, it appears, to load my pistol with a pistol. I am now going to try water. Enclosed is a half sovereign, to defray any expenses you may be at in sending the enclosed letter to my house, &c., telling my subject to it. Let her husband's untimely end. I am, Sir, your's obediently, J. P. PALMER.

P.S.—I say the enclosed letter. I mean another letter, in my pocket-book, addressed to my wife.—J. P. P.

In the same pocket book were a quantity of papers and memorandums, and three sealed letters, all addressed "Mrs. Palmer, 2, Beaconsfield-terrace, Kingsland-road, London," and upon each the following direction, which was written above the address, "To the Captain—deliver this with the other letter." On the back of one of the letters there were spots of red sealing wax, and below them the following words were written:—

My dear wife,—Kiss the three wax spots, and you will know my lips have been there. I am a death, yours truly.

The address proved to be a correct one, and Mr. Smith proceeded to Beaufort terrace. After a long interview with Mr. Palmer, who assumed an air of indifference and jocularity, and said his adversary was too high to get a shot at, Mr. Smith proceeded to the residence of Mr. Coward, in Beaufort square, and learned from that gentleman that he had been called upon about eight o'clock the same evening, to attend upon Mr. Palmer, and found him in a highly excited state, and very cold from his immersion in the water; and that Mr. Palmer informed him that he had fought a duel, and that a pistol shot was lodged in his mouth. Mr. Coward added, that he discovered a bullet fixed in Mr. Palmer's upper jaw, and succeeded in extracting it. In doing so he was compelled to remove a small portion of the jaw.

Mr. Palmer is a leather factor, and has offices in Coleman street. He left home on Thursday evening (last week), and proceeded to Rochester, and to Gravesend, where he is supposed to have slept on Thursday night, and to have strayed towards Cobham Park on Friday morning. His escape from drowning was as singular as his escape from another and more fatal death. He was actually in the water a quarter of an hour, and, in addition to his ordinary dress, he carried a large top coat under his arm, but he never sunk.

On Monday night a gentleman called at No. 3, Beaconsfield-terrace, to inquire after the health of Mr. Palmer, and was informed that, notwithstanding his dangerous condition, and in opposition to the wishes of his medical attendant, he had been removed into the country.

It has been ascertained that Mr. Palmer purchased the pistols found on Saturday in Cobham Park, on the Thursday morning, of a Mr. Reily, No. 30, High Holborn. He bought a pair. At the time of the purchase the pistols were loaded with ball. He afterwards wished to be provided with some powder and a few bullets, in case of necessity, but added, he did not suppose they would ever be of any use to him. Mr. Palmer's conduct in exhausting the ammunition to lead to a supposition that his intellect was deranged. He was dressed as if for travelling.

How the unfortunate man managed to reach Woolwich in the exhausted state he must have been in from the loss of blood it is difficult to imagine. It has been ascertained that he went into two or three public houses and reported that a duel had been fought in the park.

THE LATE AFFRAY AT WINDSOR.—On Monday the inquiry respecting the disturbances which took place on the last Windsor election, was resumed. The Mayor stated that the magistrates intended to proceed against the prisoners for riot. Samuel Richardson (alias Brussey), Thomas Miller, and William Hunter, privates in the 2nd Life Guards, and Percy Townshend, a civilian, were then brought into court. Mr. Long, the magistrates' clerk, then read the information and complaint of John Gilham, the superintendent, against the defendants, for riot and assault on John Martin, a man named Shuck, and another person, named Townshend. Some other witnesses were examined, and ultimately the Court discharged Richardson, and committed the other defendants for trial at the next quarter sessions for riot and assault. The whole of the witnesses were afterwards bound over to appear, and the prisoners were liberated on bail.

CURIOUS SUICIDE ON THE THAMES.—As the steamer Nun was proceeding from the George's Pierhead to Woodside, about seven o'clock on Saturday night last, one of the passengers suddenly sprang to the side of the vessel, against the defenders, and was instantly carried down with the tide. The act is described to have been the work of an instant, and wilfully committed. The captain, who was upon the paddle-box at the time, had the engines immediately stopped, and directed the punt to be put out. The punt was quickly obeyed, and the punt was rowed about for a considerable length of time to see if the unfortunate man could be found in any direction; but there was not the slightest appearance of him from the moment that he had plunged into the water. Many reports have been circulated as to who the deceased is, and as to what was the cause of his committing the rash act some said he was a collector of taxes, who had been deficient in his accounts; others that he was a railway shareholder who had lost considerably by recent speculations. The gentlemen in the boat say, that he never spoke a word during the time he was on board, and that he did not appear to be in the slightest degree intoxicated. He wore a dark frock coat, and light-coloured trousers. In jumping over the side of the vessel he knocked off the hat of a passenger.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

When the Sheet Calendar, published on Thursday last, has crossed the Atlantic brother Jonathan will see that in the Old Country they are going ahead in matters connected with racing, as well as in the New World. The first announcement in that journal is to the following effect:—"Newmarket Craven Meeting, 1846. Tuesday: Handicap Sweepstakes of one thousand sovs each, half forfeit, across the Flat; acceptances to be sent sealed to Messrs. Weatherby, in London, on or before Thursday, the 27th of November; the same to be burnt without being opened, unless a race be made. If only two acceptances, to be a match." For this, twenty-seven horses are weighted: what an affair it might be! The same number contains an outline of the good things in store for Ascot next season, including among them a gift of 300 sovs. by the Great Western Railway Company, to be added to a handicap sweepstakes. So flattering a prologue to a sport grander for the coming year, may not be inappropriately followed by a glance at the materials for carrying a portion of it out—namely, the three-year old stock likely to show for the principal stakes for animals of that year.

Perhaps a brace of more splendid two-year-olds never came to the post than the past season produced in Sting and Malcolm. The former, it is scarce necessary to say, is first favourite for the ensuing Derby, at a little worse than 7 to 1. He has had too busy a summer and autumn of it to have left himself time for improvement—we do not expect to see him on his first appearance for '46 at Epsom, the start he was when last he performed at Newmarket. The latter having won two races in the North easily, showed in the saddling enclosure at Doncaster, the observed of all observers. He was the ideal of a racer; and should his limbs stand sound, it is likely he will see a better day than the anniversary of the Champagne The great vein of two-year-old excellence, however, was that worked in West Sussex. The Goodwood stable literally overflowed with young cripples. It turned out a dozen winners of that tender age, its champions being to be found always at their posts: it was enough that they had an engagement to ensure their keeping it. Princess Alice, the Amazon of the party, showed him since this year, and heads a catalogue of seventeen engagements in the Calendar. Her achievements were, taken with all let and hindrance into account, the best, or thereabouts, of the year. It is not, however, for that reason alone to be regarded with entire confidence in her three-year-old form: you cannot have your cake and eat it The best thought of among the Goodwood Derby lot is Lord George Bentinck's Binnacle: therefore had must be the best. Newmarket, probably, was never in so destitute a condition for young stock as this year. Nevertheless, we find him making a dead heat with two of them for the Glasgow Stakes in the Houghton. This makes none of the trio good for much: one of them we know to be good for nothing. We cannot look to the Goodwood team for a dangerous three-year-old in '46. If the betting returns had anything to do with the quality of an animal quoted at Tattersall's, Proconsul should seem to possess some good title to respect. He is one of John Scott's dark worthies, and, unless for that especial reason, we are not disposed to follow suit with his backers. Scott's public youngsters have been brutes, but he is an artist who can make admirable work out of the raw material.

Speaking of John Scott leads naturally to a consideration of the position and promise of the great public stables. His we pronounce weak—very weak (the old Danebury days are long since bringing up two years), the way they should go,—and a few of Mr. Wreford's accordingly may lay claim to be put on the books as second and third rankers. But honest John has given no sign of having a flyer in the county of Hants: are all the mighty (brumers) fallen? Dawson's lot for Epsom is the largest in the field. In Malcolm we spoke of the best he has put forth. No doubt Middleway will prove a favourite—on the market—and very likely a good goer on the turf. The list of dieux shows many of stout honest blood of a strain that has run well—and could stay a distance. Wherefore is it that in breeding the gift of speed seems to be esteemed as all-sufficing to the racer as action is stated to be to the orator?

Passing to the general evidence of the quality of the three-year-old stock for next season, we cannot but be more favourably than by inference be drawn from these facts This year, two hundred and sixteen two-year olds came to the post; 116 colts and 100 fillies. The average of winners, however, bore no comparison to the gross amount; from which it will be inferred that we have had some of the year of a superior character. Such we question was the case; but let us properly apply the deduction from that fact. There are one hundred and ninety-four nominations for the Derby: of these, not one in three has appeared in public; not one in ten of those that come out in average racing form. Add then the ordinary casualties attending the career of a race-horse, and you will have as a product the amount of hope that attaches to the dark three-year olds of 1846.

The season just past was remarkable for the running of its three-year-olds—distinguished for their success at all distances—but not for the achievements of Ideas, or Weatherbit, or The Libel, or the great creatures of the market Outsiders won the Derby, the Oaks, the St. Leger, the Chester Cup, the Ascot Cup, the Goodwood Cup. Forschevaree, a like good fortune awaits the three-year-olds of '46—but, we have a right to conclude, with even a greater preponderance towards the dark ones. This analytic caution will not, for that cause, be less of service for those who might be led away by the example of the foolish, to bestow countenance and support upon the favourites of the betting circles.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY.—Business improved a little this afternoon, but without leading to any alteration in the prices, which may be returned as follows:—

15 to 2 agst Sting		40 to 1 agst Humdrum (t)	20 to 1 agst Jonathan Wild
16 to 1 — Sarpedon (t)		30 to 1 — The Traverser	and

OARS.

15 to 1 agst Princess Alice
15 to 1 — Vanish

16 to 1 agst Queen Anne
40 to 1 — Astonishment

THURSDAY.—A "dies non," all the subscribers having taken flight for Newport Pagnell. We were informed that, in private, 350 to 10 was laid against The Traverser, and 1000 to 95 against Cuckoo.

AQUATICS.—At a meeting of the members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, held on Saturday last, at the Piazza Coffee House, Covent Garden, it was resolved to establish a permanent Club House in the metropolis or its vicinity.

Operations have been commenced for the erection of the Club House of the Royal Southern Yacht Club at Cowes. The foundation-stone will be laid in December next by the Marquis of Conyngham, who is Commodore of the Club. The building will be erected at a cost of £6000, which will be raised in shares of £40 each.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY.—A plan, we hear, is under consideration by the Government, which, if carried into effect, will be likely to produce a constant supply of good soldiers to fill up the vacancies that are constantly occurring in the army. The militia are to have a most efficient staff in each county; one-third of the main body of the militia to be embodied for three years exercise, at the same time allowing the men to volunteer to the line, with certain regulations to subaltern officers to extend their services also. This will put a stop to the demoralising scenes that are witnessed in all public houses to catch a recruit.

CAVALRY DEPOT.—There is no foundation for a report which appeared in a daily paper, to the effect that the cavalry depôt is about to be removed from Maidstone to Woolwich.

CONVEYANCE OF TROOPS BY RAILWAY.—We understand that Government are about to adopt measures for the more effectual transit of troops by railway.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL SIR SALUSBURY DAVENPORT, KNT.—This gallant officer died on Monday last at his residence in Cheltenham. He entered the navy in 1790, and served at the siege of St. Lucia, and at the attack on Porto Rico in 1797. Sir Salusbury also took part in the expedition to the Helder, and was at the surrender of the Dutch fleet in the Texel, and at the attack on four French frigates in Dunkirk Road in 1800. The deceased officer attained the rank of Admiral of the White in 1841. Sir Salusbury died very wealthy, possessing large estates both in Buckinghamshire and Cheshire; of the former of which counties he was a deputy-lieutenant.

MR. HUDSON.—Mr. Hudson, M.P., arrived at Drayton Manor on Wednesday (last week) direct from Wynyard Park, where the honourable member had been on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry. Mr. Hudson left Drayton Manor on Friday for Hoby Castle, on a visit to the Duke of Leeds

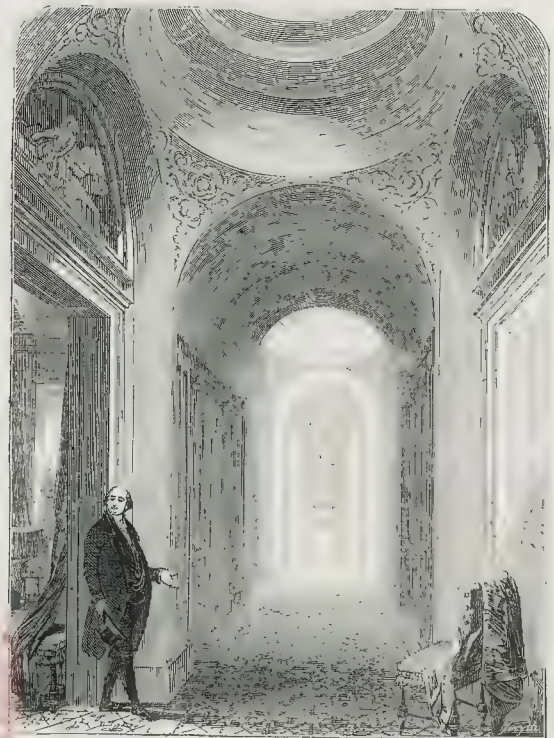
DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. WM. DUNDAS.—We regret to learn the death of the above right hon. gentleman, who died at Quarry House, his residence, at St. Leonard's on Sea, on Friday (last week). He was second son of the Right Hon. Robert Dundas, Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, in Scotland, and the Hon. Elizabeth Dundas, eldest daughter of Henry first Viscount Melville. The right hon. deceased was brought up to the Scots bar, and in 1800 he was nominated one of the commissioners for the affairs of India, when he was appointed a Privy Councillor. In 18 4 he was appointed Secretary at War, in the room of the Right Hon. Charles Rathbone Pitt, and discharged the duties of that office until 1806. He represented Tain and Dingwall in the House of Commons, and up to the election in 1831, had sat for the city of Edinburgh in several parliaments. The deceased gentleman held, at his death, the offices of Lord Clerk Register, Keeper of the Signet, and Register of Sasines in Scotland. He received a sum of little short of £4000 annually from the public purse, arising out of the fees as Keeper of the Signet, and as a compensation for the loss of fees as Keeper of the Signet.

SUDDEN DEATH.—An awful instance of the uncertainty of life occurred on Saturday last, to Mr. Abrahams, an opulent Jew, residing at Kew green. It appears that the unfortunate gentleman had just partaken of a hearty breakfast, and was joking with his wife about making his will, when he was seized with a fit, and fell back in his chair, assistance was immediately rendered, but of no effect, as life was extinct.

DESTRUCTION OF THE GLASGOW THEATRE BY FIRE.—The City Theatre at Glasgow (the Wizard of the North's), was burned down on Wednesday morning. The flames broke out about one o'clock, and, in less than 30 minutes, the whole was a sheet of fire, sending its light over the whole city. There have not been any lives lost, but there were several narrow escapes. The performances had only been shortly before concluded when the fire broke out, but the origin of it is not known. The theatre itself is valued at several thousand pounds, but Mr. Anderson, the proprietor, is fully insured

LANSDOWN TOWER.

THE TOWER AND GARDEN.



THE SANCTUARY.

Another costly collection of Works of Art, assembled by the classic taste of "the Author of 'Vathek,'" is now in progress of dispersion by that necromantic implement—the Auctioneer's hammer. Well do we remember, in every day parlance, "the intense excitement" upon the dismantling of Fonthill, some three-and twenty years since! Alack, what a torrent of wealth and fashion set in towards that store house of antique splendour.

The mention of the number of years that have elapsed since this event, reminds us that the circumstances which led to the building of the superb structure represented in our Engravings may be altogether new to some of our readers.

INTERIOR OF THE LANTERN.

We gather from Mr. Cyrus Redding's very piquant "Recollections," in the "New Monthly Magazine," (June and July, 1844), that when Mr. Beckford, (the author of "Vathek,") sold and quitted Fonthill, he was scarcely known to be in Bath, before a beautiful tower, planned in the purest taste, suddenly appeared on the summit of the highest eminence in the vicinity. Half an extensive hill was enclosed. Many stone portals uprose here and there, as if by magic, their creation being the employment of his leisure hours to superintend. He thus expended large sums with mechanics and workpeople, while he preserved his health by devoting a portion of his time to employment in the open air; this he considered essential to a sanatory existence.

Leading his life of accustomed seclusion, "the Author of Vathek" was only known in Bath as the mysterious, haughty gentleman who lived in Lansdown Crescent. Yet, here he planned the lofty Tower, which stands at the northern side of the city, upon the summit of the famed Lansdown, yet so far back from the brow of the hill, that it cannot be seen from the streets, which are too immediately under the height—an elevation of 800 feet. It is placed in a shrubbery, kept with strict adherence to the wildness of nature: no trim walks—no nicely edged borders are there, the paths being only such as are worn by the passengers' feet; choice flowers grow amidst heaps of stone, from which they appear to spring naturally. Below is a garden formed in an ancient stone-quarry, where every tree and plant flourishes luxuriantly. The laying-out of these grounds was superintended by Mr Beckford himself. He was as fond of planting as of collecting works of art. He once told a friend that he had crowned Lansdown with a forest in an incredibly short space of time. At the friend's surprise, he replied by a quotation: "With a forest it mean wood as come to Dunsinane shown. The Bath people may call this a mere mushroom, Vathek, or the Devil, now, with some reason. The Bristol folks, who travel the lower road, seeing trees upon Lansdown, where none a year or a few weeks before, rub their eyes: they cannot believe their own sight: how can it be?"

The architect of the Tower was Mr. E. H. Goodridge. The design is square to an altitude of 120 feet from the foundation, it then assumes an octangular form for 12 feet more, and this is crowned by 12 feet of octangular woodwork, of a lantern shape, which is protected by an iron pillar at each angle. These, as well as the dome, are gilt. We have engraved the Tower and its picturesque locality in our first illustration.

The first interior shows the Sanctuary, which has an air of mystic gloom and magnificence, the colours are crimson and oak; and the semi-circular spaces above the doorways are filled with paintings. In this apartment are partly shown two fine ebony cabinets; and, in one of the arched recesses is a full-length statue, in marble, of St. Anthony of Padua, with the Infant Saviour, finely executed by Rossi: on the supporting pedestal is inscribed "Dominus Illuminatio Mea."

We have likewise engraved a portion of the room within the Lantern: the latter, we should have stated, is copied from the Choragic Monument of Lysicrates, at Athens. The windows of the Lantern are of plate glass, moving in perpendicular grooves; the wind, at this height, being exceedingly violent, great strength of material is necessary. The curtains of the room are crimson; and, in Mr. Beckford's former residence, Fonthill, at a distance of between thirty and forty miles.

Mr Redding thus describes the prospect:—"The appearance of hill-top after hill-top, on the Somersetshire side of the Avon, unmasked to the eye during the ascent, had a novel and beautiful effect. On every side, the view was striking. All the southern shore of the Avon, opposite Bath, was visible. In the north west direction, the sight, after ranging over the barren table land of the down, unadorned with a single tree, was arrested by the solitary monument of Sir Reville Granville, who fell in the Battle of Lansdown. The view, naturally tinctured with melancholy, was still more saddened by the monument and its associations.

"The tower of Fonthill Abbey was visible from thence before it fell. Mr. Beckford was the only individual who could see it was no more in the field of view, without a telescope. He missed his former property, the day after it fell, before the news had reached Bath."

Our next Engraving, one of the Staircases, is not, in itself, remarkable; but, upon the landing, is a fine specimen of modern art. This is a magnificent colossal vase, of Peterhead granite, highly polished, seven feet high, three feet diameter: the vase is tazza-shaped, on a pillar and pedestal of the same material, on the pedestal are three finely-executed demi-lions in bronze; it is also enriched with bold bronze mouldings.

The Vestibule, the scene of the next Illustration, is small; but lit by painted windows, and sumptuously fitted. The colours are crimson and dark oak. Here are four Roman seats, of Riga and Pollard oak, with bold lion masks, and deep panelling—of the highest design and most elaborate workmanship. There are likewise four fine carved oak cabinets. The costly items are Etruscan vases, Indian and Japan china, Raffaelle ware, marble sarcophagi, &c. The carpet is crimson and black, quatrefoil pattern.

The Crimson Drawing Room, with which our present series of Illustrations concludes, is a superbly-fitted apartment, with recessed oak roof. The window draperies are of crimson cloth; and the carpet is crimson, quatrefoil pattern. The chairs are of the celebrated Fonthill pattern, ebonised; the seats and backs covered with crimson cloth and silk lace. The centre table is of carved oak; and the large console, triple-arched table, opposite the fireplace, is a very superb item, with rich brocatelli slabs, richly-carved trusses, &c. The Pollard and Riga oak cabinets, on each side of the end window, are very fine; the lower ones having rare jasper slabs. The gold Japan, china, and articles of vertu, in this superb apartment, are exquisite.

Here we halt in our tour of illustration. Next week, we shall resume the series.

Meanwhile, it should be explained that all the unique furniture, pictures, statues, bronzes, gems, agates, china, and real Japan bijouterie, have been removed from Lansdown Tower, to the Auction rooms of Messrs. Enfield and Son, in Milsom-street, Bath, where their sale commenced on Thursday last, and will not terminate until Friday next. Their "View" has attracted vast numbers of the lovers of art and vertu; and the splendid collection will, doubtless, realise a large sum. The Tower itself, Gardens, and Cottages—all are to be sold: the former may be readily made the nucleus of a much larger establishment.

Next week, we shall engrave some of the Rarities of highest design. The present series has been taken from some admirable Drawings made by Mr. E. F. English, before the recent removal of the collection for sale. We are indebted to this gentleman, as well as to the Messrs. English, for their courtesy to our Artist, whom we have dispatched to Bath to record graphically the results of the Sale.

CITY ANTIQUITIES.—On Monday evening, at the Institute of British Architects, it was stated by Mr. Tite, the architect to the Royal Exchange, that a large collection of the antiquities of Roman London, found in the excavations for that building, were in store in a spare room at the London Institution. The circumstances under which they were found were singular and interesting. On the south side of the Exchange, whilst excavating for a foundation, the workmen came to a solid bed of concrete, about fifteen feet below the surface, on penetrating through which they found a dark pealy mass, forming a pit nine feet in depth, and literally filled with every description of Roman rubbish. The pit was indicated by surrounding circumstances to have been a hole out of which gravel had been dug for the formation of neighbouring roads or garden walks, afterwards converted into a horse pond, as appeared from the remains of horse furniture, and eventually it became the City rubbish hole. There was found in it a very extensive collection of coins, amphoræ, shoes, and sandals, and every variety of articles of domestic use, even to bodkins with the wool in them; the animal and vegetable matters being in a high state of preservation from the nature of the pealy mass in which they were found. This had been piled, and upon it a bed of concrete had been laid, on which Roman buildings had been erected, nor were the foundations of these removed when the two Royal Exchanges in succession were erected. Mr. Tite also remarked on the presence of peat mud found in excavations near the Thames, showing the former growth of vegetation, which had been found as high up from the river as the Cheapside end of Friday-street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"An Admirer" is thanked for his hints; some of the subjects suggested have already been engraved in our Journal.
"A. H. P."—Yes.
"A Friend" will be liable to serve as a Juryman. The Railway Company will answer the second question.
"X. Y.," Chelmsford, wishes to ascertain who was the author of "The Lounger's Commonplace Book," 3 vols. 8vo., 1805.
"D. A. D.," Devon.—The College of Civil Engineers, Putney. "Bourne's Principles and Practice of Engineering and other Surveying," just published, is a sound work.
"Mary Anne."—The application of the title named by our Correspondent to a Scottish writer is merely an individual critical opinion, and not generally recognised. "Aird's Self-Instructing French Grammar," for beginners. "Rantzsitis Italian Grammar."
"Johnny."—A silver tea-service is a fitting and handsome wedding present.
"A Novice" should make interest with the Railway Directors, Secretary, &c.
"Joe Johnson," Withington.—"Tomlinson's Amusements in Chess," for beginners.
"E. A.," Kensington, may obtain any back Numbers of our Journal, at the original price, 6d. each.
"J. A. G.," Inner Temple-lane, is thanked; but we fear the sketch is too slight for engraving.
"Tenor."—We will endeavour to insert the scale of the weights and scale of the notes of the New Bells for the Royal Exchange in our next.
"A Celt," Emsworthy.—A good education is indispensable for a youngster entering the Navy.—See Lieut. Wilmot's Midshipman's Friend; chapter on Education and Allowances: an excellent little work.
"A Subscriber," Witney.—The expenses of the Banquet in the Guildhall, London, on Lord Mayor's Day, are defrayed by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, jointly.
"A. B.," Eton College, is thanked; but the sketch is too slight for engraving.
"R. M.," Liverpool.—The Improved System of Phonography may be obtained, by order, of any bookseller.
"H. S."—An error of the press
"Tenbrensis," South Wales, will find "Catlow's Popular Conchology," (Longman's), a good introductory work. So comprehensive a work as our correspondent hints at would require more than "a little spare time."
"C.," Seymour-street.—"Comparisons are odious," especially in print.
"Etonensis."—We believe the greatest speed yet attained by Locomotive Engines on Railways is be 75 miles per hour, in some experimental trips, on the Great Western Railway. The "Great Britain" steam-ship made her first passage to New York in 14½ days, or 354 hours.
"A Constant Reader."—One of the best works we are acquainted with, on the Management of the Dairy, is the volume reprinted from the Encyclopædia Britannica. A letter addressed to Mr. Prosser, Experimental Railway, Wimbledon Common, will reach the Patentee.
"Cantab," Bowness, should address his strictly technical questions to some surgical periodical.
"G. P.," Nottingham, is thanked for the Railway Sketch; but it is not of sufficient interest for engraving.
"A Continual Reader."—Stocqueler's Handbook of India, price 10s. 6d., to be had, by order, of any bookseller.
"Mais," Devon, is thanked.
"C. C. C." had better leave the matter in the hands of the assessor.
"R. S." College Hill.—Probably, Mr. Branston.
"E. H. P."—The Church of St. Andrew, Holborn, is engraved in No. 32 of our Journal. St. Peter's, Saffron Hill, is but of slight architectural character.
"H. C. T."—Peter Schoeffer cast the first metal types in matrices, and was, therefore, the inventor of complete Printing, 1452. A common rate of newspaper printing by steam machines is 6⅔ per minute.
"A First Subscriber," St. Austell.—The salary is about £70 per annum: middle age is not objected to.
"J. F. R.," Conservative News-room, Northampton.—The distance from London to Tahiti, round Cape Horn, is upwards of 13,000 geographical miles; and, from the same place to Canton, by the Cape of Good Hope, is upwards of 15,000 geographical miles; the former being nearly 14,000 English statute miles, and the latter 15,000 English miles.
".."—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" is not an opera.
"Tuglioni and Vestris."—The former is the oldest; but as the "Sylphide" and the "Syren" are both in England, we do not publish their ages without their special permission—and it is not probable that they will produce their birth-registers.
"M." Battmore.—We gave the sketch as we should that of any other object of public interest. We think the whole was a mistake or an exaggeration. We may use the article forwarded next week.
"C. G. M."—The 6th Carbineers are now quartered, stationed at Dundalk. The names of the Princess Royal are Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa.
"J. L. J. K." must employ a Broker on the London Stock Exchange.
"W. P."—We have not yet been able to ascertain, precisely, the extent of the London and Liverpool Docks.
"A Constant Subscriber," City.—M. Jullien has given Concerts at Drury Lane Theatre.
"G. B." wishes to ascertain the name and address of the Secretary to the Nicholson Charity, which affords relief to persons of that name, above 60 years of age.
"A. W."—Fancy stones are polished by the Lapidary's Wheel.
"Knowledge."—The refusal rested with the Dean and Chapter.
"F. R. S." Bayswater.—Apply at Bethlehem Hospital.
"A Subscriber from the First."—"He that goes borrowing, goes sorrowing."
"Dramaticus."—1. There is no relationship. 2. Brother and sister.
"A. J.," Saltford.—There is no truth in the statement respecting Abd-el-Kader.
"A S."—"A Guide to Guernsey" (not Redstone's), price 5s., may be had of Cruchley, 81, Fleet-street.
"Farn Islands."—These, a Correspondent is informed, are two groups of stones, once rocks, seventeen in number, lying opposite to Bamborough Castle, Northumberland.
"J. B. C."—It is difficult to say what course will be pursued by Railway Companies, with respect to the return of deposits; but we think that, in cases where it is not intended to apply to Parliament for an Act during the ensuing session, the deposits ought to be returned at once, with as little deduction as possible. Some Companies have announced their intention to adopt this course, and the others must be followed by all Directors who are men of honour and respectability. When the attempt to obtain a Bill is unsuccessful, it is usual to call a meeting of the Shareholders, and lay a statement of the affairs of the Company before them. In the case mentioned by our Correspondent, we recommend that an application should be addressed to the Directors, claiming a return of the deposit. No doubt there are many similar instances; and, in case of a refusal to do what is only an act of justice, our Correspondent should give publicity to the name of the Company. He will not want supporters in a plan of Railway "agitation" for the return of deposits. We refer our Correspondent to the case at the Mansion House.
"A Manchester Correspondent."—We cannot undertake to give legal advice: but we believe that, if "a trustee's wife" were to speculate in Railway shares, "although with her own private money," her husband would be liable to make good the calls upon them.
"Pax," and "S. E." shall be answered next week.
A few Letters stand over for inquiry.
INTELIGIBLE.—Two contributions by "C. P." and "Lines to ****."

 We have received a letter and copies of Resolutions passed by the General Committee for the relief of the sufferers by the late fires in the City of Quebec, impugning our statement of the expenditure of £12,000 in the improvement of a single street. These Resolutions are signed by the Mayor of Quebec; and, upon such high authority, we are bound to believe our information to have been incorrect. When the Accounts of the Committee are made up, we hope to be favoured with an early copy; which we shall be glad to publish. Our mistake, doubtless, arose from the sum of £12,000 having been expended by the Corporation of Quebec in widening a street, after a fire previous to the recent one.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1845.

WHILE the Emperor of Russia is trafficking in the faith of his children—buying a political alliance, with the religion of his favourite child as the price—it may assist in giving Englishmen an estimate of the detestable character of this despot if we describe the manner in which he persecutes those who profess the religion which the Grand Duchess Olga is about to embrace. The hatred and animosity existing between the Greek and Roman Churches are intense; the deeper, apparently, because the essential points of difference between them in matters of doctrine are few; the distinctions are rather in matters of form or discipline, than in questions of faith. It should be the object of a ruler, who has to govern people of both persuasions, to repress these dissensions as much as possible; but this, a task of kindness and conciliation, does not suit the disposition of the Russian Emperor. His policy is to crush all that differs from the official standard, and to reduce the religion of his people, like the uniform of his soldiers, to a regulation pattern. His Catholic subjects are ordered to become members of the Greek Church; they refuse, as nearly all mankind will refuse, compliance with such an order, and the consequence is that, at this moment, the sufferings of the early Christian martyrs under their Pagan persecutors, or those of the Protestants of France, under the "dragoonings" of that pompous bigot whom history has dignified with the title of "Le Grand Monarque," are equalled or surpassed by the cruelties enacting in that section of Europe, which now groans under the tyranny of the Autocrat of Russia.

On a former occasion we gave some details of the savage barbarities perpetrated by the Russian Government on a Convent of Sisters of Mercy, at Minsk, in a persecution extending over a period of seven years; fuller particulars have recently been made known in a work called "Eastern Europe and the Emperor Nicholas," and they more than confirm the worst statements that had previously found their way into the journals. There is no Press in any part of the Russian dominions; every atrocity is wrapped in darkness, and but for the escape of four of the victims, the facts of this, by no means isolated case, might never have been revealed to the world, or only vaguely rumoured; nay, through extracts from the Russian official journals, might even have been circulated through Europe merely as acts of that "wholesome vigour" of which we hear so much and so often, as a characteristic of the Russian system. That combinations of men for political movements should become the objects of official severity is easily understood; Governments use all their power for self-defence; but that a society of women, devoting themselves to acts of charity, should become the objects of cruelties worse than our most barbarous ages reserved for the worst of traitors, is something inconceivable. In most countries of Europe, and in nearly all the cities of the Continent, these sisterhoods exist, and are highly respected for their skill and humanity in attending the sick. In the first French Revolution, which swept away all conventual and religious establishments, this society was spared at Paris, from the conviction of its public services. How the same acts can be thought punishable in Russia, can only be explained by the Emperor. He has been endeavouring for some years past to root out the Polish language, Polish nationality, and every religion save that of the State. These women were ordered to conform, and refused. We extract, from the above work, a few passages describing the treatment they incurred by the refusal:—

Between 1837 and 1845, 44 nuns perished at the hands of Russian despotism out of 56 devoted to duties whose fulfilment appeals directly to all human sympathies. Of the 14 that remained, eight had either had their eyes torn out or their limbs broken, and of the other six only four had strength to attempt, or fortune to effect their escape. A few more months, and the whole surviving 14, at last doomed to Siberia, might have been expiring on that weary road, which the ten unhappy creatures, left behind by the fugitives, are at this moment being dragged over seven, all lamed, blind, or ailing.

This states only the general result; the minute details are far more frightful:—

Three days after the refusal of the superior to apostatize, Semiasko came with a detachment of soldiers to turn the sisters out of the convent. Such was the violence employed, such the terror inspired by the account of universal persecution, that a sick nun of their number fell and expired upon the threshold of her cell. The remainder were heavily ironed, hand and foot, and marched to Vitepsk, where they were placed in Russian convents, as "bad, wicked sisters." These black sisterhoods, which may in some measure be compared to our penitentiaries, are places of refuge for the widows of private soldiers, and receptacles for the most disorderly prostitutes. Here the 39 nuns of St. Basilius, from Minsk, met with 14 more of their order, transferred from another convent to this abode, where for two years they were kept to hard labour, chained in couples, and exposed to all the malignity of the Russian women, with whom the sisters, women of gentle birth were thus forcibly mingled. In 1839, all other efforts having failed to shake their resolution, they were transferred to another Russian convent of black sisters, at Polock. Here they remained with 10 more nonconformist nuns of the same order. The whole number of these women, 57, were now brought up twice a week, on Wednesdays and Fridays, before a commission of the Russian authorities and clergy, and, after undergoing fifty strokes apiece. This punishment was continued for months together, till the wounds upon their backs became open sores, and that pieces of the scabs, and then of the raw flesh, adhered to the instruments of torture. Three of their number died beneath the infliction. They were then fed on salt herrings, and refused drink (a favourite Russian mode of torture), except on the condition of apostacy. This punishment, which it appears they found the most difficult to bear, was suspended by a new mode of starvation. They were only fed once every other day, and driven to eat nettles and the fodder of the convent cattle. They were employed to dig out clay, and not understanding how to conduct an excavation, the earth fell in and buried five of their number. With incredible barbarity the Russian authorities not only refused to dig them out, but prevented the nuns from attempting to extricate their companions, by threats of immediate death.

They were then employed in helping the masons who were building a Palace for the Greek Bishop, and eight were killed on the spot by the falling of a wall; two subsequently dying of injuries from the same accident. Several Poles who ventured to express their commiseration for them, were imprisoned and exiled. At last a galling rebuke given by the Superior to the Russian Bishop in public, provoked the climax of this tale of horrors. The nuns were delivered up to a band of soldiers whose native brutality has been stimulated by brandy; what ensued defies description; but this is the conclusion:—

When the fury of these demons in human form had been exhausted, it was discovered that two of these unfortunate females were quite dead. The skull of one had been crushed by the stamping on the temples of an iron-plated heel. The other was trampled into such a mass of mud and gore, that even its human character was scarcely recognizable. Eight others had one or several bones or limbs broken, or their eyes torn or trodden out. Of the whole number, the superior, a woman of iron frame as well as indomitable resolution, fared the best: but she was not allowed to attend or console her mutilated sisters except on the condition of apostacy. They were afterwards marched out of Polock by night on foot, and chained two by two,—even those whose eyes had been torn out, and whose hideous wounds were festering. Those whose legs were broken, or who were lamed, were sent forward in carts under the care of Cossacks.

From an imprisonment that followed, four of the women escaped; ten are on the road to Siberia. The cause of all this unutterable misery is held up as a model of Monarchs; courted, feasted, and flattered by his brother Kings, not one can be found even to protest against such unprovoked atrocity, though words cost so little. From Prussia, no interference is to be hoped for; its Government apes the conduct of the Autocrat, and the Lutherans have there fared little better at the hands of the Protestant King than the Catholics at those of the Head of the Greek Church. France sends its ambassador to kiss the hem of the Emperor's garment; and Naples bows down and worships the Northern Despot, who is left to outrage humanity unchecked. Could he be believed sincere in his cruelty, it might be palliated, at least, as the madness of fanaticism; but even this miserable plea is forfeited. At the very moment he is murdering these women for adhering to their faith, he compels his daughter to join the very religion he persecutes! Will the gentle and beautiful Duchess Olga—for such she is said to be—as a convert to the same creed, interpose between her suffering sisters and her savage sire? It is to be hoped she will, and that the Emperor will redeem his worldly trading with his child's religion by an act that will have in it something of the heavenly quality of mercy.

THE effects of public censure are sometimes visible even on those who appear the least sensible to it. The Poor-law Commissioners were supposed to be proof against all attack that came from the mere representatives of the public; from long defiance of the shafts poured upon them, they were really believed to be invulnerable; but the arrow of public opinion has at last found the open place in the hard mail that encrusted the official Achilles; the Poor-law Commissioners give up something to the general voice:—

They melt, and are not
Of stronger earth than others.

It is well known that Mr. Westlake, the medical attendant of the Andover Union, was the cause of the late inquiry into the malpractices and abuses of the establishment there. At a great expense to himself, he was, in fact, the prosecutor of the master of the House. When that individual was the protegé of the Guardians, and, as it appeared for some time, also of the Commissioners themselves, this was rather a courageous step, of which the consequences were obvious enough. The champion of the pauper placed himself in the position described by Byron, when speaking of another member of the same profession:—

The bold surgeon, who maintained his cause,
Has lost his place, and gained the world's applause.

For the course Mr. Westlake took, the Board of Guardians suspended him; he was never more to be an officer of theirs. But the Commissioners had, by that time, discovered the impolicy of backing up every proceeding of the Board; the press had wiped the official spectacles pretty effectually, and the whole of the transactions connected with the Union appeared to the thus assisted optics of Somerset House so discreditable, that remedies have been applied to most of the abuses complained of; the dietary has been amended—bone-crushing prohibited after the first of January—and, to complete the symptoms of improvement, the suspension of Mr. Westlake, by the Board of Guardians, has been annulled by the Board of Commissioners, and directions given to that gentleman to resume his duties. We are gratified at these results, which show the great efficacy of public investigation of such matters, as contrasted with mere official inquiries.

A REPORT has been current this week, derived from a French source, that the redoubtable Abd-el-Kader is removed beyond the possibility of troubling the Marshals to whose misgovernment Algeria is for the present delivered. It is said he has been killed by his horse falling and crushing the rider. If true, it is another added to the list of heroes who have perished ingloriously, or by petty means. What all the troops of the greatest military power in the world could not effect, has been brought about by a stumbling steed! The greatest warriors do not always fall in great battles. The pebble of Goliath and the nail of Sisera have had their parallels in profane history, both of the past and present. Juvenal has made the "little ring" that contained the death of Hannibal, almost a proverb; Cæsar escaped a thousand conflicts to fall by an envious dagger; and Napoleon died of a common disease. The pettiness of the end often contrasts strangely with the renown of the career. That the gallant Arab Chief might have fallen by a French rifle ball, or pined out his last days in a harsh imprisonment in an ungenial clime, like Toussaint L'Ouverture, a commander as skilful and indomitable as he, might have been expected; but that he should perish as if he had never had an ambition beyond winning a steeple-chase, is something disappointing. The report, however, is unconfirmed, and it may be but one of those thoughts of which the "wish" is said to be the "father."

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—At a Privy Council, held at Windsor Castle, on Thursday, it was ordered that the present Parliament be further prorogued from Thursday, the 27th instant, to Tuesday, the 16th of December.

ON THE WEATHER OF 1845, IN CONNECTION WITH THE FAILURE OF THE CROPS.

The state of the crops this year, and particularly of the Potato crop, has given a more than usual interest to the Meteorological Phenomena of the year, and renders a comparison of them with those exhibited in years of abundance, and also with their respective averages, highly important.

As the crops in the year 1844 were good, I have decided upon comparing the phenomena of this year with those of that year, and both with their averages, as deduced from upwards of twenty years' observation.

Proceeding in this way, I find that no certain difference has existed between the Meteorological Phenomena of these years, or from their averages, in the following elements:—

The pressure of the atmosphere;
The temperature of the dew point;
The direction, or the strength of the wind;
The amount of cloud; or,
In the quantity of rain fallen.

But a very marked difference has existed in the Temperature of the Air, of which the following are some of the particulars:—

The mean temperature of the first 13 weeks of 1844	..	..	was 34 deg. 6
" " "	1845	..	was 35 deg. 4
" " "	On an average of 25 years		was 38 deg. 9

Therefore, the mean temperature of the first thirteen weeks of the year 1844 was very nearly the same as the average; whilst that of the present year was the large quantity of 3½ deg. below the average, and that this period of 1844 was nearly this amount warmer than in the present year:

The mean temperature of the second 13 weeks of 1844	..	..	was 55 deg. 0
" " "	1845	..	was 51 deg. 9
" " "	On the average of 25 years		was 53 deg. 0

Thus exhibiting an excess above the average, in 1844, of 2 deg.; whilst, in 1845, there appears a deficiency of 1 degree and one-tenth below the average; and that this period of 1844 was more than 3 degrees warmer than the corresponding one of 1845.

So remarkable a tendency to cold being thus shown in the first six months of the present year, I send a more detailed account of the summer temperatures of 1844 and 1845, as such possibly had the greatest effect on the crops:—

1844. Week ending	Mean Temp. of the Week.	1845. Week ending	Mean Temp. of the Week.	Average Temp. of the Week.	The Mean Temperature of the Week, above (A) or below (B) the Average. 1844.	1845
	Deg.		Deg.	Deg.	Deg.	Deg
July 6	58 9	July 5	61.3	62.3	B 3.3	B 0.9

Oct. 5	54.6	Oct. 4	55.0	54.0	A 0.6	A 1.0
12	51.5	11	47.7	53.2	B 1.6	B 5.5
19	48.6	18	52.9	50.1	B 1.5	A 2.8
26	45.1	25	49.9	49.6	B 3.1	B 0.3
Nov. 2	44.3	Nov. 1	48.9	46.8	B 2.5	A 2.1
9	43.6	8	47.2	44.8	B 1.0	A 2.4
16	40.9	15	44.5	42.5	A 7.4	A 2.0

From this it appears that the mean temperature of every week, between July 6, 1845, and September 28, was below the average, the mean value of which, during the period, is nearly 4 degrees below the average of the season; in some of the weeks, this departure amounted to 6 or 7 degrees, as will be seen in the last column. There can be little doubt that there has existed an intimate connexion between the temperature of the air and the failure of the crops. The temperature, after September 28, cannot have effected the crops to any great amount, but it will be seen that in some of the weeks, it has been above, and in others below the average. The temperature of the corresponding time between July 6, and September 28, in 1844, was 2 degrees below the average of the period.

So remarkable a departure from the average, may, possibly, have effect on the public health, as it doubtless has had on the crops, and comparisons of the meteorological phenomena of this year with those of any other plentiful year is highly important.

Blackheath, Nov. 17, 1845. JAMES GLAISHER.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE MARRIAGE OF LADY ADELA VILLIERS AND CAPTAIN IBBETSON.

Captain C. P. Ibbetson (11th Hussars) and Lady Adela Ibbetson arrived at Mr. Ibbetson's residence, on Chester terrace, Regent's Park, on Friday evening (last week), from Edinburgh, in order to concert measures for their marriage agreeably to the forms of the Established Church.

All the arrangements for the marriage were completed in the most private manner possible, and Monday was the day fixed for the performance of the sacred ceremony. Of course, the consent of the noble parents of the youthful bride had been obtained, and her uncle, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, was to have officiated at the solemn rite; but that high prelate was so engaged at Wells with the duties of his diocese as to be reluctantly absent.

Monday morning was selected, when the early hour of ten o'clock was appointed for the wedding party to assemble at St. Pancras New Church, in the New road.

The Very Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell, Canon of Windsor, and Chaplain to her Majesty, came to town from Chenies, expressly to perform the nuptial ceremony, and, with Mr. W. and Mrs. Russell, arrived at the church by a quarter before ten.

Captain Ibbetson, and his father, Mr. Henry Ibbetson, reached the church shortly afterwards, and were soon followed by Lady Adela, attended by Mr. Ibbetson, jun., and Mrs. Ibbetson. The bridal party forthwith repaired to the vestry, and, after a brief lapse of time, proceeded to the communion table, when the service commenced. Lady Adela was given away by her cousin, Mr. W. Russell, the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery.

The sacred ceremony having concluded, the gallant captain and his bride passed to the vestry, accompanied by their respective friends, to attest the legality of the marriage in the register.

In consequence of their previous matrimonial union having been solemnised according to the law of the Church of Scotland, there was a difference in the usual entry in the register. The gallant captain having signed his names as follow, "Charles Parke Ibbetson," her ladyship took the pen, and wrote, according to the instructions given, "Adela Corisande Maria Ibbetson, heretofore Villiers." The Very Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell, and the attesting witnesses, Mr and Mrs. W. Russell, Mrs. E. A. Ibbetson, and Mr Henry Ibbetson, also signed the register.

Captain and Lady Adela Ibbetson departed in the afternoon for the country, to pass a few weeks in retirement, when the gallant captain will rejoin his regiment in Ireland.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess Augustus of Saxe Coburg, proceeded this morning in the Home Park. Prince and Princess Augustus of Saxe Coburg, attended by the Baron de Wangenheim and Madame Angelet, left the Castle this morning in one of the Royal carriages and four for the Slough Station, and proceeded thence by a special train to town. Their Royal Highnesses returned this afternoon. Prince Albert shot this morning over the Royal preserves in the Great Park. Her Majesty held a Privy Council this afternoon at half past two o'clock. The Council was attended by the Duke of Wellington, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Stanley, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl Delawarr, the Earl of Lincoln, the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn, and the Earl of Haddington. The Council broke up at half past three o'clock, when most of the Cabinet Ministers left for Town. The Lord Chancellor, in consequence of his serious indisposition, and Lord Granville Somerset, who is abroad, were necessarily absent from the Council. The Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Stanley, remain upon a visit to the Queen. Lady Stanley arrived at the Castle this afternoon, on a visit to her Majesty. In consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather, since noon, her Majesty has not taken her usual airing this afternoon. The Royal dinner party this evening will include her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness De Spaeth, Lady Anne Macdonald, and Colonel Sir George Couper.

ILLNESS OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Lord Chancellor has been indisposed, at Turville Park, during the week, but we are happy to say that the latest accounts are favourable. We trust that several more times to inquire after the noble and learned lord. His lordship's attack has left him weak, and we understand that he will not attend the Court of Chancery again during the present term.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE.—We regret to learn that the Earl of Albemarle continues to labour under a partial deprivation of sight, at Quidenham Hall.

HEALTH OF LORD GRANVILLE.—The Earl and Countess of Granville arrived at their mansion, in Bruton street, on We. nesday, from Lady Cowper's villa, at Southampton. The noble Earl has sufficiently recovered in health to admit of his coming to town.

ILLNESS OF SIR ROBERT PEEL'S DAUGHTER.—We regret to state that Viscountess Villiers, daughter of Sir Robert Peel, as well as her family, have been attacked by scarlet fever. Her ladyship has been very seriously indisposed, but is now much better, according to the accounts received from Upton House, Warwickshire. The youthful members of the family are going on favourably.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—A marriage is definitively arranged between Lady Georgiana Toler, fifth daughter of the Dowager Countess of Norbury, and Mr. John Gurdon Rebow, of Wivenhoe Park, Essex. The nuptial ceremony is appointed to take place the first week in the ensuing month.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

GRAND DRESS AND FANCY BALL AND CONCERT AT GUILDHALL.—The grand dress and fancy ball, for the benefit of the City Ward Schools, took place on Wednesday night at Guildhall, at which the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress presided, supported by most of the Aldermen and members of the Corporation. The hall was brilliantly lighted with gas, in a variety of fanciful devices, the various banners of the several companies waving overhead, as upon the occasion of a Lord Mayor's feast. By eleven o'clock the hall became densely crowded, as well as the concert-room, and all the avenues leading thereto; so much so, indeed, that dancing with any degree of comfort, was quite out of the question. There was a tolerable mixture of costume, some of the most gorgeous and tasteful description, and many of the characters were ably sustained. Amongst the company were Lord Graham, Lord Muncster, Count Nolles, Count Potocki, Captain de Bathe, Captain Seymour, Sir Moses Montefiore, Lord Dudley Stuart, James Roberts, Esq., J. M. Blashfield, Esq., W. Johnson, Esq., John Carter, Esq., &c. It was stated during the evening that there were two thousand persons present, and that the subscription, exclusive of the sale of tickets, exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the committee. The concert appeared to give great satisfaction, the principal performers being Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Miss Sabilla Novelli, Mrs. Weiss (late Miss Barrett), Mrs. Anderson, Miss Cubitt, Miss Fyne, M. Benedict, Hobbs, Seguin, Signor Farrari Carle, &c.

NATIONAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The election day is fixed for Thursday, the 27th instant. Among the candidates is Mr. Minasi, the veteran artist, whose pen-and-ink drawings we have so often commended. His application well merits the attention of those who enjoy "the luxury of doing good."

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—At the last ordinary Meeting of the Institute of British Architects, a letter was read from Mr. Edward Hawkins, of this establishment, stating that the Council had appropriated a room solely for the reception of British Antiquities, and inviting the co operation of architects, under whose notice these chiefly came. It was stated that this attempt, which had previously been made, had always failed, in being introduced, for want of a nucleus, which would now be afforded in the extensive collection of Lord Pradhoe, through the instrumentality of the British Archæological Institute.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, Nov. 15, was 941, an amount below both the autumnal and annual averages, in which the numbers stand respectively 1,029, and 963. The mortality from affections of the lungs and respiratory organs is slightly below the average, the return for the week being 304, and for the autumnal average 323. During the same period, the number of births was 1,223, being an excess over the mortality of 287.

ANCIENT BATHS AT HOXTON.—The baths of St. Agnes Clair, at Hoxton, where the fatal fire, noticed in another part of our paper, occurred, it is supposed were celebrated for their medicinal properties during the possession of England by the Romans. This supposition originated in consequence of a discovery which was made about four years ago, while some navigators were excavating, opposite the baths, when, at a depth from the surface of about fourteen feet, they met with the spring by which the supply of water was obtained, the communication of which was for a time cut off. The stream of water was then found to pass through an aqueduct, composed of Roman tiles, which were well cemented together, and in excellent preservation. The date in the baths is 1692, about which period the locality was inhabited by the fashionable world, and not far from this spot, in Hoxton Old Town, stood last year a house which was at one time in the occupation of Cromwell, and Queen Elizabeth also resided in that neighbourhood. The baths are stated to have been frequented by Charles I., and some of the high personages of his court.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN TO OSBORNE HOUSE.—According to present arrangements, her Majesty and Prince Albert will take their departure from Windsor on Tuesday next for Osborne House. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal will accompany their illustrious parents. The Princess Alice and Prince Alfred will remain at Windsor, under the care of Lady Lyttelton, during the sojourn of the Court at Osborne House. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort are expected to return to Windsor about the 4th or 5th of December. The Christmas festivities will be kept up this year at the Castle with more than usual splendour. Several distinguished dinner parties will be given by her Majesty.

THE DEANERY OF CANTERBURY. The Rev. John Peel, brother of the Premier, will succeed to the Deanery of Canterbury, vacant by the promotion of Dr. Bagot to the see of Bath and Wells.

NEW ASSISTANT POOR-LAW COMMISSIONER.—The Poor law Commissioners have appointed G. Granville Pigott, Esq., late Chairman of the Aylesbury Union, to be an Assistant Poor-law Commissioner.

MEETING OF ECUADOR BONDHOLDERS.—Yesterday, a meeting of the holders of Ecuador Bonds (formerly Colombian) was held at the London Tavern, to consider the propriety of accepting an offer, made by Colonel Wright, on behalf of the Government of Ecuador, in liquidation of loans contracted in 1823 and 1824, when that State formed, along with Venezuela and New Grenada, the Republic of Colombia. After a brief discussion, in which the strongest feeling was expressed against the proposal, a resolution was put and carried, with but two dissentients, that it be rejected. It was also agreed that the Committee be empowered to take measures to effect more favourable terms for the bondholders, and that the assistance of the British Government be requested to forward their negotiations.

DEATH OF MR. TERRAIL, THE SINGER.—Mr. Terrail, the well-known alto singer, died on Thursday morning, aged sixty-one. Mr. Terrail was engaged for many years at the Ancient Concerts, and was a Clerk in the Pipe Office for upwards of thirty years.

SAVAGE ATTACK BY AN OLD WOMAN UPON HER DAUGHTER.—During the last few days the town of Oswestry has been disturbed by the commission of an outrage for which it would be difficult to find a parallel. It appears that an aged woman, named Susannah Rider, late a pauper in the Ellesmere union workhouse, had gone to reside with her son, a labourer, who, with his sister, occupied a cottage near Llanymynech. The mother, who is presumed to be subject to mental aberration, was, at such times, wholly ungovernable, and even desperate, when contradicted. She had a predilection to wander from home; and it was the province of the daughter to prevent her leaving the cottage when under the influence of this unhappy malady. On Friday morning (last week) the son having gone to his usual employment, the old woman got up to go out, which the daughter resisted, but, finding expostulation useless, she locked the door, putting the key into her pocket. This served to increase the old woman's fury, seizing an iron mounted till hook, she, at one blow, laid her helpless victim prostrate on the floor, and, whilst in a state of total insensibility, proceeded with savage ferocity to inflict several wounds on her head and body. The neighbours made forcible entry into the house, when they found every appearance that a desperate struggle had taken place. In the inner apartment the body of the daughter was discovered, from which a stream of blood had flowed to the threshold of the door. The outer room was also strewn with clots of blood and human hair torn off in the struggle. The wretched old woman was immediately secured. Mr. Owen, a medical gentleman, was called in, but he entertains no hope of her recovery.

SUPPOSED INCENDIARISM NEAR NOTTINGHAM.—On Wednesday night another fire, making the fourth within the short space of one month, broke out in the neighbourhood of Nottingham, under circumstances warranting a strong suspicion of incendiarism. Between nine and ten o'clock a glare of light was seen for many miles around, in the direction of Beeston, three miles from Nottingham, and soon after a special messenger arrived, bringing intelligence that a large stack-yard, in the centre of the above village, was on fire. Twelve out of fifteen large stacks, consisting of wheat, barley, peas, beans, oats, hay, chaff, and straw, one entire mass of flame. At half-past eight o'clock, Mr. Joseph Walker, farmer, of Beeston, the owner of the stacks, had walked by his stack yard, and seen all safe. In ten minutes after, a neighbour observed flames bursting out of a dill stack, and gave an alarm; in less than a quarter of an hour eight or nine of the stacks were on fire, owing, no doubt, to a brisk west wind which was blowing at the time directly upon them. Portions of burning materials flew upon the cottages adjoining, and set the thatch of two of them on fire. The damage is estimated at upwards of £1000, and of that sum only £400 is insured. A general report prevails that this mischief must have been the work of an incendiary.

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.—We regret to have to announce that another death, resulting from the accident on the Midland Line, near Barnsley, on the 26th ult., took place on Wednesday morning. We reported at the time of the accident that, in addition to the serious injuries received by Mr. Commissioner Bolster, which proved fatal, Police Sergeant John Stubbs, of the Leeds Detective Force, suffered a compound fracture of the leg. Although the operation of setting the leg was satisfactorily performed, the case has terminated fatally, and he died on Wednesday morning, at five o'clock, leaving a family of six young children wholly unprovided for. This is a case well calculated to excite the deepest sympathy, and it is to be hoped that the Midland Railway Company will make some provision for these helpless orphans.

THE TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY.

In the greater part of the impression of our Journal of last week, we detailed the very interesting proceedings near Tamworth, on Thursday, the 13th instant, the day appointed for Sir Robert Peel to turn the first turf of the Trent Valley Railway. The proposed line, which will be fifty-two miles in length, is to run from the Rugby Station of the London and Birmingham Railway to Stone, in Staffordshire; and a glance at the map of the country will show its importance with a view to direct communication between London and the manufacturing districts. The narrow gauge is intended to be adopted, and the undertaking is expected to be finished in about eighteen months. The engineers are Mr. R. Stephenson, jun., Mr. Bidder, and Mr. T. L. Gooch. The spot fixed on for the cutting of the first sod was in a field called Caunt's Close, adjoining Staffordshire Moor, and about half a mile from Tamworth. A very handsome mahogany navigator's wheelbarrow was prepared for receiving the turf, which was to be dug by the right hon baronet; it was designed by Mr. Holmes, of Liverpool, and was richly carved; it bore on each side of it the arms of Sir R. Peel, with his motto—"Industria." Of this state implement, as it may be termed, we annex an engraving. The superb spade, manufactured for the occasion, was engraved and described in our Journal of last week.

Shortly after one o'clock, the Mayor of Tamworth and the members of the Corporation proceeded to the Town Hall, where they were entertained by the Directors of the Company at a déjeûner prepared by Mr. Rhoades, of the King's Arms Inn, in excellent style. The chair was occupied by Mr. E. Tootal, the Deputy Chairman of the Company, and the vice chairs, by Mr. Joseph Hornby, of Liverpool, and Mr. Thomas Smith, of London. The toasts of "The Queen," "The Mayor and Corporation of Tamworth," and "Success to the Trent Valley Railway," were given and drunk with much applause. "The Health of Sir Robert Peel" was also drunk enthusiastically, with three times three, and one cheer more.

The company then rose to meet Sir R. Peel and party, who approached in several carriages from Drayton Manor. A procession was formed to the ground, and was accompanied by a band. Among the persons present we observed Sir R. and Lady Peel, Miss Peel, Mr. Edmund Peel (Chairman of the Company), Mrs. E. Peel, Mr. W. Yates Peel, Colonel ARBUTHNOT, M.P., Capt. A'COURT M.P., Miss A'Court, Mr. G. Hudson, M.P., Mr. Ricardo, M.P., Mr. Entwistle, M.P., Captain Carnegie, M.P., Mr. Watkins (Mayor of Manchester), Mr. Creed, &c Unfortunately, no arrangements were made to secure order at the spot where the ceremony was to take place; all persons were admitted to all parts of the ground; and when Sir R. Peel alighted he was, of course, surrounded by a throng, who occasionally even pressed upon him a little rudely, but evidently not with any hostile feeling. He was, however, not personally. The right hon. baronet looked well, but declined to partake of a late supper on his right foot, of which he has evidently not yet recovered the full use. Silence being obtained, and the chief personages having got out of their carriages, and assembled round Sir R. Peel, Mr. Edmund Peel addressed the assembled crowd, and concluded as follows:—

"I feel confident that this Railway is calculated to confer upon Tamworth in particular the greatest possible advantage. (Hear.) I believe that there is little doubt that Tamworth will be the central station of England, and I have every reason to expect that the post-office will be placed in this town. (Hear, hear.) I say that these are advantages which we must highly estimate; and, after my long connexion with this town, and knowing that a member of my family has the honour of representing it, I should be ashamed of myself if I could not participate in the feelings which I am sure must be entertained by every well-wisher of this borough. Sir, I will not detain you longer. It only remains for me to place this implement in your hands, and I trust you will value it as a memento of the undertaking

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND INDIA MAIL.

The India Mail of the 13th October arrived yesterday afternoon, by express, with papers and letters of that date. They bring an account of the death of Jowahir Singh, the Wuzeer, by the Sikh soldiery, in revenge for the death of Peshora Singh. The Queen Mother continues to direct the State affairs.

Letters to the 24th from Lahore state that Meeean Prithee had at first been appointed to carry on provisionally the affairs of the State. Rajah Lall Singh had been released; and Jewun Singh, who had not gone far, having been seized, received a good beating, but was set free. Lall Singh Morareea had hidden himself among his own troops. On the 24th Prithee Singh was deprived of the Seals of Office, and the Kanee assumed the full powers of Sirkar.

There is no news from Scinde. The ex-King of Cabul died of cholera at Loodianah. The Nizam's dominions continue disordered, and it is thought that hostilities will be resorted to. A civil war is threatening Burmah.

There is nothing new from China.

FRANCE.—The latest PARIS papers state that the panic-mongers had succeeded in creating a considerable depression upon 'Change. The Railroad Committee, of which the Minister of Public Works is President, has commenced its sittings, for the purpose of examining the documents which have been sent in by the respective companies undertaking the construction of the Paris and Strasbourg and the Tours and Nantes Railways. The result will be made known on Monday next, and the adjudication of these two lines will take place on the ensuing day.

ASIATIC OREGON CLAIMANT.—It appears, from the American papers received by the Great Western, that the Emperor of Russia is in the field as a claimant for the disputed Oregon territory. He maintains that his possessions extend to 54 degrees 40 minutes. We cannot learn the ground of his Imperial Majesty's claim, but the following official document has been issued:—"Department of State, Washington, Sept. 26.—The Russian Minister at Washington has informed the Secretary of State that the Imperial Government, desirous of affording efficient protection of the Russian territories in North America against the infractions of foreign vessels, has authorised cruisers to be established for this purpose along the coast by the Russian American Company. It is therefore recommended to American vessels to be careful not to frequent the interior seas, gulfs, harbours, and creeks, upon that coast, at a point north of the latitude of 54 degrees 40 minutes."

THE MURDER ON BOARD THE "WASP."—It will be recollected that at the last EXETER Assizes, nine foreigners were tried for the murder of Thomas Palmer, of her Majesty's Navy, and for piracy on the high seas. The trial lasted three entire days, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty" against seven of the prisoners, viz., Ribeyl, Francisco, Martinez, Santos, Serra, Macheval, and Alvas, and acquitted the other two. Several points of law were raised in favour of the convicted men, and the matter has been argued in the Court of Exchequer under a writ of error. The judges have not yet come to any decision. In the meantime the prisoners have been further respited for a fortnight, from Monday next the 24th inst., when the present respite will expire.

MANSLAUGHTER BY A POLICE INSPECTOR.—A police inspector, named NOTT, on Wednesday (last week) struck a prisoner whom he was conveying to the lock-up house, at Chipping Norton, on a charge of felony, from which blow the poor man died on the following morning. An inquest was held on Thursday, and the jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter," and NOTT was committed to Oxford Castle, to take his trial at the next assizes.

FRIGHTFUL MURDER IN STAFFORDSHIRE.—A horrid murder was perpetrated on Wednesday last week, at a place called Aiseger's Bank, in the parish of Audley, Staffordshire, which has produced the greatest excitement in the neighbourhood. The name of the murdered man was Adolphus Fielding; he was 49 years of age, and was a potter by trade. It appears that the murderer, by name Dean, a stonemason, had been absent from work, and Fielding went to his cottage. After he had been there some time, a woman who lived with Dean came home to the cottage, and, upon looking through the open door, she saw the bleeding body of the unfortunate man, Fielding, on the floor, deluged with blood, and Dean striking at the head with an axe. She raised an alarm, and numbers came to the spot, but, from the ferocious appearance of Dean, they were afraid to enter the cottage. Seeing the crowd, Dean took up a portion of the brains of his unhappy victim, and threw them at the bystanders. A collier, named SCOTT, more resolute than the rest, then attempted to secure him, and received several wounds about the neck and face, Dean having armed himself with a pair of razors and a knife. The infuriated man then bolted the door, and having placed the head of his victim on the fire, commenced blowing it with the bellows. It appearing the intention of the murderer to consume the body, several people got on the roof of the cottage, and, by pouring water down the chimney, extinguished the fire. They then stopped the chimney up, and the force of the steam and smoke drove him to one of the upper rooms. The street door was then forced by the villagers, and the extent of the frightful tragedy became manifested. The body still remained on the floor, and the head, when taken off the fire, was so burnt, that it scarcely presented a human aspect. During this time Dean stood at the top of the stairs, armed with another axe of a larger size than that he had first used, and he repelled his assailants by brandishing it about, and throwing bottles and other things that he could lay hands on, at them. Eventually, some policemen broke through the roof, and rushed upon him, but he was crouched in one corner of the room. What with his blackened features from dust and smoke, and his clothes thoroughly saturated in the blood of his unhappy victim, he presented a spectacle perfectly appalling. After a very great resistance, he was handcuffed, and then conveyed to the lock-up at Audley. At the inquest held on the body of poor Fielding, on Thursday, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder," and the prisoner was removed in custody to Stafford gaol, for trial.

TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY.—THE PROCESSION AT TAMWORTH.

which you so conscientiously and steadily supported; and I have reason to hope that the work so auspiciously commenced this day will be completed to the entire satisfaction not only of those connected with this Railway, but of the public in general. (Loud cheers.) The hon. gentleman then said, "I now beg to propose prosperity to the Trent Valley Railway."

This having been heartily responded to by the cheers of the multitude,

Sir Robert Peel, leaning on the spade, said—Mr. Edmund Peel, Mr. Mayor of Tamworth, and Gentlemen,—I have great satisfaction, in my capacity as a representative of the borough of Tamworth, in being present on this occasion. I have always attempted to reconcile those public duties which official station has imposed upon me, with the duties which I owe to my constituents, the inhabitants of this borough; and I see no reason why that official station should prevent me from being present at a ceremony interesting to my constituents and to the inhabitants of this district generally.

The Right Honourable Baronet, after explaining the great advantages of the Railway to the district, added—The way in which the directors must establish their claims to a continuance of the privileges they possess is, by being enabled to show that they combine the greatest velocity in travelling with the greatest degree of safety to the travellers. They must show that they have neglected no precaution that may diminish the risk of those accidents, the frequent occurrence of which has tended to shake confidence in railway travelling. (Hear.) They must make a sacrifice of pecuniary gain for the purpose of taking those precautions. They must show that they have consulted the convenience of all classes of railway travellers —of poor as well as rich. They must be [illegible] prov[illegible]ed for the comfort and accommodation of all classes—the third, as well as the first (hear); and, if there is a way, they will, by moderate fares and comfortable accommodation, encourage the use of locomotion, on which, after all, the great amount of prosperity of railways must depend. (Hear.) I advise them to take this course on a comprehensive view of their own interests, as well as for the sake of the public; and, if they do that, then I shall, in turning the first sod on this day, not only be commencing a line of railway through the Trent Valley, but I shall be laying a foundation of a permanent and prosperous company, which can establish a claim for Parliamentary support more powerful than the union of great companies, and more powerful than the canvassing of Members of Parliament, for their claims to public support will be founded on the proof that the privileges conferred on this company have been exercised for the public advantage. (Hear, hear.) I will now proceed to that part of my duty, which consists in turning the first sod in connexion with this undertaking. (Loud cheers.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL ENTERING TAMWORTH.

Sir R. Peel, then taking the spade, proceeded to dig some of the turf, and throw it into the barrow; and, after throwing about four spadefuls into the barrow, proceeded, amidst much cheering, to wheel it along a line of planks placed upon the grass. Three cheers were then given for Sir R. Peel, and three more for Lady Peel and the ladies. Sir R. Peel took the spade with him, and the barrow was borne behind his carriage by four men. A large party dined in the evening at Drayton Manor, and there was also a dinner at the King's Arms for several gentlemen who were not at Sir R. Peel's.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—THE AMATEURS.

(WITH ILLUSTRATIONS, BY KENNY MEADOWS.)

MASTER MATTHEW, (MR. LEECH

The private performance of Ben Jonson's play of "Every Man in his Humour," at Miss Kelly's theatre, some few weeks ago, by a party of amateurs, well known in the literary world—and, indeed, to the public generally, by their works—created a great deal of interest; and the general anxiety evinced to be present at another representation, suggested to these gentlemen the happy idea that they might turn their talents to account in aid of some charitable institution. As Mr. Charles Dickens had been the chief mover in the affair, collecting all the others about him, it was determined that the Sanatorium should be the favoured establishment—which owes its existence, we believe, in a great measure to Mr. Dickens's exertions; and, in the words of a statement appended to the playbills—"is designed to be a home in sickness for persons of the middle classes, of both sexes, who are absent from their own families; or who, in their own homes, have no convenient sick chamber, and no means of obtaining good nursing; persons able and willing to pay moderately for accommodation which they can accept without any forfeiture of their independence."

To aid this praiseworthy design, a Committee was formed of several influential members of the aristocratic, fashionable, and literary world: tickets, at a high price, were quickly disposed of. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, who is a patron of the Sanatorium, signified his intention of attending; and the result was, that on Saturday evening last, the St. James's Theatre was crowded by a most elegant audience.

We may briefly allude to the gentlemen who played upon this occasion. Mr. Dickens is the immortal "Boz." Mr. Foster is connected with the "Examiner" newspaper; and is the author of a work called "The Lives of Eminent Statesmen." Mr. Douglas Jerrold is well known as a writer of extraordinary power; and Mr. Mark Lemon, assisted by Mr. Henry Mayhew, is the Editor of "Punch." Mr. Leech is the popular comic illustrator, to whose pencil "Punch" is largely indebted for its success. Mr. Percoval Leigh wrote "The Comic Latin Grammar;" Mr. Frank Stone is the eminent artist, with whose pictures—"The Heart's Misgivings" and "The Last Appeal"—the public are well acquainted; and Mr. Dudley Costello is a writer of pleasant magazine articles. Mr. Cattermole, the artist, played the character sustained at the last performance by Mr. Thompson—a gentleman who, since that evening, has been united to the fair pianiste, Miss Christiana Weller. In addition to these, two of Mr. Dickens's brothers, and Mr. Charles Eaton, assisted to form the company.

The pieces selected for the evening's performances were the same as those in which the troupe made such a favourable impression on their literary and fashionable audience at Miss Kelly's Theatre, some weeks ago. The play was Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour;" the farce "A Good Night's Rest,"—an adaptation of "Passé Minuit," so popular in its Covent Garden version of "Two in the Morning." A weaker play, in construction, than "Every Man in his Humour," it would be difficult to find out of Ben's own folio. His "Bartholomew Fair" and "Every Man out of his Humour" are worse, certainly. Still, there is a variety of "humours" for the actors; and for men of some intellectual mark, the play may be said in one sense to be well chosen, from the opportunity it gives them of showing their power to detect and reproduce their author's conceptions. The actors of Saturday night did this in a remarkable manner: and though professional performers may sneer at little awkwardnesses, in the want of ease and finish inseparable from amateur efforts,—they would do well to take a lesson from these tyros, in careful study and respect for the author's meaning and intention in his dealings with the creation of his brain. The play could not have been so indulgently performed by any dramatic company now in London.

Mr. Dickens's Bobadil was the best impersonation of the night, and a performance of very high merit, even if measured by a technical standard. Mr. Foster's Kitely, though too much in the manner of Macready, was most intelligent; and marked, admirably, the passing suspicions, and quick-coming doubts of that most moon-stricken of jealous husbands. Mr. Lemon, in Brainworm, deserves great praise for his absence of effort and exaggeration with which he passed from one disguise to another; and Mr. Jerrold, in Master Stephen, exhibited remarkable finish and meaning in his by-play—that part of the actor's business often so unaccountably neglected on the stage. Mr. Leech, as Master Matthew; Mr. Leigh, as Cob; and Mr. F. Stone, as Old Clement; did justice to their parts, as did, also, Mr. Mayhew, in Old Knowell. The costume was perfect. The mise en scène might have been improved: it was better at Miss Kelly's.

In the farce, Mr. Dickens displayed his versatility in Keeley's part of the Tormented Clerk; while Mr Lemon assumed, with great effect, that of the Stranger. It was pleasant to hear the genuine and unforced merriment of the crowded house during the farce; for, sooth to say, the play, though, in this case, interesting, from the reputations of the actors, is not likely to create much side-shaking.

Another performance was announced by Mr. Foster, at the conclusion of the entertainments; and this is to take place about Christmas, for the benefit of Miss Kelly. We have reason to believe that Ben Jonson's play of "The Alchemist" will be selected for the occasion.

(Next week, we shall present to our readers another pair of character portraits from the performance on Saturday night; which have been deferred for want of room.)

KITELY, (MR. FOSTER).

FRENCH PLAYS.

On Friday night, the 14th inst., M. Dumery made his début as M. Jovial; ou l'Huissier Chansonnier, in a vaudeville bearing that title. M. Jovial is a bailiff who is continually striving to drive off the conscientiousness of the very un-benevolent office he holds, by uttering songs and snatches in favour of his avocation and of the system of imprisonment for debt. He arrives at an inn for the purpose of arresting a young spendthrift, Saint Leon (M. Flimket), and finding a valet who gives his name as Saint Germain (but who is in reality Saint Leon himself thus disguised to foil his creditors), determined to "pump" the valet as to the whereabouts of his master; and for this purpose invites him to dinner and plies him with strong wine. Saint Leon in the course of his repast discovers the nature and business of his host, and at sunset (at which period it appears that the functions of the bailiff cease for some time), he acquaints M. Jovial that he is the person he is in quest of—i.e., the veritable Saint Leon. The bailiff is rather discomfited and determines not to quit him, but Saint Leon manages to get away. In the second act, Saint Leon having thrown aside his disguise, enters, in a great flurry and covered with dust, into a house where reside a rich young widow Elise Dalby (Mdlle. Marteleur) and his own lady-love Cecile (Mdlle. Anna Grave). They had both seen him at the inn in pities him with strong wine. Saint Leon in the course of his repast discovers the plight, but he explained to them it was to escape some unpleasant consequences of an affair of honour. Here, unfortunately, he is met by his friend M. Jovial, who now arrests him in good earnest. Saint Leon is quite au désespoir; but the idea suddenly strikes him of marrying the widow for her money, and throwing over his love plighted to Cecile. An interview is granted and a very ludicrous scene occurs. M. Jovial will not let Saint Leon quit his presence; and ties a bell-rope round his leg, concealing himself under the table, and giving Saint Leon more length of rope, inch by inch, as his suit seems likely to prosper. At the same time Saint Leon's love-declaration is worded in a series of equivoques and double entendres between his position with regard to the bailiff, and his sentiments with respect to the widow, which are very clever and amusing. The climax then takes place, Saint Leon breaks loose, and flings himself at her feet; the table is upset, and M Jovial is discovered; and Cecile, who has been concealed in an adjoining room, and has overheard all that has passed, enters and upbraids him. After sundry explanations and excuses on the part of St. Leon, as to his reasons for proposing to the widow, the bailiff is paid, and the current of true love once more runs on smoothly. Mdlle. Marteleur had a very poor part, but made the most of it. M. Dumery is a comic actor of some ability; but not to be ranked amongst the first class of French comedians. His songs were excellent; but to a full of French subtleties and idiomatic slang phrases to be thoroughly understood. The laugh was, however, provoked to its fullest pitch, and what more is wanted? This piece was followed by "Le Capitaine Roquefinette," which we noticed last week, and which seems likely to become as great a favourite here as in Paris. After it there was a one-act vaudeville called "L'Oubli; ou la Chambre Nuptiale." This is a very broad farce, purely of that kind which we imagined only the loose morality of a French audience would allow to be heard through. It is full of coarse jests, occasionally bordering on the immodest. Lafont and Mdlle. St. Marc played in it admirably; and the piece, notwithstanding its lattude, was most successful.

On Monday evening the little comedy of "Catherine; ou la Croix d'Or," was played. Lafont took his old part of Austerlitz, and Mdlle. St. Marc that of Catherine—performed here, the season before last, by Madame Albert. It is always an ungracious task to draw comparisons, but the recollection of Madame Albert in this piece would force itself upon us. Indeed, we would not have had the piece produced until that accomplished artiste arrived. We must, however, in justice to Mdlle. St. Marc, observe that she gave very great satisfaction, although it was injudicious to place her in this position. "Le Capitaine Roquefinette" was again played. The theatre continues to be crowded with the most elegant audiences.

PRINCESS'

A very excellent adaptation of the charming French drama, "Jeannette et Jeannetton," was produced at this theatre on Tuesday evening, under the name of "The Violet," and with the most perfect success; indeed, it is some time since we have seen an audience so interested in the progress of the action. It is very difficult, however, to give the plot in detail, as the various positions of the characters depend upon instant double (a working jeweller—Mr. Wallack) has two daughters, Blanchette (Mrs. Stirling), and Blanche (a débutante); or rather, one of them is his own child, and the other is an adopted one—the orphan of an old General who had patronised him. His wife, whilst bringing the two infants to him in Paris, is murdered by some marauding Cossacks; and he is perfectly unable to tell which is his own child and which is the orphan. Under this position, many amusing incidents of the piece arise. The old Marchioness d'Ormille (Mrs. Fosbroke) hears of this, and, knowing that the child of the late General will be one of the richest heiresses in France, is anxious to get her as a wife for her nephew; but the difficulty before alluded to prevents her carrying this scheme into effect. At length, amongst the General's papers, a letter is found, wherein it is stated that the child was marked with a violet on her right arm; this Blanchette is found to be the daughter. A variety of incidents then leads to her marriage with a certain Duke (who does not appear), and she is enabled to present Blanche with a handsome portion, with which she weds Bernay (Mr. Leigh Murray), a son of Prevpet, a wealthy jeweller (Mr. Granby). This gives but a faint notion of the interest created during the progress of this excellent piece: its construction is singularly nice and graceful; and, admirably played as it was, the audience were enchanted at the piece arises. Saturday (Friday).—In to-day's market the supply of beasts was the time of year considered, large, but of very middling quality. The primest Scots, &c., sold steadily, at fully Monday's prices; but those of all other kinds had a downward tendency. Of sheep the supply was also full average, and the mutton trade ruled active, and full currencies were obtained in every instance. Prime small calves sold freely, other kinds of veal slowly, at late rates. In pigs, a full average amount of business was passing, at full prices. Milch cows sold at from 16l to 21l 5s each.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

[From our City Correspondent.]

At the opening of the English Market on Monday, affairs generally as anmed a more promising aspect, and the stocks quoted with tolerable firmness the advanced price of 93⅞. Some Bearing operations, however, towards the close of business, altered the value of quotations, and 93⅝ 93⅞ were last marked. Several heavy sales, on account of the Insurance Office depressed Tuesday's Market. An opinion prevailing that, with proverbial wariness, these large establishments were generally getting out of Stock, for the sake of re to more profitable investments hereafter, coupled with doubts as to the result of the Bank meeting on Thursday, caused a continued heaviness on Wednesday and Thursday morning, until the hour of delibera tion had expired. Upon the meeting breaking up without any further in crease on the rate of discount, prices improved a point; but still it cannot be said that the market approached firmness. The last price marked for Consols was 93⅝ for money, and 93⅞ for account. Exchequer Bills have fluctuated during the week from 24, 27, to 23, 25, but close at 26, 24 prem. New Three and a Quarters per Cents have been done and closed at 97⅜. Reduced are 94⅞. Bank Stock has gradually improved from 202 to 204, to 205, 205, at which quotation it was last done. Annuities for Terms are 10 11 10ths

In the Foreign House, Spanish, Mexican, and Portuguese have been principally dealt in. Spanish Five per Cents, on Monday, quoted, with tolera ble steadiness, 20¾ to ⅞; and the Three per Cents, 35¾ to ⅞. These prices were unit, however, of one duration, for Five per Cents, on Tuesday, were receding to 20¾ to ⅞, and, on Wednesday, to 20¾, since which they have not improved. Not a bargain was registered on Thursday in the Three per Cents. The closing prices are—for the Five per Cents, 20¾; the Three per Cents, (nominally), 35¾ to ⅞. Mexican was depressed at the commencement of the week, but closes rather better, at 30⅜. Portuguese has receded from 39¼ to 38¾. Some financial manœuvres with a view to enhance the price of this Stock for speculative purchases, wil, in all probability, be attempted shortly. Prudence in purchasing upon any sudden rise is therefore recommended Brazilian stock at 80; Buenos Ayres at 40⅛; Danish, 82⅞. Ecuador has not been much dealt in, a general feeling of disapprobation with the terms offered by the Government, everywhere prevailing. Mexican 30, Portuguese at 38¾, and Dutch are heavy at 94¾; the Four Per Cent. Certificates, Two and a Half Per Cents., 60¾

The Share Market has fluctuated during the week, in accordance with Consols. Few of the new Scrips are saleable, unless at a heavy discount. Very little, however, is now offered, parties holding, preferring to await the result of circumstances, instead of selling at a certain loss. The Amalgamation of the Essex and Suffolk, and that with its late opponent, the Chelmsford and Bury, makes its going to Parliament under the best auspices a matter of certainty. At a great meeting held at Cambridge, the result of which will be found in another part of the paper, abundant reasons were afforded that the fusion of lines is considered preferable to wasting thousands on parliamentary opposition. The example emanating from such high authority will, it is to be hoped, meet with general adoption. At the close of the Market prices continued dull, but without any materia. depression. Saturday Morning.—The Consol Market was extremely depressed yesterday, and the Foreign and Share Markets proportionately declined. The posture of affairs with regard to the Oregon question, appears to be the assigned cause. At closing, Consols quoted 93⅝ ⅞ for money, and 93⅞ for time.

Mr. Broderip. Did Captain Johnstone make any reply to that prayer or not?—Witness. No. Captain Johnstone said, "I'll have my own law to-day." In the afternoon, about three, or half past three o'clock, the captain ordered two men to take Mars out of his sight, and told one of the men to squeeze him.

Mr. Broderip. In what state was Mars then?—Witness. He was in a dreadful state; I could not perceive his wounds from the clothes he had upon him.

Mr. Broderip. Was he able to stand?—Witness: No, sir. He was carried out of the cabin, and the captain ordered the men to prick him with a bayonet to make him stand upright. (Sensation.) The bayonet was in Julian Cordivialle's hand. A boy had a sword on the other side of him, but I know well they acted under the greatest intimidation. I did not see Mars after his death.

After some conversation, it was agreed to adjourn the inquiry until Tuesday next.

We annex an Engraving of the Tory, lying in the West India Docks. She is a full rigged ship, and has the appearance of having come off a long voyage, and having lost her foretop-gallant-mast. She is rather deeply laden, and has a very valuable cargo on board—stated to be worth £80,000.

THE MARTYRS' MONUMENT, EDINBURGH.

The view here presented is taken from the "North Bridge" of Edinburgh, a thoroughfare thrown across the deep ravine which divides the old from the new town. This remarkable depression was formerly a lake known as the "Nor' Loch." It will soon be chiefly remarkable for a confluence of railway termini. On the west side of the bridge, the Glasgow and Newhaven railways will end in splendid structures now being raised; whilst the east side—close to the church of Queen Mary of Guelders, seen in our sketch—will be occupied by the terminus of the "North British," nearly at the foot of the Calton Hill.

This eminence may be designated the Monumental Necropolis of Scotland, for on it are congregated most of the structural memories of great men of which the modern Athens boasts. Some of these are models of elegance and good taste; others, again, are nearly the reverse. That circular lump of masonry, facing the spectator, which bears so obstinate a resemblance to a couple of double Gloucester cheeses, placed one on the other, is the Monument of David Hume, the historian; behind it, and to the left, are the more elegant tributes to the memories of Dugald Stewart and Professor Playfair. The obelisk next to Hume's Monument is the chief object of our notice—the Martyrs' Monument.

Upon the summit of the Calton Hill stands Nelson's Monument, which is remarkable for the commanding beauty of its site, and the ugliness of its design. "It is modelled," remarked a modern Greek, in his description of the Modern Athens, "after a Dutch skipper's spy glass, or a butter-churn." The castellated buildings on the right, are the County Gaol, and the Bride well; behind them, the neat and well designed Monument of Robert Burns.

Having thus catalogued the chief objects of the scene, it is time we said a word or two concerning the "Martyrs" and their Monument; a very necessary duty, as it is not unlikely that most of our readers will have seen their names here for the first time; for, except amongst a few, even in Scotland, their political sufferings are nearly forgotten. They were Messrs. Muir, Palmer, Gerrald, Skirving, and Margarot; who, in 1793-4, at the time when, as Sidney Smith remarked, no man with a less income than five hundred a-year dared to express an honest opinion—dared to advocate Reform in Parliament, and other sentiments, which, at that period, were considered "flat rebellion."

Muir was the only son of wealthy parents, of Glasgow, in the university of which city he studied for a time divinity, but imbibing liberal principles and espousing them with ardour, he removed to Edinburgh, and finally became a member of the Scottish bar. In 1792, he became Vice-President of a society entitled "The Associated Friends of the Constitution and of the People," and one of the most active Reformers of the City. The French Revolution was then at its height, and Great Britain was in great danger from the rash acts and extravagant sentiments of its English sympathisers. Muir was classed amongst them, arrested on certain charges of sedition, and eventually tried, found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years.

Skirving was the son of a farmer, of Liberton, close to Edinburgh, and had been educated for the Dissenting, or, as they say in Scotland, the Burgher Church, but became a farmer, and published several treatises on agriculture. His pursuits bringing him to Edinburgh, and his sentiments coinciding with the above association, he became its Secretary. He was arrested and tried January 6th, 1794, and sentenced also to transportation.

Palmer was an Englishman, and pastor of a small Unitarian congregation in Dundee; a friend of Skirving, and arrested in consequence of some letters found amongst Skirving's papers. Gerrald was the son of an Irish settler in the West Indies, who came over to this country, and finally went to Edinburgh, to assist in the political agitation then in full force. He too was arrested, tried and transported. Though they were tried several months apart, they were sent out to the antipodes in the same ship. Some time after their arrival, the condition of these unfortunate convicts is thus described in a letter from Muir—

"I am pleased with my situation, as much as a man can be, separated from all he loved and respected. Palmer, Skirving, and myself, live in the utmost harmony. Of our treatment here, I cannot speak too highly. Gratitude will for ever bind me to the officers, civil and military. I have a neat little house here, and another two miles distant, at a farm across the water, which I purchased."

Muir's fate excited great sympathy in America; and a vessel was actually despatched from New York to effect his escape, and he succeeded in getting off. His destination was France; and he afterwards went into a Spanish ship, bound to Cadiz, on his way thither. Spain was at that time at war with Britain; and an English vessel, blockading the port of Cadiz, attacked the frigate. A desperate action ensued, in which Muir fought with the Spaniards and against the English, with the greatest intrepidity, until he was severely wounded. It was known to the English that Muir was on board the frigate, but, when the ship struck, the Spaniards said that he had been killed and thrown overboard during the action; and, by some means or other, he was concealed for six days, and at last sent on shore with the rest of the wounded prisoners. He escaped to Paris, where his company was courted by the highest circles in France; and, indeed, he acquired the sympathy and esteem of all classes in that great community. Nothing was wanting, on their part, to make him happy and of this, the grateful homage of his heart fully showed that he was deeply sensible. But his constitution was fast sinking. The wounds he had received were found to be incurable; and shortly afterwards, viz., on the 27th of September, 1798, he expired at Chantilly, near Paris, and was interred there by the public authorities, with every possible mark of respect.

Skirving, having become a heritor and freeholder in New South Wales, died there in the spring of 1796. Only three days previously, Gerrald breathed his last.

Such was the fate of three of the men to whom the obelisk has been erected in Edinburgh, under the name of the Martyrs' Monument. In 1836, Mr. Joseph Hume called a meeting, and organised a subscription in London for the purpose, and on the 21st of August, 1844, the first stone was laid in the Calton burying ground, a few yards from the circular structure erected to David Hume. A procession was formed in "The Meadows," consisting chiefly of the members of the Complete Suffrage Union, dressed in black. They proceeded through the Parliament-square, passing closely the Court-house, where had been passed the sentences on Muir, Palmer, Gerrald, Skirving, and Margarot, which the public voice was on this day so emphatically reversing. The procession then walked down the High-street; where it was joined by eight members of the Town Council; many former members being already in its ranks. It then proceeded along the North-bridge to Waterloo-place, with difficulty penetrating the immense crowd, and stopped opposite the gate of the Calton burial ground. There, as many as could find admittance to the burial ground, left the ranks of the procession, joined the Committee and subscribers, and proceeded to the site of the Monument. Among those present were Mr. Skirving, from Kirkaldy, son of Skirving, the martyr; and Mr. William Moffat, the friend and law agent of Muir, at his trial; in both of whom the proceedings seemed to excite the most lively interest.

When the company had all assembled, Mr. Joseph Hume, M.P., from an elevated platform, delivered an eloquent and feeling address.

The proceedings were wound up by a dinner and a banquet.

This Monument has only been recently finished. It is ninety feet high, nearly one-third higher than Cleopatra's Needle, of which it is an imitation. It was intended that a sort of inauguration should take place when the inscription is added; but, as yet, Mr. Hume has been unable to visit Edinburgh, to perform the last act of the drama in which he has already been a principal performer.

For much of the information contained in this sketch we are indebted to Mr. W. Tait, of Edinburgh, as well as to his excellent "Magazine" for January, 1837.

MEMOIR OF MR. WALLACE.

Public curiosity is always piqued in respect to the early struggles of eminent musicians. In the varied incidents of their career, one loves to trace the influences of art and the events which gradually call forth the supremacy of a master-mind. A biographical notice of Mr. Wallace, if given at length, would transport us to scenes of exciting interest both in the Old and New World; and, doubtless, the successful composer will in due course make his début as an author, for his life has been one of romance and adventure, fully exemplifying the adage that truth is stranger than fiction. We can but allude rapidly to some leading points of his eventful travels in the other hemisphere.

Mr. Wallace is a native of Ireland, and was born, as we believe, in 1815. Waterford boasting the honour of his birth. His father was a practical musician; and, at seven years of age, the young pupil was already a clever pianist. It was in Dublin, however, that his musical genius was strongly developed. At twelve years of age, having studied the violin, he joined the orchestra of the Theatre Royal, curiously enough, when Mr. Bunn was lessee. During the absence of Barton, the leader, Mr. Wallace, at the age of fifteen, became the chef, having been unanimously called to that post by his orchestral colleagues. Having been strongly eulogised by the magician Paganini, for his fine execution of one of the difficult pieces of the latter, he was encouraged to greater exertions. He could retain in memory all the music he heard. Madame Catalani noticed in flattering terms the extraordinary faculties of the youth. Mr. Wallace had the honour of leading Beethoven's oratorio of "The Mount of Olives," on its first performance in the Irish capital, by the Anacreontic Society. It does not appear that he studied under any particular master. He took lessons in harmony and composition from one teacher, violin exercises under another, and Czerny's studies were his resources for pianoforte playing.

At the age of 18 Mr. Wallace quitted Dublin, for a long sea voyage to Sidney, on account of consumptive symptoms having manifested themselves in his constitution. From the Governor, Sir John Burke, the artist received great acts of kindness, and he gave concerts at Sidney with great success. Here the romantic and enthusiastic tendencies of his character developed themselves, and he commenced a series of extraordinary journeys both by sea and land. An American paper states that he has been a sailor before the mast. From Sidney, Mr. Wallace sailed to Van Diemen's Land, and then visited New Zealand, where he engaged in the whale fisheries. After he left the savages of the Bay of Islands, he went to the East Indies, where he remained a year. Here he had a most miraculous escape in a tiger hunt, when an enormous tiger sprang upon his horse, and he was thrown senseless to the ground. Recovering his consciousness and presence of mind, he drew a pistol from his belt, and, observing the tiger, who had been carried by his bound some yards beyond him, he took a deliberate aim; the ball entered the head of the animal, who fell dead, nearly crushing his vanquisher.

Mr. Wallace next sailed from Madras for Valparaiso, in the Republic of Chili; where, and at Santiago, he gave concerts. He was in the last mentioned city of earthquakes, at one of these terrific scenes. From Santiago, he crossed the majestic Cordilleras of the Andes to Buenos Ayres, where his stay, however, on account of the blockade, was but brief. He returned to Santiago, where he displayed a remarkable evidence of his enthusiasm for art. He had given a pledge to play at a concert on a certain day, in Valparaiso, for the benefit of a charity, but some circumstances drove the promise from his memory. Being reminded by a friend of the fact, when it was apparently impossible for him to reach Valparaiso in time, Wallace resolved to ride on horseback the whole distance, 125 miles, to keep faith; and he performed this equestrian feat with 18 horses, in less than 11 hours, and was in time for the concert. From Chili, he went to Peru, and gave a concert at Lima, which produced the large sum of 5000 dollars. His curiosity prompted him to be an eye witness of a battle between the Peruvians and the Chilians, and he there became acquainted with Santa Cruz.

Crossing the Isthmus of Panama, Mr. Wallace next visited the West Indies, and gave concerts at Jamaica, Cuba, and the Havanuah. His flight was then taken to Mexico, and he performed both at Vera Cruz, Tampico, and the city of Mexico. In the last-mentioned locality he had a narrow escape of perishing in the Inquisition. It is in this edifice, erected by the Auto da Fé Spaniards, that concerts are now given, and whilst the audience were assembling in the hall above, the musician's antiquarian lore prompted him to examine the dungeons below, without a guide. He lost his way, and it was only by accident that he was extricated from his perilous position. He led the opera band in Mexico, and then crossed the Gulf to New Orleans, where he had a brilliant reception. There is an admirable orchestra in this city, led by Prevot, of Bordeaux, which piques itself on its rivalry to the Parisian Conservatoire. Mr. Wallace was so much cheered by these French artists, that they laid down their instruments, and abandoned the tutti to applaud le Jeune Irlandais. The climate there had its effect on the subject of our memoir, and for seven months, prostrated by fever, he did not touch a note. He returned to New Orleans, after his tour to Missouri, and gave a farewell concert.

His progress through the United States, as it appears from all the newspapers, was one combined series of triumphs. The novelty of a violinist setting aside his bow to play the piano, seemed to have astonished the Transatlantic critics. At Boston, he came into direct collision with Ole Bull, the Norwegian; Artot, the Belgian; and Vieuxtemps, also a Belgian—three most renowned violinists; but Mr. Wallace, if we are to credit the local organs, maintained his ground. After complimentary farewell concerts had been given to him everywhere by the amateurs, especially at New York, he returned to Europe, remained three days in London, and then made a musical tour in Germany and Holland. Last spring he reached London, and, at Miss Hawes's Concert, made his début as a pianist, at the advice of his friends, who suggested that he would obtain a great teaching connexion. Fortunately, his operatic talents were discovered, and the acceptation of his MS. opera by Mr. Bunn has given a proper direction to them.

It is a curious coincidence that both Balfe and Wallace have led Dublin orchestras, have travelled much, and their first operas were produced by the Drury Lane Lessee, Mr. Fitzball, in both instances, writing their libretti. We understand that such is Mr. Wallace's intense application, he has studied all the instruments of the orchestra, to make himself master of their qualities. We learn from persons who have been able to appreciate the character of the composer, that he is a modest, retired man, but animated and intelligent when excited to talk over his romantic career. His enthusiasm for art is stated to be unbounded. If not ruined by awaking one morning here and finding himself famous, he has a glorious prospect before him, and, as a native musician, we are proud to publish his portrait to the world.

OPENING OF THE NEW NATIONAL THEATRE AT LISBON.

(From our own Correspondent.)

This splendid National Theatre, unquestionably one of the very finest in Europe, was opened on the 29th ult., King Fernando's birthday; with a gala, whose magnificence, éclat, and complete success, will be long remembered in Portugal. It is the work of Senhor Lodi, a Portuguese architect of distinguished social position. I send you a fine drawing of the building, with portions of the adjacent Square of the Rocio, or Praça do Dom Pedro, executed by a French artist of great merit, now in Lisbon, Mons. C. Legrand. Your readers will be able to form, from this sketch, in addition to a perfect representation of the façade of the Theatre, a very fair idea of Lisbon house architecture, and of the national costume of the inhabitants—subjects which have, perhaps, been less illustrated of late years than any other portion of Europe.

The traditional Peninsular balconies, both singly attached to separate windows and extending the whole length of the house, may be seen both to the right and left; and an inkling may be caught of the primitive lamps and street-posts, which are by no means, however, divested either of grace or local colouring. The costume of the great bulk of the female classes may be seen to the extreme left, consisting invariably of a cloak of dark cloth reaching to the heels, and provided with a cape descending to the waist; while the head has no covering whatever but a white muslin handkerchief, rather tastefully disposed, and displaying for its sole coquetry an extreme purity of whiteness. This costume contrasts singularly enough with the dark mantilla of their Spanish neighbours, and gives to the women of Lisbon something of a nun-like and too much of a demure aspect. All over the square may be seen strewn the varied costumes of the male population, both military and civilian. The soldiers' shakos, it will be observed, are the only shakos in Europe which have been imitated from that which was in use until very lately in the British army.

The Frenchified dandies of Lisbon are seized by the artist almost as faithfully as in a Daguerréotype; the prevalent chapeau bas is in full force; the extravagant costume of a young boy (in this the Lisbonians delight) is well represented; and to the right a native horse is ridden by a Portuguese maio, with his tufted round hat, his handy jacket, long boots, and shovel-shaped iron stirrups, weighing several pounds, and reminding the spectator of the East, with a perfect delineation of locality and character.

MUSIC.

"MARITANA," OPERA IN THREE ACTS. BY E. FITZBALL. THE MUSIC BY W. V. WALLACE.

Three times have we heard this new work since its first representation at Drury Lane Theatre last Saturday evening, and on each occasion have the ovations been much the same, namely seven or eight encores, great applause for the composer at the termination of every act, and his appearance before the curtain vehemently insisted upon after the finale, the same compliment being extended to the principal singers, with the exception of Mr. H. Phillips, whose final exit is early in the third act. There has been no opera produced for years that has created a greater sensation. The most eminent members of the musical profession have attended the performances, and on all hands it is agreed that Mr. Wallace is destined to occupy a most prominent position amongst our native musicians. There are, of course, differences of opinion as to the extent of his capabilities, but rarely has such unanimity prevailed on the advent of a new composer.

The antecedents of Mr. Wallace were little known to the public. He came almost as a perfect stranger. Only to concert frequenters was he at all familiar. We will frankly own that, in the last season, when he appeared as a pianist and composer, we were not at all prepossessed in his favour. His playing, compared with the great lion-artists with whom he entered the lists—and it is by this rivalry we judged him—was anything but electrifying; nor did we trace in any of the compositions, vocal and instrumental, then inserted in the programmes, the presence of a master-mind. His concert début, to the eyes of independent amateurs, was, in fact, a failure: we state the fact broadly, for Mr. Wallace can afford to hear the truth. When, therefore, we heard a rehearsal of his opera, through the polite attention of the lessee, on Friday week, we were fairly taken by surprise; but at once we felt compelled to avow the presence and supremacy of a genius. We predicted a great and decided success, by listening only to his inspirations without scenic adjuncts; and although, on the Saturday night, the scandalous spectacle was exhibited of a party going into a theatre expressly to condemn the maiden work of a young composer, public opinion was omnipotent, and the unknown struggler for musical fame achieved a glorious triumph for himself, for the honour of his country, and for art which is European. We have been delighted spectators of the ratification of this great success, and right glad are we that the spirit of criticism has been generally expressed in a generous tone, although the courage to praise heartily, whether from prejudice or dim perception, has been in some instances wanting. Our reasons for the ardent admiration we experience for Mr. Wallace's "Maritana" we will now venture to explain to our readers.

The libretto has been avowedly adapted by the author from the French drama by Dumanoir and Dennery, of "Don César de Bazan," English versions of which went the round of the London theatres last season, with immense success. Mr Fitzball explains that the public is better disposed to favour operas, with whose subjects, like "Otello," &c., they are already familiar, than newly-invented plots. This has been almost invariably exemplified, and Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl" is amongst the best proofs of the assertion; for that opera has had unbounded success, whilst Benedict's "Brides of Venice," infinitely its superior, as a musical work, failed, owing to the badness of the libretto. The question, then, arises whether the subject of "Don Cæsar" is suggestive to a composer, and upon this point there is much controversy. "Don Cæsar," although a Parisian piece, is essentially Spanish in character; but, when it traced the dramas of Calderon de la Barca. There is the same mixture of pathos and buffoonery, the same want of moral, show of intrigue, and perpetual perplexity. The plot is entangled with a knot of incidents, truthful and unexpected coincidences. In the group of dramatis personæ, the parts of Don Cæsar, with his chivalric bearing, and his courage, and his generosity—of Maritana, with her romantic and enthusiastic temperament, and soaring ambition—and of Lazarillo, the spirit, then, arises whether the subject of "Don Cæsar" is suggestive to a composer, and upon this point there is much controversy. "Don Cæsar," although a Parisian piece, is essentially Spanish in character; but, when it traced the dramas of Calderon de la Barca. There is the same mixture of pathos and buffoonery, the same want of moral, show of intrigue, and perpetual perplexity. The plot is entangled with a knot of incidents, truthful and unexpected coincidences. In the group of dramatis personæ, the parts of Don Cæsar, with his chivalric bearing, and his courage, and his generosity—of Maritana, with her romantic and enthusiastic temperament, and soaring ambition—and of Lazarillo, the spirit, with his devotedness and gratitude to his protector, stand prominently forward in interest. On the first night, we were under the impression that the incidents were too crowded to fix sufficiently the attention; but, since then, judicious retainments have been made, and the plot works rapidly and effectively. Reduced from four hours to less than three, every trace of heaviness has been removed.

The overture opens with a very andante maestoso, succeeded by a sombre allegro, in the minor key, gliding into a charming melody, with harp and violoncello accompaniments. A solid fugual coda, led off by the trombones and basses, introduces a spirited barcarole in the major key. The introduction of themes afterwards heard throughout the opera, is ingeniously contrived. It may cause want of unity, from the crowding together of so many subjects, but it is politic to prepare the ear for them. There are some remarkably well written passages for the violins in this overture, which has only the fault of being too long. The curtain is up, and we are now—in Don quixote—in the Spanish capital. There is a bright Castilian sun shining on Madrid: there, in the mixed crowd, are the contrabandista, the bull-fighter, the bandit, the majo, and there is Maritana, in her gitana costume, who is called upon by the people, in a chorus in F flat, to sing; and, as this is an opera and not a ballet, Maritana complies, in a quaint romanza, three-four time, opening in A minor, and ending in the major, with a characteristic bolero accompaniment in the violins under current. She tells of the gipsy maid who enchants a king, little suspecting that the monarch is actually watching her at the moment, and the chorus echo gaily to her legend. Don José, on the track of the King, and seeing the royal affection for the Gitana, diplomatically resolves to make her the instrument to further his (the Minister's) favourite penchant for the Queen. Don José invites Maritana again to warble, and then is heard the romance, "The Harp in the Air," with that instrument playing the most delicious arpeggios. The plaintiveness and freshness of this charming melody in three flats are indescribably beautiful, and the choral réfrain piano is elegantly interpolated. The "Angelus," an evening prayer that follows, has some broad harmonies, but is scarcely applicable to the situation. The duo between Maritana and Don José, is a striking example of Mr. Wallace's skill in the combination of voices. The harmonized portion has a fine effect. The spirited finale of the first act comprises the arrest of Don Cæsar by the Alcade, for the duel with the Captain—Maritana and Lazarillo in vain imploring his release.

After an introductory movement, the curtain rises, and discovers as the first scene of the second act, the interior of the prison where Don Cæsar is confined, the grateful Lazarillo singing in plaintive tones the following melody in A three sharps :—

> " Alas! those chimes so sweetly pealing,
> Gently dulcet to the ear,
> Sound like Pity's voice, revealing
> To the dying, 'I dost hear!'
> Still he slumbers—how serenely!
> Not a sigh disturbs his rest.
> Oh! that angels now might waft him
> To the mansions of the blest!

Of the melancholy attributes of the Spanish ballad Mr. Wallace seems to be well aware; and in the lovely air he has allotted to Miss Poole, he has shown remarkable fertility of invention. The working of the violoncelli in the accompaniment is worthy of a Mendelssohn or Spohr, and the melody is in the true subordinate part. There is a spiritual seduction, a gossamer touch, in Mr. Wallace's mode of treatment in the above aria, the very soul of passion. And there was the quiet, unobtrusive Miss Poole making a conquest of Don Cæsar in this prolonged, breathing forth the mellowest tones, with such grace, simplicity, and elegance, that she "brought the house down" with the rapturous demand for a repetition. The next morceau is a trio, "Turn, Lady, Turn," between Maritana, Don Cæsar, and José, full and well put yet pass, provided Don Cæsar will his wish obey. Then the three unite in a réfrain of a Tarentella colouring, and a delightful picture the ensemble makes. After Don José has left the prison, and Don Cæsar has given his soldier, and not perish by the hangman, Don Cæsar sings a martial cavatina, in C major, "I like a soldier fell." The accompaniments recal Balfe's march in the "Bohemian Girl." The song contains some passages for acquirement, commonplace in the construction; but we can admit the necessity of writing "popularly" for a young beginner. The subsequent ballad, "In happy moments, day by day," in F flat, will be received as a charming, flowing melody, more in the opening night, graceful as is the motif, but four bars having been cut out of the middle portion, the melody is successfully reiterated and provokes an encore. This is one of Mr. Wallace's most felicitous acquisitions. He always has a short theme, which he repeats as much as, perhaps, a dozen times, and thus fixes it on the ear. The Pirates' Chorus, so popular in the "Enchantress," consists only of the bars, and with the burden, note for note, in the finale of the second act of Donizetti's "Favourite." H. Phillips now obtains a mighty encore in the ballad of "Happy Moments," the poetic words of which are by Mr. Bunn, however his name may be sneered at by Bentley writers who have all signally failed themselves. A drinking chorus, "Hanish gloom and sorrow," with a Strauss waltz, in the instrumentation, has been omitted since the first night, and the same may be done with the concerted piece, in which Don Cæsar leads Maritana to the altar, prior to his execution, whilst Lazarillo is drawing the quatres trous (four bullets) from the four muskets, that Spanish custom invariably assigns to the prisoner's friend, to be shot.

And now we are in the magnificent saloon of the Marquis Montefiori, and the gay company, with guitar and castanet, in bolero and zarabanda, sing and dance, despite of the roll of musketry, announcing the execution of Don Cæsar. Here we find Maritana has exchanged her picturesque gitana costume for the ill-suited toilette of the Countess de Bazan; and she is introduced to the King, who is passed off by Don José as the Count Bernard has at Lucrezia's ball, under the disguise, nicely executed by Mr. Hughes, the leader of the band. We wish the rondeling movement had not been introduced, for the opening melody is a gem in Mr. Bernard's hands, and the cabaletta is not worthy of it. Every point is of importance in the presence of the fair sex? Poor Miss Romer had to stand watching Harrall's eyes fixed on the galleries instead of being a los pies de usted señora. The quartet, "Ah, Confusion," when the Marshal is passed off as Don Cæsar as his Countess, might be left out, but the finale, albeit Rossinian in construction, and somewhat overscored, is full of fire, the introductory quartet being of surpassing beauty

The third act opens with a plaintive ballad, "Scenes that are brightest," the poetry by Mr. Bunn. The long accompaniment is very captivating, and the air is one of the nightly encores, Miss Romer singing it very artistically. The SCOTTISH WIDOWS' FUND AND LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, constituted by Act of Parliament. Head office, 3, St. Andrew-square, Edinburgh.

The Rev. C. ROSEBERY, K.T., President
The funds of the Society now accumulated and invested amount to £1,570,000 sterling.
The annual revenue is upwards of £200,000 sterling.
The original investigation into the affairs of this Society takes place on the 1st of January, 1846. The constitution of the Society is such that persons assuring on the 30th November next derive a greater benefit than those who delay doing so till the following year.
No better proof of the estimation in which the Society is held can be afforded than by stating the fact that, in the years alone, the amount of new insurances was no less than £6,894,681, being upwards of one million and a half, as to the advantages offered by the Society, the best and most practical evidence on this point is to be found in the 501 wise statement, from which will be seen the amount that would be payable six months after the death of a member insured for £1,000 in any one of the years 1814, 1820, 1826, and 1835, in the event of the death happening previous to the close of this year and after payment of the premium for the current year.

Year of Entry.	Benefit Assured.	Benefit with Bonus. Additions at 1st January, 1839.	Amount Payable if becoming a Claim in 1845, after Payment of the Premium for that Year.

The principles upon which the Society is founded are those of the strictest equity, and such as to secure members, as much as possible, from anxiety as to whether the sums to be paid under the policies will be at present or future periods, according as they happen to die before or after the period of investigation.

THE Publick is most respectfully informed that Messrs. NICOLL have received permission, according to the specification in the Act 6 and 7 Vict. cap. 65, to alter and otherwise adapt the coat, known as the REGISTERED PALETOT, to be suitable for winter wear; and, in addition to the same made of a thicker material—and, of middle season, it is waterproofed by the new method, which it is well known does not in necessarily confine the body by excessive pressure, or impede the free action of the limbs, but a garment that has not undergone this process, the effect being that it does not stop, and will turn a stout shower of rain, but the Coat of Winter Wear is made of a thicker material—and, of middle season, it is waterproofed by the new method, which it is well known does not in necessarily confine the body by excessive pressure, or impede the free action of the limbs, but a garment that has not undergone this process, the effect being that it does not stop, and will turn a stout shower of rain, but the Coat of Winter Wear is made of a thicker material—and, of middle season, for winter wear is a garment that is warm without being heavy, which, even for travelling, the [illegible] of carrying up in a carriage, and with which years have not much reduced, distance being so much shortened by present railway and other conveyances. Nicoll's Registered Paletot, which, for many years, has been worn by gentlemen in town and country, is decidedly the most agreeable garment for walking exercise; and from the skilful way it is formed, it does not impede the free action of shoulders, but has an equality for easy and graceful appearance when in cold weather, or in the evening over a morning or dress coat. Nicoll's PETER THREE GUINEAS, that the paletot is the most loose fitting. It may be observed that those principles are retained that have obtained for the Registered Paletot the approval of more than one of the crowned heads of Europe, the Prince Consort, Prince George of Cambridge, the chief members of the Court, and principal families of the Kingdom, who are the most distinguished for their taste and elegance in the exercise of dress. The Registered Paletot having, therefore, necessarily excluded anything vulgar or outre in appearance, would alone recommend itself to the notice of the public, independent of the medical advantages it has been proved to possess. Nicoll's Paletot is made in the most approved manner, and is not formed upon any fashion, but is the result of the taste and judgment of the most eminent of the principal tailors of the chief provincial cities, as well as the most distinguished of the metropolis, and is the production of the talent of those who stand at the head of their profession, and who, by their unrivalled skill, have established a character for the production of the most perfect garments

THE LORD BISHOP OF OXFORD.

On Monday last, Dr. Samuel Wilberforce, the new Bishop of Oxford, was elected with the usual formalities, by the Dean and Canons of Christchurch.

The Right Reverend Gentleman is the third son of the late eloquent and philanthropic William Wilberforce, by Barbara, his wife, eldest daughter of

THE LORD BISHOP OF OXFORD.—(DR. WILBERFORCE.)

Isaac Spooner, Esq., of Elmden Hall, Warwickshire; and grandson of Robert Wilberforce, of Hull, the descendant of a very ancient family in Yorkshire, that of Wilberfoss, of Wilberfoss: the branch from which the Bishop derives, has long been connected with the commercial interest of Hull.

Bishop Wilberforce was born in 1805, and married Emily, eldest surviving daughter of the Rev. John Sargent, of Wool Lavington, by Mary, his wife, daughter of Abel Smith, Esq.: he has issue.

Dr. Wilberforce has just been raised from the Deanery of Westminster to the Episcopal Bench as Bishop of Oxford in room of Dr. Bagot, who has been translated to the See of Bath and Wells, vacant by the death of Dr. Law.

The Bishop of Oxford, in addition to his high attainments in divinity, is a distinguished Archæologist. Of this he has given a very popular proof in his reduction, and almost entire abolition of the fees for viewing Westminster Abbey. At the meeting of the British Archæological Association, at Winchester, in September last, his Lordship read what Professor Whewell not inaptly called "a pious and dignified account" of the objects of the Association; and the impression of this masterly peroration will long be remembered by its hearers —

"After this spirit let us strive in all our researches into ancient times—after a spirit strong in the true strength of faith, with courage enough to look at all with whatever clearness of eye and power of judgment may be given to us; sure that in that old time we shall find the traces of a living spirit from which came all that was indeed great and noble; sure that we shall find, also, the small, and the straitened, and the unworthy, hard beside that old nobleness, yea, and grappling with it; sure that, then, as ever, for man there sit together a death and life casting their dice for him and his; and, therefore, not fearing to say to each thing that meets us, 'Art thou of death and corruption, or art thou of life and truth?' If thou art of death, then will I for me and mine eschew thee, and forbid thy entrance; and if thou art of life, then I will, by living, strive to have thee or that which represents thee, and which for me now may be what thou wast of old to those my fathers." Instances of the working of this will occur unsuggested to most of us; but, to take one, by way of example, from a subject more or less familiar to us all, let us seek a single instance of the difference between a careful search into antiquity, and a blind adoption of its relics from the building and adorning of our churches. In them we may love to study and protect from violence all the various and minute details of earlier times; we may discover, with a lively interest, the ancient hagioscope through which the ill-placed spectator took his post in a worship which consisted mainly in gazing upon the vicarious decorations of a priestly class: we may admire the interesting stalks which afford a ceremonial made up in great measure of pompous processions, and litanies wherein external significance was prized more highly than the secret sigh of the broken heart; for we may see and comprehend the lengthened chancels, with the marvellous beauty of their richly sculptured screens, which shut in the privileged performers of religion, and shut out the uninitiated laic—all this we may love to trace; first, as tending, by its visible beauty, by its mastery of outward form, to purify and elevate our own sense of beauty; and then, secondly, as reproducing vividly before us the days of old, with its wild mixture of true faith and grovelling superstition. But we need not, therefore, have the faintest wish to reproduce amongst ourselves a mere copy of the outward form we yet would fain preserve: we need not have the slightest participation in the dreamy unreality which would pretend that by restoring the external instruments through which that old spirit wrought, and which form the mingled record of the old struggle between the noble and the base, we could call into activity higher parts, or regain our fathers' truth, without the error with which it was intermingled, and without putting into peril all the truth we have, wherewith to struggle against our own infirmity.

"Here, then, we take our stand. Into that old Past we love to look, be cause in it was life; into it we dare to look, because that life is now in us—and that same gift we do believe we may pass to those beyond us. We, too, may and shall be ancients, and matter for history. Let us yield ourselves with what freedom we may to the working of the power within us, and our deeds will harmonize with those wrought by the same power, through the noble spirits who have been before us. Let us only use them as examples and incentives, and not feebly and blindly copy them as models. Let us visit the scenes of their departed greatness, not to array ourselves idly out in their worn out customs, but that, having ears to gather up the whispers of their oracular advices, we may, by our own skill in art, by boldness in execution, fashion for ourselves the outward circumstances we need."

DR. BUCKLAND, DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

By the elevation of Dr. Samuel Wilberforce to the Bishopric of Oxford, the Deanery of Westminster became vacant, and has been bestowed, by the Premier, on Dr. Buckland. Few names are more widely or better known in the literary and scientific world than that of this rev. gentleman. He is a geologist of the first eminence, and has paid more attention than most scientific men do to the practical application of it to useful purposes connected with mining, building, &c. We believe he had a considerable share in establishing the "Museum of Practical Geology," in this metropolis, an institution we have heard him strongly admire, at a meeting of the British Association. He was a contributor to the works known as the "Bridgwater Treatises." He is a good speaker, possessing a happy power of familiar illustration, and can render the dryest subject amusing by his mode of treating it. He is not of that pompous school, who talk of the "dignity of science," and think that plain language, though necessary for perspicuity, is something beneath it. Dr. Buckland is, indeed, at times exceedingly jocose in his style; he completely refutes the ill-natured sarcasm of Pope, that "dulness is sacred in a sound Divine."

THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.—(DR. BUCKLAND.)

In social life we should imagine the Dean must be a cheerful companion, and we believe he is a great favourite in a very extensive circle. He is a frequent visitor at Drayton, and doubtless owes his appointment to the favour of the Premier, who, be it said in passing, has done more for men of talent and their families than most ministers of late years. When the last Dean (Dr. Wilberforce), who succeeded Dr. Ireland, the friend of Gifford of the Quarterly, was appointed, Sir Robert Peel intimated a wish to him that some relaxation in the terms of the admission of the public to Westminster should be made, and it was to some extent complied with. We hope the present Dean will carry out the improvement thus begun. The last publication of Dr. Buckland was a letter in the Times, suggesting a mode of preserving for use the diseased potatoes.

GEOLOGICAL PHENOMENON.

There has lately been brought to light, at the stone quarry belonging to Mr. Rhodes, of Twintwistle, in Nottinghamshire, a series of impressions in a bed of millstone grit, which has excited great interest in the neighbourhood, and considerable discussion among the geologists of the district.

The first connected series of these singular marks consists of five in a direct line, following each other in the dip of the rock, which is about S S.W., and at an inclination of nine degrees to the horizon; the bed itself being about 20 feet perpendicular from the surface of the rock, which is two feet below the top of the soil. The three uppermost of these five impressions are each from 10 inches to nearly a foot in length, and about 4½ inches in breadth while the stratum, from the proximate end of one to that of the other, is 2 feet 9 inches. The length of the entire series is 11 feet. The two lower marks are of the same breadth as those above, but are much curtailed in length, though they are as much in vertical depth from the level surface of the bed as the others, which depth is about 4 inches.

Besides the above continuous marks, there are, three inches below them, and on one side, several other impressions, but of a less regular form, and lying crosswise still, they are, apparently, referable to the same cause as those first noticed. The chief interest is, however, attached to the configuration and relative position of the three uppermost impressions in the continuous series. They are similar to each other, except that the straighter side of the one is placed alternately with that of the other, as are also the sides of greater convexity. The uppermost end of each is depressed in the bed obliquely downward, for about four inches; while the lower end is scarcely sunk below the level surface of the bed, but has several convolutions of the rock in good relief, projecting down the dip of the rock before it; thus fostering the supposition that the rock was soft and pulpy when the impressions were made, and that the impressing body had sunk at one end deep into the sandy matrix; while the other extremity had pushed the soft and pulpy mass before it, and, in forming forcible drains surfaces of soft clay, or pulpy sand. The two lower but less elongated impressions seem to have been caused by the same body as were the three first; but, by one end of it being much more depressed than the other, similar to an impression of the heel, when the toe is raised.

The other irregular and cross impressions are nearly of the same breadth, but their longitudinal lines are much less defined. It may also be mentioned that the incumbent beds contain the castings of these beds in relief, showing that the impressions remained, for a time, uncovered to the atmosphere, or at least on a littoral exposure.

It would be premature to speculate on the nature of the body which caused these singular vestigia, before the bed in which they lie was covered up by so many feet of silicious rock; which, in chronological order, lies beneath the coal formation, and, in the order of depth, thousands of feet before any mammalia have been as yet discovered to have paced the earth. Nevertheless, we have considered it of sufficient interest for illustration in our columns, from a sketch furnished by an artist in the locality. The above details are abridged from a Nottinghamshire journal.

The Eclipse of the Moon.—The lunar eclipse on Thursday (last week) was not observable with advantage in the metropolis in consequence of the hazy weather. It was, however, distinctly visible in most parts of the country, and the provincial papers generally represent the night to have been remarkably fine for observing the phenomenon. The eclipse was seen on Friday with great distinctness in Paris. The moon was placed not far from Jupiter, in the part of the heavens where the most brilliant constellations are found, such as Taurus, Orion, and Castor and Pollux. A little after 10 o'clock the planet became as if covered with thick vapour; at 19 minutes past 11, the disk began to be covered, and the shadow of the earth continued to advance on it until within two minutes to one in the morning. Eleven twelfths of the moon were obscured, and the remaining slight segment gave forth a very uncertain light. By degrees, the earth's shadow passed on, and in the space of an hour there were successively seen the various phases of the crescent, the first quarter, and the full moon. At 27 minutes past two on Friday morning, the real eclipse had ceased, but the effect of the penumbra lasted until nearly three o'clock.

LORD J. RUSSELL'S MANIFESTO.

In the present uncertainty as to the opinions of public men, a declaration of a positive kind, even though it be confined to one subject, excites considerable interest. We last week remarked on the indifference felt by the people to mere abstract political questions, and the tendencies on the part of Political Leaders to make social and commercial subjects the pivots on which their controversies are to turn. The Manifesto just published by Lord John Russell is an additional proof of this tendency: the Corn Laws will be the great legislative controversy of next session, and the Leader of the Opposition has now given in his adherence to the principles of the League. His Letter to the Electors of London records a change in his opinions on the restrictions on the importation of food, beyond which he cannot go. He has, during twenty years, passed through every degree of conviction on the subject. His preference of a fixed duty to a varying one was announced long since: first, it was eight shillings a quarter; then, a lower amount; but now, he thinks the imposition of any fixed duty would be unadvisable, without a "provision for its extinction" within some limited period. As far as the importation of food is concerned, Lord John Russell is an unqualified Free Trader. As it has taken him twenty years to arrive at this conclusion, it has the advantage of being the fruit of most mature consideration; whether the bulk of his party will be prepared to follow him in the renunciation of old opinions is a question that time alone can settle. Lord John Russell is a bold man, and never hesitates to take a step in advance of his party if he sees the time has come for it. His Letter is another symptom that the doom of the Corn Laws is sealed.

Men of all parties have been gradually drawing away from supporting them, those who remained to advocate them in all their stringency rather hastened the catastrophe than averted it; feebly defended, and strongly attacked, with the pressure of a scarcity of food impending, the Premier will have more than usual difficulty to keep his ground on the unfirm footing of the "scale." The responsibilities of office are powerful agents in the modification of opinions on many question of policy. If Lord John Russell confesses that in the "course of twenty years" his "views have undergone great alteration," what might not be avowed by Sir Robert Peel? His changes have been far greater, and on subjects in which change is less admissible; in some things he has completely reversed the policy of the mass of his party; in many he has shown himself more in advance of public opinion than any other great party leader; even on commercial questions Sir Robert Peel has done more to relax the restrictive system than the chief of the Liberals attempted with any chance of success; and he will yet adapt himself to circumstances, and do much more.

The declaration, then, on the part of Lord John Russell, of this change in his opinion, or rather his arrival at the last of a long series of opinions, does not contrast so much or so unfavourably with the course of the Premier—equally open to conviction—as it at first appears to do. His censure of the apparent inaction of the Government, is, we presume, the precursor of a more elaborate condemnation to be pronounced hereafter, the weight of which will much depend on circumstances; but the avowal of his conversion to the doctrines of Free Trade now, rather leads to a wonder, "not that it comes, but came not long before."

There is little more in the actual state of things now, to exemplify the defects of the Corn Laws, than at many former periods "during the course of twenty years;" the crisis is not half so alarming as the scarcity of work and food in the first year of the present administration, when the manufacturing districts were for some time on the verge of revolt, and the presence of the military alone prevented actual outbreak. Employment is more abundant, and subsistence more within reach of the mass of the people than it was then; the population has been increasing in pretty much the same ratio for the last twenty years, always overtaking the means of supporting it; there have been bad harvests and failures of crops more than once during that time, and at those periods the working of the Corn Laws must have been the same as now. Every reason for condemning them was as visible throughout this long period as it is at the present hour; either Lord J. Russell had not given that attention to the subject a statesman ought to give, or the facts did not then make the impression on him they have since done. This very slow arrival at correct conclusions upon the evidence of facts always before us, is scarcely a quality to take much credit for, and indeed the avowal of the change is made in a tone of apology. We apprehend that a fear of the current of public opinion leaving them behind, often prompts those who are in the position of Leaders, to make, now and then, an extraordinary exertion to overtake, or place themselves in advance of it. To some such motive we ascribe the present Russell Manifesto; other impelling causes there may be, at one of which, at least, his lordship glances towards the conclusion of his address:—"The struggle to make bread scarce and dear, when it is clear that part, at least, of the additional price goes to increase rent, is a struggle deeply injurous to an aristocracy which (this quarrel once removed) is strong in property, strong in the construction of our Legislature, strong in opinion, strong in ancient associations, and the memory of immortal services."

This part of the argument has been stated more than once. There is something unworthy the richest aristocracy in the world being made parties in a dispute with their fellow-countrymen about the prices of food; the necessity of making it appear that high prices are a public benefit, leads them, through their advocates, into many contradictions. The seller and the buyer will never be of the same opinion as to the price; and the parties in this great dispute stand in these relative positions to each other. On one side, the Aristocracy of England, as the greatest, or, at least, the preponderating, owners of the soil, have a direct interest in high prices for the produce of it; on the other, the People, being the consumers, have an interest equally direct in getting it at the lowest rate. Compare the wealth of the English Aristocracy with the fortunes of the Nobility of France, Spain, and Germany, and it will be at once seen how unworthy of their high position is this protracted controversy. This is one view of the question which has not yet received all the consideration it deserves; but it has evidently had much influence on the mind of Lord John Russell.

For the rest, though we may infer from the Letter that his lordship has become a convert to the principles of total abolition, yet we see nothing in it to prevent him agreeing to a moderate fixed duty—the compromise in which the controversy will most probably terminate. To go at once from the high rate of duty that may be levied under the present scale, to an importation unrestricted by no duty whatever, would be too violent a revulsion. The change may be inevitable; but if we can make it gradual, and extend it over a series of years, it will only be doing justice to those who have embarked capital in the cultivation of the land under the present system. Another speculation which the Letter wholly destroys, is the rumoured coalition between the Government and the Opposition. Many thought some such junction possible, if not very probable; but so direct an attack on the past and present policy of the Premier—the stinging allusions to other questions on which he has first resisted all change, and then granted all that was asked for—show the impossibility of Peel and Russell ever standing side by side in one Ministry. However extensively the Conservative Leader may have borrowed the policy of the Whigs, however close some of the opinions of Lord John Russell may border on Conservatism, there are countless memories of the past that cannot be erased, and which must for ever set a "great gulf" between them.

JOWAHIR SINGH, THE LATE WUZEER OF LAHORE.

The papers by the last Indian Mail give the following interesting details of the assassination of Wuzeer Jowahir Singh, at Lahore. He was shot to death by the troops on the 21st of September. The troops had, it is said, gone out to the encampment ground of Meean Peer for the purpose of possible purposes of preventing any damage to the town during the scenes on which they seem to to have been determinedly bent. It has been stated that four chiefs had been detained by them and the non-fulfilment of the demands that had made, that the Ranee should bring out the Maharajah to them, accompanied, if she pleased, by Sirdar Jowahir Singh. Fukeer Noor ood Deen, one of them, had been allowed to return to the fort on the 20th, to communicate to the Ranee the firm determination of the troops to abide by their resolution. He seems to have succeeded in his negotiation, supported by the persuasions and assurances of Rajah Lal Singh, who declared that he had ample reliance on the troops; for, towards the evening of the 21st, the Royal party issued from the fort, the Ranee first, in a well protected palkee, and then the Maharaja, accompanied by his uncle (Sirdar Jowahir Singh) behind him, on the same elephant; the Wuzeer was unarmed, without even his sword or shield, and carried a small parasol. These were followed by sons of the Maharajah, on elephants. The troops had, in the meantime, become impatient at the protracted delay, and the procession had scarcely got clear of the gate, when they were told that some of the battalions were approaching, with the declared intention of at once storming the fort. The consequence was, that the Maharajah's cortège soon fell in with the first of them, which happened to be the Dhurab of Court Sahib. These immediately surrounded about, and conducted the Royal personages to their own particular encampment, close to the spot where the Maharajah's tents had been pitched, in anticipation of the visit. A salute, but not of the regulated number of guns, was then fired. On reaching the appointed spot, the Court troops broke off, and tumultuously surrounded the several elephants. The Ranee was made to enter one of the Dhurab's palkees, and the Maharajah's elephant was ordered to cause his charge to kneel down, and, as he seemed to hesitate, his movements were hastened by a shot in the side, which severely wounded, but did not kill him. The elephant knelt, a soldier seized the Maharajah, and carried him in his arms, either into the tent or to a little distance, when the elephant was immediately made to stand up again, and a volley of musketry was directed against Jowahir Singh. The first discharge not taking effect, the Wuzeer prayed they would spare him, and seized the opportunity of a momentary pause to assure the troops that he had, at that moment, one sack full of rupees and another of golden bracelets and armlets with him, ready for distribution amongst them. This communication had an effect the reverse of what the Sirdar seemed to expect, and, the firing having been forthwith renewed, the Wuzeer was soon put out of his misery. Two of his principal favourites, named Chatta Baia and Baba Rattan Singh, who were following well mounted, thought to escape by the speed of their horses, but were soon overtaken and shot down. With the death of these three persons the revenge of the bloodthirsty soldiery seems to have been satisfied for the time.

It is very confidently asserted that the Ranee would never have left the Palace on this unfortunate occasion had she not been assured by Rajah Lal Singh, in the most solemn manner, that he had eight battalions in his favour, and he seems to have succeeded in giving her this assurance that it is generally believed that had the Court troops not made short work of the matter he would have been able to protect the Wuzeer, and that the respective parties would have been engaged in a general battle. The death of the late Wuzeer, Sirdar Jowahir Singh, and the two fellow sufferers, were publicly burnt on the afternoon of the 22nd in the Badaone garden, which has been the scene of many of so many frightful tragedies, and of one on the present occasion still more frightful, if possible. Three, or, according to another account of the lingering agony, four women were burnt with the bodies, and most shocking to relate, such was the disgraceful rapacity of the villanous mob surrounding the funeral pyres, that not only the more valuable ornaments of the unfortunate women, but their very clothes, were torn from off their bodies before they stepped into the fire. A number of the slaves of the Ranee, Dewan Deena Nath, Bukhshee Buggut Ram, and the Attareewallah and Kaleewah Sirdars, with a large number of people, attended the funeral on elephants. Rajah Gholab Singh was smartly expected in Lahore; and it was expected that either he or his nephew Jowahir Singh, younger brother of the late Sirdar Heera Singh, would be elevated to the post of Wuzeer.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The balls and concerts may this year calculate upon a brilliancy which for several past seasons they could not boast. A splendid aid has been found in the arrival of the celebrated Countess de ——. It is her intention to remain here for some months, and no doubt fêtes and every description of pleasure and fashion will take place at her splendid hotel in the Rue de la Pépiniere. Who has not heard of the Countess de ——, niece of that Pahlen who performed so notorious a part in the tragedy entitled "The Death of Paul the First?" Brought up in the midst of luxury—endowed with dazzling charms, the Countess enjoyed upon her entrance into society an immense fortune. One day while walking in Naples, she saw a child playing: she determined at any cost to possess it:—the bargain was soon concluded with the parents—the caprice of the wealthy Countess became in time a positive affection. The "child of Naples" was richly dowered, and united to Comte d'Arapery, aide-de-camp to the Archduke Reinier—she now enjoys almost Queenly honours in her domains in Hungary. The Countess has a passion for dowering young girls. Desiring to realize the prodigies of the Winter Palace of the Emperor of Russia, she has had erected in a few months the most magnificent hotel that can be imagined it will be inaugurated by a grand concert. This hotel and her roubles are with her heart and hand to be placed at the disposal of a monger—an Englishman of the name of Perry and the union is to take place, if the consent of the Emperor can be obtained. Perry is a barytone, and was vocalizing with some success at Lecco, a small Italian town. The Countess heard, and loved—the moment of love virtuously that a marriage was proposed. This is a triumph for barytones in general, and for Perry in particular; for hitherto the tenors have beat all other voices hollow. Without, however, the consent of the Emperor of Russia, the immense fortune of the Countess would be instantly confiscated. Feeling that she might ultimately be suspended on the horns of a dilemma, she has little by little placed funds in banks which she knew well at all events secure to her 150,000 francs per annum. The marriage will be solemnized here.

There is, assuredly, not a grave city of Europe, where the impostors are so ingenious, or the dupes more signally stupid, than in Paris. Every week produces a new prophet—or there is an occult astrologer, who is all the rage—or some ignorant charlatan is the successful! Only last week, a system was unmasked, and a mass of folly exposed, that, one would think, was impossible in this much boasted enlightened age. The case I allude to is one of witchcraft—witchcraft in the nineteenth century!

It appeared that the widow Obert, kept a small cake shop. She owns to the age of fifty five, but has, beyond doubt, reached the respectable age of seventy, and her appearance is as odd as the charges made and proved against her. She is exceedingly short; her skin has the rigidity and the yellow tint of an old parchment deed; a bright, piercing, youthful eye, and a spiteful smile in both hands is all that is left of what must have been handsome at seventeen. Altogether, she is a most fantastic figure. She was clothed in rusty black stuff, from head to feet. The first witness against her was an ancient crone of seventy, with a nose like the beak of a hawk, and eyebrows that formed a circumdex accent. She looked like one of the three weird sisters in Macbeth. When questioned whether she knew the widow Obert, she replied, "Yes, more to my misfortune! I've known her these eight years. She told me she was a sworn sister of a secret society, which held its meetings in the subterranean passages of the Palais Royal; that she controlled the police department, and that I should receive for my portion sixty thousand francs. I was required to pay three hundred francs to become a sister, which I gave accordingly to the widow."

"But what was the end of this society?"—Here the witness was much embarrassed, and, after some little hesitation, mumbled out, "To save the souls of the damned!" When I asked for an explanation of the vow said, she dared not reveal the secret of the society, but, when I pressed her, she told me all. That the King, Louis Philippe, was the President, and that Princes, Dukes, and Barons were members. In the hall of meeting there was a grand brass saucepan, in which the guilty bodies were cast and boiled, and that when the demons came to seize the souls of the dead, Jupiter (this was the soubriquet of the widow) fought with them. The widow gave me a bouquet of flowers, which was to serve me as a sign to be known by when the society was broke up." The next witness and dupe was a shoemaker, of about thirty years of age, with an expression of countenance very much like a demon's sleep. It appeared that the son of the widow was his apprentice, and had told him she was a member of the Arcanic Society. He had given her 250 francs to join the first fifty, and afterwards a note of two hundred francs. She told him the object was to save souls, and that she was the president, under the name of Jupiter. He had received several letters from the secretary, which the old woman kept in the King's letter-box, and they were stamped with the words "Maison du Roi." She did this to make him believe that the King was a member. She had cost him, besides his ready cash, upwards of two hundred dinners, a dozen promenades to the Barrs, and twelve boxes of plums, not reckoning the cakes, &c. She made him subscribe all these things as "Tokens given to Jupiter," and furthermore she assured him, at the breaking up of the society, that he should receive as his share of the interest, at least sixty thousand francs. Other dupes had paid similar sums as entrance money. Our amiable boiler of condemned souls was sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

FRANCE.

The French papers again contain unsatisfactory accounts from Algeria.

The Albatros, which arrived at Toulon on the 17th, from Algiers, has brought the confirmation of the fact of the tribes of the circle of Orleansville being in full insurrection. It was said at Algiers that the revolt had spread in the Dahra. A letter from Setif announces that the revolt is extending in the province of Constantina.

The alarm in the province of France on account of the apprehended dearth from the exportation of corn to England, appears to be on the increase. At Cherbourg, St. Malo, Dunan, and other places, serious riots have already taken place, and in other places the excitement is so great that apprehensions are entertained of an outbreak.

Matters have been much better on 'Change this week. The panic had at length been checked. Confidence appeared returning. The Paris and Strasbourg line was adjudged by the Minister of Commerce to the united companies represented by General Cubieres on a lease of 43 years and 208 days. The Tours and Nantes line was equally adjudged to the company represented by Count de la Pinsonniere, Messrs. Mackenzie, O'Neill, and Co., on a lease of 34 years and 15 days. For the Paris and Strasbourg line there was no competition. For the Tours and Nantes line there were two bidders, namely, the Company represented by Messrs. la Pinsonniere, and the Company of Postmasters, represented by M. Dailly. The biddings were to lease the line for a number of years below the minimum (35 years), fixed by the Minister. Mr. Mackenzie proposed taking the line at a reduction of 350 days. M. Dailly proposed taking it at the maximum. M. la Pinsonniere was consequently declared the successful bidder.

The National, and, indeed, the whole of the Paris journals, with the exception of the Débats, express their belief and their hope that President Polk will plunge the United States into a war with England. Considerable apprehension on this subject prevailed on the Bourse.

The Constitutionnel says.—"It appears that the projected marriage of the Grand Duchess Olga, with the Archduke Stephen is again abandoned. Religion is not the only obstacle, for questions of politics have also intervened. It has been shown by the London journals that this union is not seen in a favorable light in England. Observations are said to have been also made at Berlin, and, in spite of his wishes to bring this great affair to a conclusion, Prince Metternich is at last convinced that it will be attended with more inconveniences than advantages.

SPAIN

Our letters from Madrid, of the 19th, state that a grand levee was held by the Queen on that day, on the occasion of her feast. At a recent concert given at the Palace her Majesty sang the final arrette of "Norma" with much facility and a pleasing voice, and the Queen Mother a duo of "William Tell" with a performer of the Royal chapel. Letters from Cadiz and Seville announce that a considerable quantity of wheat was being exported to England from Andalusia. It was the general opinion in Madrid that no definitive arrangement of the public debt of Spain would take place before five or six months.

The Gazette of Madrid contains a Royal decree, elevating General Narvaez to the dignity of grandee of Spain of the first class, with the title of Duke of Valencia, for himself and his successors.

PORTUGAL.

We have Lisbon intelligence of the 19th instant. The disorganisation of society continues, and insurrection is showing itself in the ingenuity of atrocious crimes, and in acts of violence and illegality inflicted on persons who had exercised their privilege as voters at the late elections in opposition to the views of the Government. The prosecutions of the press were going on vigorously; two in one week against one editor, and three others hanging over him. Commerce and agriculture continued in a very depressed state, the Custom-House returns of October being less by sixty contos than those of the same month last year. A slight earthquake was felt at Oporto on the 3rd instant.

NEW ZEALAND.—REPULSE OF THE BRITISH TROOPS.

In our late impression of last week, we gave a portion of the following important news from New Zealand, to the 12th of July. Our accounts state that a third conflict had taken place between the English and some friendly natives, and the indomitable Heki's party. A body of about 800 men, composed of regulars of the 58th and 99th Regiments, and some militia volunteers, with a 6-pounder on board her Majesty's ship Hazard, under Lieut. Philpotts, who had distinguished himself so much in the former encounter—were sent forward, with some lumbering artillery, to storm the pah of Heki, a strongly-entrenched fortress, with a double stockade, and as the fact that a six pounder could not get through the sides of the stockade. Of the artillery sent with him a clear idea is given in Col. Despard's despatch, by the narrative of the fact that they frequently upset from their own fault

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

OPENING OF THE MACCLESFIELD RAILWAY.—Monday was a grand day for this town and neighbourhood, and there were the rejoicings on the occasion of opening the Railway to the Manchester and Birmingham Railway at Cheadle Hulme, Cheshire. At eleven o'clock in the morning a special train of carriages left the Macclesfield station amidst great cheering, the hills and approaches to the line being completely crowded with people, and arrived at Manchester in thirty-seven minutes, the distance being seventeen miles. At Manchester they were met by the Directors of the Manchester and Birmingham Railway, and a numerous party of gentlemen, and, at a quarter past two they returned to Macclesfield. The train and visitors were saluted with loud cheers upon their arrival at the station.

BRIGHTON AND CHELTENHAM.—On Tuesday a meeting of the shareholders in this Company was held, for the purpose of considering the propriety of breaking up of the Company, and circumstances connected therewith. The report of the sub committee appointed to consider the position of the Company, stated that the amount of paid-up deposits was £19,377 10s.; the liabilities were £6300. Assuming all the directors and provisional committee to have paid their ratio of loss upon seventy five shares, such ratio would be 10s. per share. Sir William White, a member of the Stock Exchange, said that he had sold 400 shares to the brokers of the Company, and they now refused to deliver him scrip for the shares so sold. Another shareholder said he knew of 700 shares being sold to the broker of the Company, yet it was now denied by the company that they had anything to do with the purchase of shares. Mr. Harrison proposed the appointment of a committee to take such steps as might be deemed desirable, with the view of getting information in reference to the subject for which the meeting had been convened. The resolution was then put and carried, and seven gentlemen appointed to form the committee.

NORTHERN AND EASTERN COUNTIES.—A meeting of the proprietors of this Company took place on Wednesday. Mr. Kennard presided, and stated that they had several meetings with the directors of the Eastern Counties line, and the result was that they had altered the terms proposed at the last meeting, and they now offered to the Northern and Eastern proprietors two new shares of £20 each in the new capital of £4,500,000, which was to be raised by the Eastern Counties, for each share of £50 of the Northern and Eastern capital; and that those proprietors of the latter Company who would not agree to these terms, shall have 6 per cent. guaranteed to them on their present stock, besides being entitled to a rateable division in the surplus net profits for an additional dividend, and that in the event of the Act of Parliament for an extension to York not being obtained, the deposits on the New Extension Shares would be returned without deduction, but without interest. These terms were agreed to

NEW LINES FOR ENGLAND AND WALES.—From an elaborate compilation of the new lines for England and Wales, 630 in number, contained in Bradshaw's Railway Gazette, we transfer the following summary :—

The entire number of bills from England and Wales for the next session is	630
The number of bills from established companies for branches, extensions, leasings, amalgamations, &c., is	238
The new projects, the capital for which has been ascertained, amount to	282
The new projects, the capital for which has not been ascertained, amounts to	92
Making the grand total of	630
The capital ascertained to be sought by the new projects amounts to	£238,009,000
The deposits sought in the first instance by the above amount to	22,365,140
The deposits, which must be 10 per cent. on the entire capital, have yet to be increased to	25,800,900
Making (in addition to the preliminary expenses) a further call of deposits necessary to the extent of	3,435,760

NEW RAILWAYS.

Very few New Railways have lately been announced. The principal are the following :—

THE EXETER GREAT WESTERN.—The Directors of the Great Western Company have announced a new line, to be called "The Exeter Great Western Railway," being a line between Yeovil and Exeter, and between Bridport and Exeter, with branches to Sidmouth and Chard. The object of the line proposed undertaking is to unite the city of Exeter with the towns of Yeovil and Bridport, as forming part of the great integral scheme for making the best direct Railway communication from the Metropolis through Exeter to the important seaports and harbours in the British Channel, as well as completing the chain of south coast communication from the ports of Dover, Portsmouth, Southampton, and Falmouth, and Bristol, Plymouth, and Exeter.

EXETER, TAVISTOCK, AND BODMIN.—The preliminary announcement states that, amongst the numerous projects recently brought forward for connecting important towns and districts in England by means of railways, no direct line of communication from Exeter to Tavistock, and thence to Bodmin, has attracted the attention of the public. The proposed line is to commence by the city of Exeter, proceeding by the west of Newton Bushel, and throwing out a branch to Ashburton in its course southward for the town of Dartmoor. It will then pursue a direct line to Tavistock; and, passing by or near Callington and Liskeard, will terminate at Bodmin. Capital £1,400,000, in 50 000 shares.

ST. IVES.—Only a preliminary notice has yet been given. Capital £100,000, in £20 shares. This line is fifteen miles long and four broad. It has high mountains in the middle, whence rivulets flow, which are of great use to the inhabitants. Between the mountains are dreadful rocks, horrid precipices, and thick woods; and in the south-west parts, the most delightful springs at the foot of them. The engineer's report upon the scheme is likely to prove a curious document.

EDINBURGH AND NORTH-EASTERN, AND (DIRECT) GLASGOW JUNCTION.—The full details of this line are now before the public. Capital £15,000, in £50 shares. Mr. Millar, of Edinburgh, is the engineer-in-chief; and Mr. Green, the acting engineer.

LIABILITY OF RAILWAY SHARE APPLICANTS.—The present gloomy state of the Railway Market, and the suspicion and distrust which, from recent exposures, justly attend even the most respectably supported of the railway projects, are in themselves a sufficient excuse for applicants refusing to pay the deposits on allotments in the new projects applied for under a different state of things, and, at the time of applications, a bond fide intention of taking up the shares. But it appears that some of the companies are resolved to try a new scheme in order to obtain the money of applicants; and, as specimens of this scheme, we subjoin the following circular, which, we think, does not require a single word of comment :—"Direct London, Portsmouth, and Chichester, and Direct Portsmouth and Chatham Railway Company, 14a, Adelphi-terrace, Strand, Sir, Your application for shares in the above Company having been submitted to the Committee, they allottat to you the number mentioned in the allotment in the letter of allotment, dated the 11th inst., which I forwarded to you, and it now appearing from the bankers' returns that you have paid the deposit required of you thereon, I am directed to inform you that you are held responsible for the amount of deposits not yet called for, and to request you, on or before the 28th inst ; to pay the same into one of the bankers of the Company. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, J. C. Sommers, Secretary."

RETURN OF RAILWAY DEPOSITS.—The subject of the return of Railway deposits begins to excite considerable attention. The Chronicle says—"The provisional directors must either go forward to Parliament, and apply for authority to construct their works next session, or repay the deposits. We shall not readily believe that the promoters of bond fide schemes will hesitate to adopt one or other of these courses. It may be true that no specific time is named for obtaining authority to construct the works, but it is hardly believed that it would be applied for in the next session; and if this be not done, there seems to be a change of circumstances so grave and important as to render it advisable to re consider what has been done, and whether to renew the contracts, or to dissolve them. If, in place of following this course, provisional committees should think fit to keep things secret, and to hold their subscribers at defiance—should refuse either to repay the deposits, or to go forward to Parliament, we doubt whether they will find themselves benefited in the end, for the inevitable consequences of such proceedings will be to involve the whole in ruinous litigation."

THAMES VALLEY RAILWAY.—We hear that the Committee have come to the resolution of returning the deposits in full to the shareholders, and that the engineer and solicitor have resolved to make no charge for their services. It is said that the members of the Committee will each put down £10 to pay the other expenses, which it is expected will clear them off. If this be true, it is highly creditable to all concerned.

MR. HUDSON AND THE GAUGES.—The Broad and Narrow Gauge Commission examined Mr. Hudson on Saturday. Mr. Hudson is a strenuous advocate of the narrow gauge, on the plea of economy, and he affirms that it possesses all the capabilities, as regards safety and speed, of the broad gauge METROPOLITAN TERMINI.—The Fleet Prison or Farringdon Market having been selected as the most complete terminal extension of the lines north and west of the Metropolis, it now becomes a question of selection of a point which will form a cardinal complement for the eastern and south-eastern, leaving also the southern and western lines. Among the notices appearing in the London Gazette, is that of the West-end and Southern Counties. The site selected for a terminus appears to be Leicester Place, Leicester Square, and the unoccupied open area and wharf frontage extending to the Savoy. The crossing of Waterloo bridge by railway, though apparently holding out so great a facility, has nevertheless been accompanied with considerable difficulty. [illegible] bridge to [illegible] and [illegible] bridge [illegible] no means [illegible] the [illegible] Thames for railway purposes without involving the construction of a competing bridge for carriage traffic, since Hungerford, on the suspension principle, can only be rendered available as an approach for foot passengers.

SCOTCH RAILWAYS.

EDINBURGH AND NORTHERN.—Operations have been commenced at several places along the line, between Dundee and Burntisland. A great influx of labourers is expected to take place immediately, and an additional force to be appointed.

ABERDEEN.—Messrs. Macdonald and Leslie have been the successful contractors for the bridge across the Dee at Polmuir, for the sum of £9,327 10s. and for the great viaduct entering the city. They commence operations immediately.

IRISH RAILWAYS.

BELFAST AND INNISBILLEN COMPANY.—The promoters of this project have abandoned it for the present, in consequence of the nonpayment of the deposits. The promoters have acted very honourably in returning the full amount of the deposit money received.

DUBLIN AND BELFAST JUNCTION.—NAVAN BRANCH.—Peter Eckersley, and R. D. Kane, Esqrs., assisted by Mr. Bunting, resident engineer, commenced, on Monday week, an inspection of the Navan Branch of the Dublin and Belfast Junction Railway, for the purpose of making arrangements with the proprietors and occupiers for the purchase of the land required for the line. They were received in the most cordial spirit by the proprietors and occupiers, and succeeded in effecting amicable arrangements with several of them.—Irish Railway Gazette.

WATERFORD AND KILKENNY RAILWAY.—This line is to be commenced immediately, and the contract for the first six miles—from Kilkenny to Bennett's-bridge—has been given to Mr. Joseph Wright, of Rose Inn street, whose tender was considerably lower than that of any other person seeking for the contract.

FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

RAILWAY ROUND PARIS.—This line, projected with the object of uniting all the other Railways to Paris, now occupies much attention. The following are some particulars of the plan :—It proceeds westward from the Rouen Railway with the line to the Belgian frontier and to Orleans. The length of this section is 15,395 metres, and the estimated expense for the two lines of rails 5,850,000 francs, or 213,000 francs per kilometre. The line then unites the Orleans railway with that of Versailles (left bank), the length being 6221 metres, and the estimated expense 3,390,000 francs, or 630,000 francs per kilometre. In order to pass the western hill of La Bièvre, a gradient of one centimetre per metre in a distance of 1370 metres will be necessary. The works of art are composed of a tunnel of 770 metres under the hill of Jury; of two viaducts, one upon the Bièvre, and the other over a common road; of two bridges upon the routes royale, No 7 and No. 20; of a viaduct upon the road Des Ecrufs; of seven passages level with the Railway, and other works of minor importance. The portion composed between the two Versailles lines, which completes this "belt" Railway, will cross the Seine at the Pont-du-Jour at Auteuil, making use of a portion of the Bois de Boulogne. No serious opposition has been made to this line in the enquête opened concerning it.

PROJECTED RAILWAY IN PARIS.—Plans for an interior Paris Railway have been proposed. According to the project deposited at the Hôtel de Ville, the Rouen Railway would be united with the terminus of the Northern line by a Railway which would follow the exterior boulevard, then from the terminus would descend to the Marché des Innocens, by a curve, and thence towards the Porte St. Martin, when there would be a branch to the Place de la Bastille, and the head of the Lyons line. Amongst the suggested improvements of this place is one which consists in carrying the line along the Canal St. Martin upon a viaduct of brickwork or masonry. This line would cross the Seine on the outside of the Octroi Wall, so as to attain the magazines of Bercy, and employ one of the bridges situate upon the Seine.

BELGIAN AND CONTINENTAL DIRECT.—This line is about eighty miles in length, from Termonde, in the Scheldt, to the frontier of France. Capital £1,200,000, in £20 shares. No further details have yet been given.

DIEPPE TO ABBEVILLE.—The surveys of this line and Eu are nearly terminated. The locality of the terminus of St. Valery is decided on ; it is to be placed at the extremity of the Anay, in the centre of the town. On quitting St. Valery the line proceeds to Eu, almost in a direct line, without any other difficulty of ground, but one tunnel under La Motte-Croix-au Bailly. The whole line has been already roughly staked out.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE RECENT AFFRAY AT HOUNSLOW BARRACKS.—The following official notice has been issued from the Horse Guards, relative to the affray which took place in September last, at Hounslow Barracks, of which we gave an account at the time :—"The Commander in Chief having considered it his duty to order a court of inquiry to assemble, in order that the whole of the transactions which occurred in the 4th Dragoons, on the 28th September last, during the affray, a report of the Court may be published in the General Orders of the army. He entreats the commanding officers of regiments to draw the attention of the officers under their command, respectively, to the evil consequences resulting from the practice of gymnastic exercises after the mess dinner. The mess dinner of the officers of a regiment cannot be deemed a private convivial meeting, considering the interest which has been manifested by the superior authorities in promoting its comfort and respectability ; and considering that it is not unusually attended by others and by private gentlemen of character, and respectable on account of their rank and position in society, whatever may be their age, it is desirable that conduct or practices should be avoided in which men of that description cannot take part, and that nothing should pass which is otherwise than usual in the society of persons of that description ; and, indeed, that at all times and under all circumstances, boxing, single stick, wrestling, and boxing, by officers, and such practices of youths in colleges and schools, by men of men entrusted with the command of soldiers by commission of their Sovereign, should be prevented, excepting strictly in private ; and that no officer or gentleman should ever think of striking or challenging another. The Commander-in-Chief has been informed that the practice of smoking, by the use of pipes, cigars, or cheroots, has now become prevalent among the officers of the army, which is not only in itself a species of intoxication, occasioned by the fumes of tobacco, but undoubtedly occasions drinking and tippling by those who acquire the habit, and he intreats officers commanding regiments to prevent smoking in the mess room, or any other society assembled in the adjoining apartments, and to discourage the practice among the officers of junior rank in their regiments. Lieutenant Kirwan is released from his arrest, and to return to the regiment, the Queen's Bays, on the application of his brother, Wellington, Commander in-Chief.—JOHN MACDONALD, Adjutant-General.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.—We can state as a fact that a naval officer, high in command, has been privately engaged in taking measurements of the large steamers under mail contract service with her Majesty's Government, and with orders to report immediately to the Admiralty on their capabilities for carrying guns of the largest calibre. The large steamers forming the fleet of the West India Royal Mail Company, of the City of Peninsular and Oriental Company, together with the Great Britain and Great Western, are said to have been particularly officially inspected. A naval officer, well acquainted with the coast of America, has been summoned to London, to give information to the Admiralty. Such a combined force as these numerous and powerful steamers afford, independent of the regular steamers of war, would be one of the strongest ever sent to sea. The fleet of West India Company's ships alone are twelve in number, and of about 1,200 tons burden each.—Liverpool Times.

THE SENTENCE OF THE COURT-MARTIAL AT PORTSMOUTH ON LIEUT. DUNBAR, R.M.—The sentence of the military court-martial held on Second Lieut. G. T. Dunbar, of the Royal Marine corps, has been approved of by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and has been read before the members of the court, Colonel Jones, the commandant, and the officers of the 80th Regiment, who were specially assembled in the mess-room. "The prisoner, Mr. G. T. Dunbar, was tried for having been drunk, and guilty of conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and gentleman, on the 25th of November last, and sentenced to be severely reprimanded for being drunk is proved; but the Court acquit Mr. Dunbar of the part charging him with conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and gentleman. The Court however admonish Mr. Dunbar to be more careful in the use of spirituous liquors as a medicine in future." Mr. Dunbar has returned to his duty.

THE FETTERS ON BOARD THE "MISSOURI."—The following explanation of the affair of the fetters found in the wreck of the United States steam-frigate Missouri, in the Bay of Gibraltar, is given by the New York Courier :—"Vessels of war, upon leaving port, no matter under what circumstances or upon what errand, always go prepared for a state of war. They are always provided with the weapons for an actual conflict, and with all the implements which such a conflict, and the result, may demand. A vessel, moreover, on going forth with the prospect or possibility of an engagement, always goes upon a warlike footing. She expects to win the battle, and she therefore always goes prepared to secure the prisoners she expects to take. This is a regulation which, we feel safe in saying, prevails in every navy in the world. It has always obtained in the British navy, and their books of allowance, as well as ours, designate the provisions in this respect made for each class of their vessels. In the American service the complement of irons on a ship of the line, is 200 hand manacles and handcuffs, and 100 fetters, or leg-irons; the complement for a steam frigate of the class of the Missouri, which carries 8 guns and 2 swivels, mounted, and was pierced for 54, is 150 fetters and 300 handcuffs. The fact that the complement for a frigate is greater than the complement for a ship of the line, notwithstanding its size, number of men, &c., are less, shows clearly that the irons are intended, not mainly to be used upon the crew in case of mutiny, but for prisoners taken in battle, as it is supposed a steam frigate like the Missouri will take more than a ship of the line. The Missouri was provided with her complement of irons, as indeed with the other arms and munitions of war; and these are the irons that have been taken from the wreck."

MEMORIAL OF DR. WATTS.

On Tuesday, a most interesting ceremony took place at Abney Chapel, namely, the inauguration of a fine Statue of Dr. Watts, known as the "Hymns," erected by subscription in Abney-park. Alderman Kelly was in the chair; and amongst a very numerous assemblage were Mr. T. Rankey, the banker; the Rev. Dr. Morrison, the Rev. Dr. Phillips, of Maberly Chapel; the Rev. Mr. Aveling, M.A., of Kingsland-road; the Rev. Thomas Binney, of the Weigh-house Chapel; the Rev. Mr. Dunker, and other ministers well known in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, besides several of the students connected with the College at Highbury.

The proceedings of the day were opened with a hymn, after which Alderman Kelly, Mr. Rankey, and the Rev. Dr. Morrison addressed the meeting. The ceremonies having terminated, the numerous party passed into the centre of the ground to view the statue, which stands about the centre of the grounds. It consists of a full length figure of Dr. Watts in his ecclesiastical costume, standing on a pedestal of Portland stone. (The above Statue was engraved in No. 177 of our Journal.) On the side facing Abney Chapel is the following inscription :—

"In memory of
ISAAC WATTS, D.D.
In testimony of the high and lasting esteem in which his Character and Writings were held
In the great Christian community by whom the English language is spoken.
Of his Psalms and Hymns, it may be predicted, in his own words—
'Ages unborn will make his sons
To joy and labour of their tongues.'
He was born at Southampton, July 17th, 1674,
And died November 25th, 1748.
After a residence of 36 years in the mansion of Sir Thomas Abney, Bart., then standing on these grounds.
Erected by public subscription.
E. W. BAILY, R.A."

During the proceedings a liberal collection was made.

GALLANT DEFEAT OF MALAY PIRATES ON THE COAST OF BORNEO.

We have received from a Correspondent at Hong-Kong a very interesting account of an expedition of her Majesty's fleet against some Malay pirates, on the coast of the island of Borneo, on the 10th and 19th of August last. We subjoin a narrative of the affair from our Correspondent, who is an officer on board the fleet.

(From our own Correspondent.)

I have much pleasure in enclosing you a sketch of a battle that was fought on the 19th August, 1845, up the Malados river, between the boats of her Majesty's ships Agincourt, Vestal, Daedalus, Wolverine, Cruiser, and Vixen, in all twenty boats, and near 500 men belonging to the squadron, under the command of Captain T. Cochrane, Rear-Admiral, and Commander in Chief, and the fort of Schriff Osman, a well-known daring Arab pirate, whose terrible piracies have paralysed the commerce of the seas round the northern portion of Borneo.

The pirates were commanded by 10 Arabs, who had 100 men each, under their respective commands, the whole under the immediate direction of Osman, who was plainly seen controlling, with consummate coolness and courage, the line of his batteries—four 18-pounders, two 12-pounders, three 9-pounders, two 6 pounders—all long iron guns, bore upon the boats lying at the boom—besides twenty-two brass guns, that fortified other portions of his defences, but did not bear upon the boats. His flags were also away, but were immediately re-hoisted. The boom was admirably secured, and foiled all efforts for fifty minutes, during which both sides were firing. As soon as the boats managed to get past the booms, only two guns more were fired, and firing ceased on both sides

The great loss the enemy had suffered—their leaders, five of whom were dead or desperately wounded, and the remainder having fled—convinced them that victory was hopeless, and deserted in all directions. A few of the more daring, in bringing off the last of their wounded and dead, were shot down by the boat marines and seamen. Spoils of every description were found; and, in one hour, the village and forts for a mile up were wrapt in flames. Thirty prows were burnt, and two very fine ones on the stocks, two magazines of powder, and houses filled with camphine wax and English manufactured goods, French prints, and splendid timber were found and fired in every direction. Several slaves effected their escape. They had ordered all which the enemy could into the river as fast as they fell, or carry them away to the jungle, the illaloon pirates considering it a great disgrace to leave their bodies in the hands of an enemy

On the 20th of August, 1845, Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane, with his flag hoisted on board H. M. steam vessel Vixen, proceeded up the River Horneo, on a ceremonious visit to the Sultan of Brunei, with the Hon. E. I. Affleck's steam vessels Nimrod and Phlegethon. On his Excellency's arrival it was made known to him that a rebel chief, by name Pangeran Usop, had fortified his house, and, by a continued system of annoyance, contrived to keep out of the power of the Sultan, who was then in command. Indeed, the very Sultan himself in fear for his authority. On Sunday, 10th of August, a meeting having taken place between the Sultan and Usop, it was judged necessary by the Rajah Muda Hassim, and the Rajah Mudah Saloh, that the Sultan's own vessels should proceed to the assistance on the part of Usop; and, the two smaller steamers having been so stationed as to take the enemy quarters in flank, fire was opened first by the Vixen with a view to the introduction of the flag of truce, at the distance of 50 pound shot through the roof of the principal house, and then continued without cessation for fifty minutes. The first shot was returned instantly by the rebels, with six or eight guns, which the report made, must have been of considerable calibre—the shot passing over the Vixen steam vessel, and falling harmlessly into the buildings on the opposite side of the river, which had been long since deserted by the panic-stricken inhabitants.

When the firing had ceased, a boat from the Vixen was sent, by the Commander in-Chief's directions, to take possession of Pangeran Usop's house—the marines and small arm men of the squadron having been previously landed for the purpose of intercepting any fugitives. Possession was taken of the house and adjoining buildings, and twenty one pieces of cannon were seized upon the occasion, which latter were immediately delivered to the Sultan, who declined receiving them, stating they were legally the spoils of the British. Several articles of European and even English manufacture were observed in this man's house, which would have given ample testimony of the nature of his avocations had such been required.

On the 11th the vessels proceeded down the river, and, having cut wood as fuel for the steamers, the fleet proceeded for the Bay of Malada, on the north-west coast of Borneo, where, it was understood, a noted pirate, Sheriff Housman, had taken his abode. This man, a half-bred Arab, had succeeded in outwitting, over the poorer classes, an immense influence, having employed a large capital in the most nefarious manner by investing it in boats, arms, ammunition, &c., for the purpose of the less powerful and influential tribes carrying on their only trade—diabolical piracy.

On the 19th of August, the boats of the squadron, under the command of Captain Talbot of the Vestal, proceeded up the river, and, on arriving at the town, found that the enemy had taken possession, and fortified a strong stone house being placed across the river, and secured by a chain cable (European, being wound round it, and secured to two trees at the water's edge on each side of the river), and a boom. On this occasion, the guns from a twelve gun battery being laid for this boom, or spar, the destruction caused by the enemy's fire was immense. The thwarts of the boats crowded with Marines, presented a full mark for the pirates' fire. The Malays, already deserted the spot. At the first shot, two men were killed and three wounded, in one boat. A party were employed trying to cut a passage through the large spar, but succeeded to a perforating with the saw only. Mr. Leonard Gibbard, senior mate of H.M.S. Wolverine, was mortally wounded, having received a grape shot in the chest." In twenty minutes a passage was formed sufficient for one boat to admit of one boat passing the barrier, which was done one by one, under a terrifically galling fire from the twelve-gun battery in the flank, and a stockade of three guns in front. A musket ball fell like grape shot, from the standing fire that took a wing of one of the principal embrasures, amid the fire of about 300 Marines, with apparent degree of physical bravery worthy of a better cause; he received a shot at that through the neck, and was borne by his comrades from the scene of action.

It would be no easy task to compute the loss on the part of the enemy, but from the statements of two prisoners it was understood to be very severe. It appeared they (who were slaves) had been employed for upwards of 24 hours throwing dead bodies in the river.

The loss on the part of the English was as follows.—

H.M.S. Agincourt.—Two marines, and three seamen, killed. Lieutenant Heard slightly, one marine slightly, and two seamen severely, wounded.

H.M.S. Vestal.—One marine killed. Mr. Pyne (second master) badly, and one marine slightly, wounded

Daedalus.—Two seamen killed, and one seaman dangerously wounded (subsequently dead).

Vixen.—One seaman severely, and two seamen slightly, wounded.

Cruiser.—Two seamen slightly wounded.

Wolverine.—Mr. Leonard Gibbard, mate, mortally wounded, and one marine severely.

On the following day the boats were despatched up in up the river for the purpose of burning the town and dismantling the guns of the enemy, under the command of Captain Gifford, of the Vixen. On this occasion a poor woman and an infant child (who had been slaves in the household of Sheriff Housemaly, were discovered; the woman was severely wounded, having received a musket bullet through the elbow joint, rendering amputation necessary; she was taken on board one of H. M. ships, and subsequently departed for Borneo, with Mr. Brooke, the English Rajah of the Sarawak territory, and Captain Bethune, C.B., R.N.

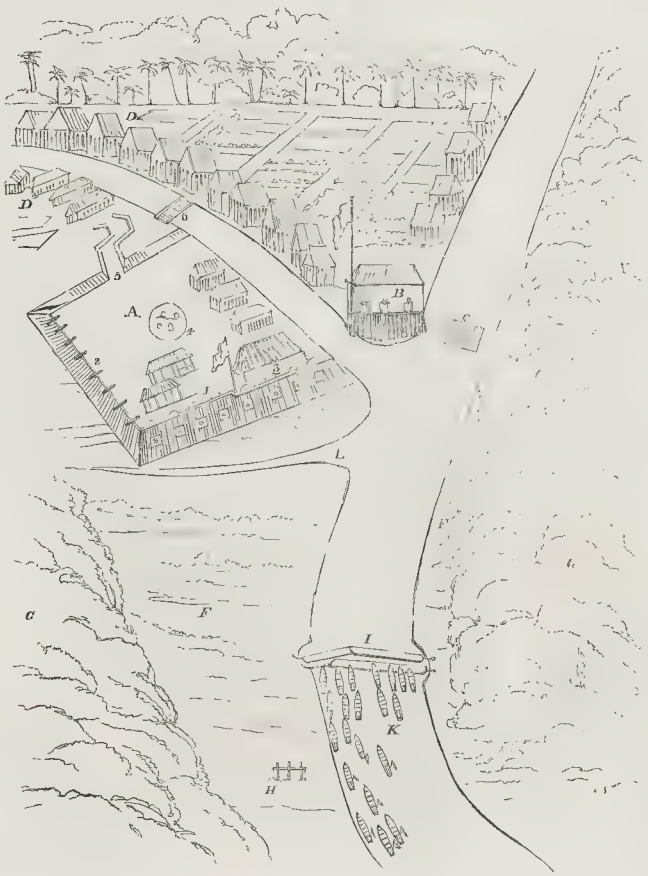
The following version is from the Friend of China of the 17th of September :—The proceedings of the fleet at Borneo have been of a much more serious nature than we were at first aware of. It appears that, after their departure from Singapore, the squadron under command of the Rear Admiral, having on board Mr. Brooks and Captain Bettune proceeded to Borneo Proper, for the purpose of ratifying the treaty made with the Sultan for the cession of Palo Labuan. The Sultan declared that he was willing that the treaty should be ratified, but expressed great alarm from the opposition of some of the Chiefs, or Rajahs. One chief of consequence had fortified his house, and the natives were of opinion that he would successfully oppose any force sent against him by the Rear Admiral. A few shot from the Vixen, Nemesis, and Pluto, quickly destroyed the fortification, and its defenders fled, leaving trophies for the conquerors in the shape of dead and wounded goats, pigs and dogs. If any men had been killed, the vanquished carried the bodies with them. After this there was no further opposition to a ratification of the treaty.



PLAN OF THE ATTACK.

The Sultan informed the Rear Admiral that at Maludu Bay, on the northern extremity of the island, there was a notorious piratical colony, commanded by an Arab. This man, the Sultan declared, would oppose any European settlement that might be formed in Borneo Proper, and that it was of the utmost importance that he should be expelled the island, and the horde be dispersed. This portion of Borneo is included in the territory ceded to Great Britain many years ago, and is near the island of Brambangan, which at one time was in the possession of the East India Company. The fleet proceeded to Maludu Bay, into which, from many mouths debouches the water of a shallow river, the navigation of which is difficult even for boats. Upon the banks of this river the Arab chief had his settlement, and from thence his fleet could prey upon vessels in the China, the Celebes, or the Socioo seas.

From the intricacy and shallowness of the river, it was thought that the small steam vessels would be unable to reach the town, and an expedition of 32 boats and 450 men, under the command of Captains Talbot and Lyster, was despatched, with orders to bring off the pirate chief, either by force or quietly, as circumstances might render necessary. The first day after leaving the fleet, the boats could not find an entrance. They remained off the shore all night, and the next morning, with greater success, they got inside. After pulling for 10 miles, they came in sight of the town. A strong boom was here laid across the river, secured by chains; and within a hundred and fifty yards of it, a battery was erected, eight guns of which were pointed to the raft; another battery of three guns, on the opposite shore, exposed the boats to a cross fire. The officers in command saw that a determined resistance would be made, and felt that their position was one of great danger. The crew stood perfectly cool at the guns, with which eight boats were armed, ready for the commencement of hostilities. A boat, bearing a flag of truce, was despatched from the fort to demand what was the object of the expedition. On being told that their Chief was required to go on board the Admiral's ship, they replied, that this command could not be complied with. Immediately on the return of the boat, a murderous fire was opened from the fort and gun-boats, which was returned with great effect, the seamen loading and firing with perfect coolness. A rocket battery was erected ashore, under charge of Mr. Paynter, Gunnery Lieutenant on board the Agincourt, and these missiles were thrown into the fort with perfect accuracy. The Marines were landed on the raft, some of the boats lightened of their guns and drawn over, when they were re shipped, and ready for a dash at the fort itself. This occup ed about fifty minutes; a heavy and destructive fire being kept up all the time. When it was observed that the boats had crossed the raft, and that the Marines were landed, the enemy abandoned the fort, and the three gun battery ceased firing. On entering, the fort bore evident marks of the fire that had been employed against it, though the dead and wounded were mostly carried away. There were upwards of thirty guns mounted, eight of which bore directly upon the raft, where the boats lay at a distance of 150 yards exposed to their fire for upwards of fifty minutes.

Bales and boxes of European and Chinese goods, with crates of earthenware, anchors, chains, spars, &c. &c. gave abundant proof of the nature of the pursuits of the inhabitants of Maludu bay. The fort was destroyed and the boats returned to the fleet. Next morning they again ascended the river, with orders to burn the town, which was done. The inhabitants fled in all directions, after a feeble attempt at resistance.

We regret that the loss in this brilliant little action was rather severe. Twenty-five were put hors de combat while lying on the raft—ten of them killed and fifteen wounded. Among the officers, Mr. Leonard Gibbard of the Wolverine was killed, and Lieutenant Heard of the Samarang, and Mr. Pyne, second master of the Vestal, wounded.

It is to be hoped, that the severe lesson they have received will for a time intimidate the pirates of Borneo; but nothing short of a European settlement, with a garrison and one or two small steam-vessels of war permanently on the coast, will effectually drive the pirates from their present haunts. Many a ship that has been reported missing has met her fate on the coast of Borneo, and the crew been murdered or sold as slaves. Even now, it is said that ten Europeans and thirty Manilla men are slaves to the Arab chief whose town has been destroyed. Two Spaniards escaped, and were taken to Manilla. They had been for years in bondage, after having been captured and their comrades murdered by the pirates of Maludu Bay.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.

ST. BENET'S, FINK, THREADNEEDLE STREET.

This Church has just been taken down in the progress of the improvements consequent upon the re-edification of the Royal Exchange.

The first church was rebuilt at an unknown period, by Robert Finck, or Finch; from whom it derived its second appellation, as did the neighbouring lane wherein he resided. This old church seems to have stood on the burial-ground on the south side of the building just taken down. The former was destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666: the latter was commenced in 1672, and completed in 1674, under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren, at the expense of £4139 16s. 10d. Mr. George Holman, stated to have been a Roman Catholic, gave £1000 towards the cost of embellishing the church, for which most liberal gift, the parish presented to him and his heirs for ever, two pews and a vault. Hughson says that Mr. Holman offered to give the parish an organ; but they refused to accept it. The east window of the church contained the arms of Holman, with the date M.D.C.XXV. The vault of the family was purchased of the parish in 1816, by Henry Blaxland, Esq.

Although the Church possessed but slight architectural character, the arrangement of its interior was peculiar. The external walls described a decagon, within which six composite columns formed a parallel aisle in the centre, and supported a small elliptical cupola. An ill-proportioned entablature proceeding from the side walls, was received on each column. The spaces between the columns were arched, as were the east and west ends of the aisle, thus forming a series of arched recesses round the building, which had a singular effect. All the fittings were of oak, which had been stupidly painted of a stone colour.

Our Engraving shows the stone tower at the west end of the Church, with the exterior of two of the ten sides of the main building, as seen in Thread needle street. The tower was removed some months since: it was dwarfish, and devoid of beauty; and was surmounted by a dome and small belfry; the entire height being 110 feet. The loft originally contained five bells, besides "the saints' bell" above. The entrance doorway in the lower part of the tower was not inelegant.

Mr. Godwin, in his "Churches of London" (whence the substance of the above has been derived), properly places this Church low in the scale of architectural merit.

CONFIRMATION OF THE NEW BISHOP OF OXFORD.

On Wednesday morning, the recognition or confirmation of Dr. Samuel Wilberforce, the newly-appointed Bishop of Oxford, took place at St. Mary-le-Bow Church, Cheapside, where it is customary for the bishops elect of the province of Canterbury to attend this church previous to their consecration. The usual church prayers having been read by the Rev. E. Trollope, the necessary formalities were gone through, the Bishop Elect taking the oaths of supremacy, &c. The ceremony was conducted by Dr. Burnaby, in the absence of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The consecration is to be performed by the Primate on Sunday next. Few clergymen have risen more rapidly in the church than Dr. Wilberforce. He was appointed to the rectory of Alverstoke, Hants (which he has held up to the present time), then to the Archdeaconry of Surrey, to a Court chaplaincy, and eventually to the Deanery of Westminster. This preferment he resigns in consequence of his promotion to the episcopal bench. We gave a striking portrait of his Lordship in our journal of last week.

THE KEYS OF THE FORTRESS OF PORTSMOUTH.

As these curious and antique emblems of authority have been repeatedly mentioned in the accounts of her Majesty's reception, a Correspondent has favoured us with a sketch of them. They are of bronze, of a deep gold colour; weigh two pounds and a half, and are fastened together by a purple ribbon, with deep gold fringe. They are each nine inches long: on the fittings is the following inscription; it should, however, be explained that the ancient keys, being much corroded, were mingled with a quantity of fresh metal, and recast in 1814:

"The Keys of the Fortress of Portsmouth, presented to, and most graciously received by, the Prince Regent, on his Royal Highness' arrival at this garrison, on the twenty-first June, 1814, when Lieut.-General Houston was the Lieut. Governor, and Major-General Fisher the Commanding Engineer.

"JOHN OWEN, Fecit."

When her Majesty received the keys on her first visit, in 1846, she took them away with her in the carriage, and kept them for some time, to examine them.

CONFIRMATION OF THE BISHOP OF OXFORD, AT BOW CHURCH.

DEPARTURE OF HER MAJESTY FOR THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, attended by their suite, and accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, left Windsor Castle on Tuesday morning for the Farnborough Station of the South Western Railway, whence they proceed by a special train to Gosport.

The Queen having officially intimated her intention to the naval and military commanders-in-chief at Portsmouth, of revisiting her new marine residence, Osborne-house, at an early hour the necessary preparations for her Majesty's proper reception and convenience commenced ashore and afloat.

At nine o'clock, signal was made from the St. Vincent to "dress ship," when the Victory, Sparrow, Comet (steamer), and Gipsy, Fanny, and Emerald (cutters) displayed their gay colours.

At the Clarence-yard, the usual preparations for the Royal reception were made. A guard of honour of the 8th (King's Own) Regiment, with Captain Holmes, Lieutenant De Rebeck, Ensigns Baynes and Aldridge (the latter bearing the colours), together with the band of the regiment, were drawn up on the platform facing the place of arrival, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Malet. A fatigue party of fifty men and six sergeants of the 74th Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant Debutts, guarded the roads crossed by the rails in the Clarence and Forton roads, to prevent accident and intrusion. Mr. Watkins, superintendent of the Gosport terminus and her Majesty's Railway, took every precaution to prevent accident, both on and off the rails, by traversing, with an engine and tender, the Royal line, and examining minutely the stability of the structure.

At half-past ten the boats of the Coast Guard service took up a position on either side of the creek leading to the Clarence-stairs, headed by Captain Sir Richard Grant, of the St. Vincent (flag-captain of the port), and Captain Moubray, of the Victory, in their respective barges.

The Royal party arrived at the Farnborough Station at five minutes past eleven, where her Majesty was received by Mr. Sheriff Chaplin (Chairman), and Mr. C. Stovin (Manager), of the South Western Railway Company. Her Majesty expressed her commands that the train should not perform the journey in less time than an hour and a half; which was accordingly done.

Her Majesty was received on the platform by Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, Bart., Commander-in-Chief, Major General the Hon. Sir Hercules Pakenham, Lieutenant Governor of Portsmouth garrison, with the keys of the fortress; Captain Carter, R.N., Superintendent; Mr. Town, Master-Attendant; and Mr. Grant, F.R.S., Storekeeper of the Royal Clarence Victualling Establishment; the Bishop of Oxford and Mrs Wilberforce, the Hon. Lady Pakenham (by Royal command), the Hon. Miss Pakenham, &c. &c. Admiral Ogle conducted her Majesty from the carriage to the platform, and assisted her into the Royal barge, which was steered by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence alongside the Fairy, on board of which the Royal party embarked at a quarter to one o'clock, where Sir Charles Ogle formally paid his respects to her Majesty (being the first Royal visit since his accession to the chief command at Portsmouth), who received the gallant veteran most graciously. At four minutes to one o'clock, the Fairy left her moorings with the Royal standard at her main, and steamed out of harbour under salutes, and cheers from the St. Vincent, Victory, Excellent, and the platform battery.

At about ten minutes to two o'clock, the Fairy hove in sight from Ports month, off Old Castle Point, when Royal salutes from the guns of Cowes Castle and the Royal Yacht Squadron House welcomed the return of the Royal Family to "the island." As the Royal tender, with her illustrious freight, majestically glided along Cowes Roads, the scene among the shipping was very animated; there being a number of vessels at anchor, comprising the fleet of eleven different nations, which their respective Commanders hoisted in honour of the Royal arrival; and the Revenue cutter, Rose, Commander Hughes, which was lying in the Roads, immediately dressed ship. The various foreign Consulates at Cowes also displayed their flags on their respective wharfs, and every flag pole and vessel, in and along the harbour, was decorated. The morning was inauspicious, but at noon the rain ceased, and the weather became fine.

At five minutes to two the tender was steered towards the harbour's mouth, and, in a few minutes afterwards, although nearly low water, was brought alongside the pier, at the same place lately erected for East Cowes by the Corporation of the Trinity House. (See the Engraving.) Here her Majesty disembarked, followed by Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, accompanied by their respective suites and attendants.

Her Majesty was received on landing by the Inspecting Commander of the Coast, and conducted to the Royal carriage, which was waiting close on the wharf for her reception; the Coast Guard forming the guard of honour. As soon as her Majesty, and his Royal Highness, and their children were seated, the carriage proceeded under the archway of the new building, to the High-street, and, at ten minutes after two, arrived at Osborne, followed by two of the Royal carriages, containing the suite, consisting of Lady Portman (Lady in Waiting), Lord Charles Wellesley (Groom Marshal) Equerry in Waiting, Colonel Bowles (Master of the Household), and Lieutenant-Colonel Wylde (Equerry in Waiting to Prince Albert).

In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness, attended by Mr. Thomas Cubitt, the builder, inspected the Royal building, and from thence proceeded on foot to the new Lodge, in course of erection, at the back entrance to Osborne.

GRETNA GREEN MARRIAGES: "Clackmannaiden," Inverness; "Fortunet Amour," "*P. E. Still, a marriage in Scotland, not celebrated by a clergyman, (with the exception of the notorious Gretna Green marriages,) is rarely or never heard of; a result of the society's reverential feeling in favour of a religious celebration of the contract. The plain state of the case is—that the Scottish people have not emancipated at all, the English have availed themselves of, to ward off the rigour of their own law; and matches so made appear to have been almost exclusively "stolen" or "runaway," and all the parties English. The trade was established by a tobacconist, not a blacksmith (as so generally believed), and the name of "Gretna Green" arose from his residence in a cottage so given, between Gretna and Springfield, to which latter village he removed in 1791. In 1815, the number of marriages celebrated at Gretna was stated in Brewster's "Edinburgh Encyclopædia," at 500, which number had above doubled, at the rate of 1*l.* guineas each. The disreputable trade has been, for many years past, greatly on the decline.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1845.

NEW ZEALAND seems destined to be a source of misfortunes and disgraces to all connected with it. The Company and the Government have never been able to agree in their views of a single fact, letter, instruction, treaty, or agreement. The conduct of the Governor led to his recal. The natives could not understand the formalities by which they parted with their lands, and an attempt to occupy them led to the massacre of Europeans; one aggression led to another; and the insults offered by Heki to the British flag necessitated hostilities, in which our troops, in one case, met with very dubious success, and, in another and later instance, have experienced a direct and disastrous defeat. From the commencement to the close of the history of our attempts to colonise New Zealand, we find nothing but ill luck, or rather bad conduct, which will generally be found at the bottom of what is called so. The Colonial Office shuffled and broke faith—the Colonists could not get their land titles confirmed, and were ruined—and now, when actual hostilities are forced on the Executive, our troops are found deficient in numbers, and unprovided with the arms necessary to meet a brave, and, as we have been taught by experience, a rather skilful opponent. It is a common error to under-rate an enemy, but it is nearly always a fatal one. To this cause we have to ascribe the loss of many brave men which we have this week to record. Though the action is to be deeply deplored for its result, yet more melancholy is it from the unavoidable impression, that it is but the beginning of a long and bloody series of conflicts between the civilised man and the savage. The vicissitudes of the struggle may be many and great, the resistance may be determined, but the ultimate consequence is as certain as the sufferings that will precede it. All past history tells but one tale—that, when brought into contact, the savage race disappears before the advance of the white man. What has occurred in South America, in North America, in Australia, will be acted over again in New Zealand. A predatory warfare between the pioneers of cultivation and the aboriginal owners of the soil will deepen by degrees in intensity, and become at last a war of extermination. In the present case, the struggle will be more desperate and longer in duration than on most others, as the New Zealanders are a strong and hardy race, with many of the qualities of a higher position in the human family. This is a sad prospect: it was not the one contemplated by the settlers of that country. It was hoped that one exception, at least, would be furnished by the settlers of New Zealand to that chronicle of butchery, crime, and demoralisation which is presented by the history of colonisation. For some time it was hoped the interests of the native and the settler might be combined. Through whose mismanagement that hope has been destroyed it is, we fear, useless now to inquire. The bloodshed that has occurred renders reconciliation now almost impossible. There is also reason to apprehend that another element mingles in the contest that will act powerfully in preventing any approach to it. The natives are aided and supported by Europeans, men of desperate character, escaped convicts and fugitives, who, far more depraved than the savage, are his equals in ferocity, and more than his equals in skill. In remaining beyond the laws of society is their only safety, and they thus dread the increase of civilisation, which would be fatal to them.

To men of this stamp is attributed the strongly built stockade, the well-contrived means of defence; while the number of officers killed almost proves that there was confusion of individual value in their fire; deprived of leaders, a body of men soon falls into confusion. On the other hand, the attack seems to have been mismanaged: by a culpable neglect of orders, the implements necessary for tearing down the defences were left behind, and only found wanting in the most critical moment; while cannon that "upset with their own recoil," are not the weapons we should have expected to find in the hands of British troops, when we remember the enormous depôt of artillery of all sorts at Woolwich. The events of the Burmese War should have taught us that the storming of stockades is no easy matter; it is not safe to despise all defences that do not present the orthodox military forms of ditch, bastion, and curtain; savages may be very formidable Vaubans in their way, and fortify in a fashion as effectively as if they had graduated in the College of Engineers. In the present instance, that was done at last, and we should have been done at first; advantage was taken of a height commanding the fort, the occupants of which, when the height was gained, were driven out by artillery. In war the most effective means are always the least bloody; a certain arrangement made, resistance is hopeless, and the point is gained without the slaughter an ill-considered plan of attack is sure to produce. The whole affair is not creditable to us; New Zealand is a blot on our Civil Government, on our skill as negotiators, on our colonial management, and now and least expected of all, on our military character.

THE great anxiety of the Emperor of Russia to negotiate a marriage between his daughter and the Archduke Stephen—a measure for which he is ready to make the most extraordinary sacrifices—has led to much speculation on what the motive can be for such anxiety. A Correspondent has favoured us with the following facts, which may throw some light on the subject:—

Hungary has a population of fifteen millions, and occupies a very important geographical position, command[illegible] any military proceeding [illegible] appears [illegible] The Hungarians are no gibbours of the Poles, and have often strongly expressed their feeling of indignation against the conduct of Russia. They were with difficulty restrained from joining the Poles during their last struggle.

Should contested elections for the office of Palatine of Hungary shortly occur, which is probable from the great age of the present Palatine, it would be very unfortunate for Hungary if Russian influences should be allowed to interfere. The marriage between the Archduke Stephen and the Archduchess Olga would probably afford a pretext, as the Archduke Stephen, without such a connection, would be likely to be elected. With Russian patronage, much violent feeling would run through the country, out of which Russian agents would know how to avail themselves, to the injury of Hungary. Intestine troubles, which might balance parties in Hungary, would weaken the power of Austria to restrain Russian encroachments in Turkey.

Russia has thought it worth her while to employ in Wallachia and Servia, as Consuls, some of her most eminent diplomatists. Baron Buckmann and M. Titoff have been Consuls-General in Wallachia; and since Chargé d'affaires at Constantinople: Prince Dolgorousky and Baron Orloff have been employed in Servia. Secret agents are frequently detected amongst the population of the great Church in Hungary, but no authorised agents have been allowed by Austria. A Russian Archduchess, as wife of the Palatine, would open the door for them. An unsuccessful election would enable Russian agents to sympathise with disappointed parties, and future elections would more frequently than during the last half century. The Emperor may have sufficient motive for pressing this connection.

GEOLOGICAL PHENOMENON.

(To the Editor.)

In your Illustrated Article of the 22nd inst., headed as above, page 336, there are some statements which it is desirable should be corrected; arising, doubtless, from my having furnished your agent with the drawing and letter-press account of the phenomenon, together with verbal information, which should have been in writing to secure accuracy.

The quarry at which this phenomenon was discovered, is not Twintwistle, but Tintwistle, situated, not in the county of Nottingham, but of Chester, on the south-eastern side of the narrow strip of Cheshire, which runs up between Lancashire and Derbyshire, to the West Riding of Yorkshire. The quarry is close to the river Etherow, a tributary to the Mersey, which forms a considerable portion of the boundary line of the counties of Chester and Derby. It is within a mile of the village of Hadfield, and three miles of the town of Glossop. The letter-press extract is not from a Nottingham, but a Manchester journal

The slab of stone, bearing the impressions, has been carefully taken up, presented by the proprietor of the quarry to the Geological Society of Manchester, and deposited by them in their valuable museum.

The first discovery of the impressions was made in September, when one after another came to light, until a series of five appeared nearly in a line. On the 16th of September, I visited the quarry myself, examined the foot-prints, measured them, and made notes of particulars. I found three of them of several inches depth, appearing as if partly filled in again on the withdrawal of the foot, by the return of the puddly soil. The other two were of less depth, and more perfectly defined. One of these was the impression of a right forward curved marks at the toes, as if formed by long toe-nails, on the sinking down of the toes. Each impression had a considerable heap at the heel, as though produced by the pressure of the foot upon the yielding mass. I found the steps about 3 feet 9 inches asunder, and the perfectly-formed impressions 10½ inches in length. They appeared to me to have been produced by some one that was either walking up a hill, or running along a level surface. They are evidently the footsteps of a biped. The two most perfect impressions resemble those of the human foot more than of anything else in nature, and the less perfect ones clearly indicate the continued progress of the same individual. It is all but certain that a succession of the same series has been broken up unobserved, and carried away for building m[illegible]. The numerous other impressions shown in your last week's illustration have been subsequently discovered. The stone is of hard texture and fine grain, and is used for the dressed fronts of buildings.

I am respectfully yours,
Nottingham, Nov. 22, 1845. WM. B. CARTER.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager not having sufficiently advanced towards convalescence, and still labouring under the effects of a cold, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who had arranged to leave Frogmore House for Witley Court, to morrow, has postponed her intended visit to the Dowager Queen until this week. The event of the Court prolonging its stay at Osborne House until the end of next week, and the Queen Dowager being sufficiently recovered to be able to receive company, it is expected that the Duchess of Kent will take her departure for Witley Court on Monday; but, certainly, according to present arrangements, not earlier. The Royal Duchess took a carriage airing this afternoon, attended by LADY ANNE SARA DAWSON, and paid a visit to his Royal Highness Prince Alfred, at the Castle.

THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, whose health is improved health, intends to pass the winter chiefly at Gloucester House, Park-lane, having left Richmond Park for the season.

VISCOUNTESS VILLIERS.—It gives us great pleasure in being enabled to state upon the best authority that the Viscountess Villiers is much better, and that no danger is now apprehended.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—We are happy to state that the last accounts from Lord Eldon are very favourable. He is daily improving in health and strength, and was on Wednesday able to come down stairs, and remain for a length of time in the drawing-room.

THE DAUGHTER OF LADY BOWYER.—We regret to announce the decease of the Dowager Lady Bowyer, which took place at Florence, on the 15th inst., in the 9th year of her age. Her lady ship was the only daughter and heiress of Admiral George Brett, who served under Lord Anson, in his celebrated voyage, as Lieutenant of the Centurion, and subsequently rose to great distinction in the service of his country.

THE GRAND DUKE OF THE CZAREWITZ CONSTANTINE.—His Imperial Highness, about noon on Tuesday, embarked at Plymouth, on board the Ingermanland, Captain Mosfit, under salutes from her Majesty's ship Queen, 110, and President, 50, which were returned by the Russian man-of war.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

EARLY CLOSING OF SHOPS.—A public meeting, convened by the London General Association of all Trades for the Early Closing of Shops, was held on Tuesday evening, at the Western Institution, Leicester-square, in furtherance of the objects of the association. General Sir De Lacy Evans, K.C.B., took the chair; and having explained the object for which the meeting was called, and expressed his full concurrence in them, observed that within the last half century a great impulse had been given to our trade and commerce, and immense advantages over rival nations had been obtained; it was a question, however, whether that impulse had not, in some cases, been carried to extremes, and whether our zeal in the pursuit of wealth had not deprived a large portion of the population of those benefits and comforts which the like classes in other countries enjoyed. (Hear.) No interest would be interfered with or compromised by the reform now proposed, while it would conduce to the comforts and the physical and moral improvement of the assistants in the greatest degree were it conceded. To be successful, however, the movement must be carried on, not in opposition to, but in connection with the employers, and it was recommended that the employers should be invited either to co-operate with the committee of the assistants, or to form independent committees of themselves, for the purpose of carrying out the object in view. Another association, the Drapers' Society, had shown great energy and much good judgment in carrying out the object of limiting the hours of labour, as far as drapers' assistants were concerned; but he hoped to see them joined with the assistants of other trades. (Hear.) Mr. Lee moved, and Dr. Epps seconded a resolution, declaring the uselessness of the practice of late shopping, deprecating the fatal and moral injury it entails on the industrious and deserving class of the community, and expressing the sympathy of the meeting with the efforts of this and other kindred societies to remedy the evil, which was agreed to, as was another in favour of appealing to the public by means of widely circulated statements and addresses against the habit of late-hour shopping, and pledging the meeting to co-operate with the association, and to assist, by pecuniary contributions and otherwise, in procuring the contemplated relief.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES FOR THE LABOURING CLASSES.—The establishment for the use of the poor at Glasshouse-yard, London Docks, has now completed the first six months of its experiment, and during that period, the warm-baths, wash-tubs, and drying apparatus, have been used by 29,989 persons. The buildings on the site for the first model establishment at Goulstone-square, Whitechapel, were sold by auction on Tuesday. The foundation stone is to be laid there on the 16th of December.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL AND THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.—A very full meeting of the Governors of Christ's Hospital was held on Tuesday, when a discussion took place which terminated in a resolution, in effect condemnatory of the whole of the proceedings of the late Lord Mayor, and the Corporation of the city of London, on the much agitated question of the right of the chief magistrate to take precedence of all other persons with the exception of the Sovereign's family. We may add that one of the architects of the Royal Hospital Committee was subsequently held at Guildhall, at which an account of what had taken place at Christ's Hospital was detailed, and the meeting came unanimously to the resolution to assert the right of the Lord Mayor to take precedence. These proceedings have placed it beyond ad question that the matter will be immediately handed over to the lawyers.

THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB.—The opening Coxons of the New Conservative Club, St. James's-street, are being painted and decorated in a most costly manner. Her Majesty, it is understood, will visit the establishment as soon as entirely completed. We may add that one of the architects of the edifice was Mr. George Basevi, jun., whose untimely end is no doubt fresh in the recollection of our readers. Mr. Sidney Smirke was his coadjutor in the works.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths up to Saturday last was 982, showing a decrease of 82 as compared with the preceding week. We are glad to find that the mortality from measles is on the decrease, as well as that caused by diseases of the lungs and other organs of respiration.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—Both houses met on Thursday pro forma, when Parliament was further prorogued, with the usual ceremony, until Tuesday, the 16th of December. The Lords Commissioners were Lord Denman, Lord Wharncliffe and the Earl of Aberdeen.

POSTSCRIPT.

MURDER IN KENNINGTON LANE.

On Thursday evening, at about a quarter past 5 o'clock, one of the most cool and delibe rate acts of murder that have been committed in the metropolis for many years was perpetrated in Peacock-street, Newington.

At that time Daniel Fitzgerald, a labourer in the employment of Mr. Quennell, a respectable builder in Kennington-lane, and a countryman of his, named Owen M'Carthy, were proceeding home, and as they had turned into Peacock street, they were met at rather a dark spot by a person who came in front of them, and who, without the slightest parley or uttering a sentence, deliberately presented a pistol to the breast of poor Fitzgerald, discharged its contents into his body.

The murderer ran off but was pursued by two gentlemen and taken to the station house. In a few minutes intelligence had reached the station that the unfortunate man, Fitzgerald, was no more, and that, so deliberate was the act of assassination, the poor man never even uttered a single groan.

One of the policemen picked up the ball which had caused the fatal wound, at the bottom of the staircase of the Peacock public-house, it having fallen from the body while the deceased was being moved.

The murderer, upon the charge being about to be entered against him, gave the name of Samuel Quennell, and it was then ascertained that he was brother of Mr Quennell, the builder, and, as well as the deceased, had been employed by him. Whil- the charge was being taken. Inspector Coster asked the prisoner if he had the pistol about him, and his reply was that he had not. Immediately after, however, the prisoner was in the act of taking something out of his pocket, when Lockier seized his arm, and found that he had got a pistol in his hand, which was immediately secured. It was a good sized pocket pistol, single barrel, percussion lock, and it was evident that it had been but just discharged.

On making inquiries as to the causes which led to so deliberate an act of murder, it appeared, that for some cause or other the prisoner had been discharged from his employment by his brother on Saturday last, and conceiving that Fitzgerald had been the cause of his dismissal, he had been heard during the week to make use of the most violent threats towards the unfortunate man

Poor Fitzgerald resided at No. 11, Peacock-street, and his assassin lived close by, so that the unfortunate man met his death within a few doors of his home, indeed sufficiently near for his wife and five children to hear the report of the shot which deprived them of a husband and g father.

The prisoner, who is an unmarried man, and 32 years of age, maintained a perfect silence.

At a later hour, Mr. Carter had ascertained from the prisoner's landlord, that the murderer during the day had sent to see the deceased at work, and having returned home remained there until about five minutes before the murder was committed. He also says that the prisoner was perfectly sober at the time.

EXAMINATION OF THE PRISONER AT LAMBETH POLICE COURT.

Yesterday morning the prisoner was placed at the felons' bar.

The first witness called was Owen M'Carthy, a labourer, of No. 10, Queenstreet, Walworth, who deposed that he was employed by the same employers of Mr. Quennell, builder, of Kennington-lane, and brother to the prisoner. Was at work at Mr. Quennell's the day before, and, on his coming out at his dinner hour, saw the prisoner standing nearly opposite, and close to the Horse and Groom public house. At about five o'clock he (witness) and Fitzgerald left Mr. Quennell's yard, went along Kennington lane, crossed the Kennington-road, and proceeded in a direct leading to Peacock-street. The deceased was a little in front of him, witness, when he saw the prisoner come in front of him and point something towards his breast, and discharge a pistol at him. Witness's eyes were dazzled at the moment, and witness thought at first that it was something to frighten them, but at the instant he saw Fitzgerald in the act of falling, and he exclaimed, "I'm shot." As soon as he recovered his sight, he saw the prisoner walk away, and he followed, and called out, "He has shot the man." The prisoner then commenced running, and two gentlemen followed and took him, and witness came up when the gentlemen had secured him, but he did not hear the prisoner say anything. Witness went to inform the prisoner's brother what had happened, and the prisoner was taken to the station-house. Witness did not know what had become of Fitzgerald. He did not know of his own knowledge, whether there had been any disagreement between the prisoner and the deceased.

Mr. Henry Calling deposed that on the preceding evening he was passing along the Kennington-road when he heard the report of a pistol, and immediately after he saw the prisoner and heard some person call out "Stop him." He, witness, in consequence, instantly followed and took the prisoner. Some persons came up to assist him, and the prisoner said, "Take me to the station house." This was all he said. The prisoner was dressed at the time as he was at present, and witness was at the station-house when the prisoner was searched. Witness saw a pistol taken from a right hand pocket. Examined the pistol, and observed that it had been recently discharged, as part of the cap remained on the nipple.

Henry Allam, shopman to Mrs. Tubb, who keeps a public house, and a shop in the New Cut, said that on Saturday evening last, between seven and eight o'clock, a person, who he believed to be the prisoner, came to the shop, and examined a pistol which was hanging up for sale. The first pistol he produced, he missed, he drew the trigger without a cap being on, and so injured it, that witness charged him two shillings for the injury, and the prisoner bought another pistol for two shillings. The pistol he had sold was a new one, and similar to the one produced, but he could not take it upon him to swear that the pistol produced was the same. The person who had dealt with him, and who he believed to be the prisoner, was dressed as the prisoner then appeared, but he had a cap on

The witness M'Carthy was here recalled, and said the prisoner was in the habit of wearing a cap while at work.

Mr John Marne, a gun maker in the Walworth-road, deposed that on Saturday evening a person similarly attired to the prisoner called at his shop, and first asked for a bullet mould to fit a pistol he produced. He gauged the pistol, and found it to correspond exactly with the pistol produced. The prisoner ultimately purchased a quarter of a pound of balls similar to those now produced, and then left the shop. The pistol produced appeared in every respect with the one now produced, but he (witness) would not take upon him to swear that the prisoner was the man. He appeared, however, corresponded in every respect with the description of the person who had purchased the bullets. The witness here fitted the bullet which had inflicted the fatal wound to the pistol, and said the ball was of the same description as those he had sold.

William Robinson deposed, that between the hours of four and five o'clock on Saturday evening he was in the shop of Mr. Rust, 10, Crown-street, Walworth, when a person came in and asked for some bullets. Mr. Rust told him, he did not sell any bullets; he could get them at a shop opposite to the White Hart. The person bore a strong resemblance to the prisoner, but he would not take upon himself to say that he was actually the man.

Mr. W. Popham, a surgeon, of Queen's-row, Kennington road, said that he was passing near the Peacock public-house, when he heard a loud report of a gun or pistol shot, and immediately after saw a person run out of the court, and heard a man in a flannel jacket say "The man is shot." Witness went into the Peacock public house, where he found a man lying on the table just dying. He examined the deceased, and then left the shop. Witness responded in every respect with the one now produced, but he (witness) would not take upon him to swear that the prisoner was the man. He appeared, however, corresponded in every respect with the description of the person who had purchased the bullets. The witness here fitted the bullet which had inflicted the fatal wound to the pistol, and said the ball was of the same description as those he had sold.

SALE OF THE BECKFORD COLLECTION.

Before we resume our descriptive détour[1] of this costly monument of Mr. Beckford's taste, we must say a few words in emendation of the details given last week. This structure appears to have been the delight of Mr. Beckford, as a retreat for study and meditation. Its design conveys an impression of size and variety of form, perfected with harmony of colour, that is surprising in so comparatively small a space. Mr. Goodridge, the architect, has produced another design, showing the Tower to be capable, at a moderate expenditure, of being enlarged into an elegant and complete residence.

Still, the Lansdown Tower is of much less elevation than the Fonthill, which was 280 feet in height. In Mr. Redding's "Recollections," we find the following passage respecting the origin of the two Towers. Mr. Redding, loquitur:—

"I thought of the Tower of the Caliph just now," I remarked, "while I was upon Lansdown, fancying the youthful idea carried on through later life—the tower in Vathek, and Fonthill, and here, lead to such a conclusion."

"No," Mr. Beckford replied, "I have extraordinary sight; God rarely gives men such eyes. I am partial to glancing over a wide horizon—it delights me to sweep far along an extended landscape. I must elevate myself to do this, even on Lansdown. The tower at Fonthill was as necessary an appendage to such a structure as it would have been to a real abbey. I love building, planting, gardening—whatever will keep me employed in the open air. I like to be among workmen. I never kept less at one time than a hundred when at Fonthill. Wishing to have something besides a study on the summit of the hill, where the view is so extensive, I determined upon erecting the Tower."

"It was a conclusion from the advantageous site, then?" I observed.

"It was—everybody is deceived in judging of the motives of others, though your conclusion was natural."

We may here mention, by the way, that the cost of Fonthill has been strangely overstated at one million; whereas the whole outlay was £273,000, scattered over sixteen or eighteen years in the expenditure.

Returning to the Lansdown property, we find the Gardens remarkably rich in the Fir or cone-bearing tribe; to which, (besides the British Isles,) Mexico, the Brazils, and the Himalaya, have been made tributary.

RARE VENETIAN GLASS.

The Tower, Gardens, and Grounds extend by a Terrace Walk to a Tunnel, at which commences "the Dike Garden," wherein is a picturesque Italian Cottage.

The Tower building is approached from a spacious area, surrounded with Plantations, by a flight of steps and a Terrace, under an Arcade; passing the chief entrance, along a Corridor, the ascent to the Tower is by an open geometrical staircase, to the Lantern, or Belvidere, described in our Journal of last week. On descending the staircase, by a doorway therefrom, we reach a spacious Terrace, whence the Gardens and Plantations are seen to great advantage. Descending somewhat lower, we reach the second floor of the main building, and enter the Oratory, described in our last as the Sanctuary. It communicates with the Cromaon Drawing-room, also described last week. Adjoining, is a Library, or Gallery, with arched ceiling and guilloche panels, and fitted with oak book-cases and closets

On the Ground Floor is the apartment described in our last as the Vestibule, but which is a Corridor, leading to the principal Vestibule. Here is a splendid Sienna Console, supported by columns of the same material: the arched compartments above are lined with silvered plate glass, and has a rich and imposing effect, which is sustained by the oak-beamed ceiling and richly-coloured walls, constituting a suitable approach to the Scarlet Drawing-room, engraved this week.

This is a truly noble apartment, including the Vestibule, 29ft. 9 inches by 17ft. 3, and 12 feet in height. It has a ceiling with oak beams, relieved by crimson, purple and gold; and a deep semi-circular recess, with windows enriched with slabs of very rare marble. The chimney-piece is of elegant Brocatelli. The walls are hung with scarlet moreen, and finished with richly-gilt mouldings. The carpet a quatrefoil pattern, and scarlet colour. The chairs are of the Fonthill pattern, finished in scarlet; and the cabinets are of oak. On the walls are some choice paintings; and throughout the apartment are several rare and costly items of vertu. The curtains are of purple and scarlet; and to the windows are gilded trellis guards or grilles.

Here we should explain, that our several views of the Tower and Buildings, interior and exterior, have been taken from very effective drawings made by Mr. Wildes Maddox, for Mr. E. F. English's superb work, lately published.

THE SALE

The sale of this splendid collection commenced on Thursday last, and has been continued on each succeeding day of business. The catalogue numbers some 600 lots, including gorgeous furniture, cabinets, paintings, antique gems, coins, agates, mosaic tables, sculpture, Etruscan vases, rare gold Japan, and what is described as "matchless china." Of the latter there is a large proportion, a circumstance thus explained in the Bath Chronicle of last week:—"There is a general feeling of surprise at the quantity of china, and many are credulous as to the fact of its being the genuine property, and veritably having belonged to Mr. Beckford. For two reasons we place entire confidence in the announcement. In the first place, there is not one single piece of those ten thousand specimens but is remarkable for its beauty, quality, and costliness; and, secondly, because Mr. Beckford's custom was to have a different arrangement for every day in the year. The cup and saucer he used to-day at his breakfast were placed in a cabinet until a revolving year brought them into request; and such was the custom likewise at dinner, dessert, and tea. Thus to indulge his taste for the finest and most delicate porcelain was a manifestation of a feeling superior to the mere possession of wealth, which might have been content to exhibit gold and silver; not so as regards the fragile egg-shell china, which a touch might shiver, the priceless enamel, the lovelier Dresden and other China, for which all Europe had been ransacked. No variety of tint, or elaboration of mere dexterity, could reconcile the fine taste of Mr. Beckford to what was merely costly. In his china, furniture, gardens, equipage, and through all the details of his princely establishment, there were always evidences of refinement, and a chaste, but rich and exquisite taste. Nothing was incongruous; all was in perfect keeping—in complete harmony."

The First Day's Sale consisted of Rare Oriental and Egg-shell China; the whole of which fetched very high prices. Thus, we find a single basin, dragon pattern, brought £4 12s.; and four egg-shell cups and saucers, very rare, certainly, but fetching £13 2s. 6d.! Fourteen exquisitely enamelled dessert dishes were bought by Messrs. Nathan, for £9 15s 6d.

On the Second Day, the Assyrian, Greek, Indian, Roman, Portuguese, Spanish, German, French, and British coins, and the collection of medals, fetched average prices. The intaglios brought large sums: Victory crowning Achilles (from Strawberry Hill), £9; and an allegorical group from the same collection, £8 18s., being much higher prices than they brought at the Strawberry Hill Sale. A Bacchanalian Mask, in large Sardonyx, by Pistrucci, brought £25 4s. The antique plate realised from 25s. to 40s. per ounce: Messrs. Nathan bought several lots.

On the Third Day, the sale of the Porcelain was resumed; a single plate bringing 54s.; and 6 egg-shell plates £19 8s. 6d., by Messrs. Nathan, "a very high price for 6 china plates, but they are matchless." The china, altogether, is considered to have fetched higher prices than at any sale remembered by the oldest china-dealer in England.

On the Fourth Day, Monday, the Tower alone was sold for £4400; and, with the Gardens, brought 8415 guineas. It was, however, rumoured that the Tower was bought in; and, without any positive knowledge on the subject, we rather think this was the fact; for we know that the estimated value of the fixtures left in the Tower was £1444. The garden cost £15,000, and the land £3000; so that, at the very lowest calculation, the property must have cost Mr. Beckford £23,000. The price realised by the ground is stated to have averaged nearly £800 per acre!

The Fifth Day, Tuesday, was devoted to the Sale of the Pictures. We quote a list, with prices, &c., from an excellent report in the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette:—

Van Opstal. Interior of a Grand Saloon, adorned with many highly-finished pictures, £43
Cuyp.—A Portrait of a Lady, with a ruff, £23 4s.
Cuyper.—A full-length Portrait of Philip IV. of Spain, £67 4s.
A. Montagna. 1538.—A Landscape, with corn field, wooden bridge, &c., £11 11s
Gilfray.—A pair of Ovals—Caricatures, £3 3s.
Gonzales.—Pen and Ink Drawing Head of a Youth, £1 12s.

It will thus be seen that the total sum realised by the sale of the pictures amounted to nearly £3000.

The pair of pictures by Jean Cousin, Lot 303, which, to the uninitiated, certainly, had no great claims, were highly prized by their late possessor. It was imagined that they would be sold for a trifle, and were actually put up at ten guineas; but the judgment of Mr. Beckford was corroborated, and they brought 60 guineas.

Lot 306.—A picture by Domenichino, which some of our friends thought inferior to many paintings of similar size which they had seen on the lids of snuff-boxes,—brought 100 guineas. So much for the honour of coming from the Aldobrondi palace, and having had a place in Lansdown Tower!

RARE OLD INDIA CHINA STORK.

Lot 312.—Albert Cuyp, brought 175 guineas. The picture by Bonaventure Peters, which was of a corresponding size—and an unbiassed judgment would have deemed quite equal to Cuyp's—brought only 48 guineas.

Lot 318.—"The Last Ripening Sunbeam," by G. Lance. (This fine picture was engraved in No. 148 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.) It is related, that when Mr. Beckford first saw this picture in the last exhibition of the Society of British Artists, he intimated to the Secretary his wish to purchase it, but was told that it had already been disposed of. Without asking either the price of the picture or the name of the purchaser, he desired the Secretary to present his compliments to the owner, and to say, that if he would do him the favour to accept of double the cost price, he should feel sincerely obliged. The gentleman who had bought Lance's picture was the artist's friend, and, sensible of the advantage of placing one of his productions in Mr Beckford's collection, he relinquished his claim, and paid to Mr. Lance the doubled sum. A letter, detailing these particulars, written by Mr. Lance, was offered by Mr. English to the purchaser. The original cost of the picture was 35 guineas; but it brought 65 guineas at the auction on Tuesday.

Lot 314. Gonzales Coques.—This admirable picture was warmly contended for, and brought 155 guineas.

Lot 316. Velasquez.—A portrait of Philip IV. of Spain—one of the most disagreeable of unpleasant-looking individuals. It was only as a work of art that 32 guineas were paid for this picture. Another portrait, by Cuyper, of the same monarch, brought 64 guineas, and, as we imagine, only for the same reason. The gorgeous suit of armour is represented with an exactitude almost deceptive

Lot 319. West.—a Grand Mass in the Interior of St. George's Chapel, Windsor—brought more than seven or three at a pavement; as Mr Beckford would give the artist—109 guineas! It is well known that Mr Beckford claimed descent from both the Royal families of France and Scotland, and kindred with many illustrious knights of the Order of the Garter, whose portraits are here introduced which induced the artist to designate this a family picture. Perhaps West was never seen to so much advantage as in this particular example. There is more breadth, and a richer tone of colour, than he generally attained. But, however pleasureable it was to look at this fine specimen of the master, the charm was destroyed when we beheld that extravaganza, which presumed to represent the Opening of the Sixth Seal.

It is the fashion to exclaim that modern artists are not patronised, and that a love for the old masters almost exclusively prevails. We think differently, and there was consiuerable evidence during this day's sale in favour of the pictures painted by Mr. Wilkes Maddox for the Sanctuary, being in form the semi-lunette, which rendered them unfit for ordinary apartments, brought upwards of 50 guineas; a small landscape, by Mr. Barker, of Bath, which was painted only four years ago, and for which his patron gave 30 guineas, brought at this day's auction 38 guineas; and a painting by Copley Fielding, the exhibition price of which was, it is understood, 40 guineas, brought this day 140 guineas.

When the Hondekoeter was placed before the company, there was a general manifestation of delight. The touch of genius exalts even the meanest subject. Here poultry assume dignity, and, although perfectly natural, are invested with an interest that excites the imagination. Something out of the picture, it may be the intrusive spectator, has disturbed chanticleer, and all the congregated birds sympathize with their lord and master. A magnificent cock has reared up, by that peculiar tension of its webbed feet, which for an instant enables the seigneur bird to assume on land the gracefulness of its aquatic habits. By this stiffness of the legs, and a turning of the head, the cock's tale is bold. The cock's comb is painted so admirably, that, as Mr. English said, if the skin is broken, you would expect to see blood trickling from the injury. The hair-pencil is said to be by Both. When this famous work was first taken to Lucien Tower, it was placed in what was then called the Scarlet-room; but the introduction of so animated and richly-coloured a picture had produced an effect to which its possessor could not be reconciled. It was discovered that the brilliancy of the scarlet crest of the cock had cast everything into dimness; and, with that energetic promptness characteristic of Mr. Beckford, he ordered that the walls should be covered with scarlet cloth, and that the drapery which concealed the entrance, the window-curtains, the carpets, the couches, and every article of furniture, should be made to harmonise with this key note, the said cock's comb!

The picture of still life by De Heem and Bonaventure Peters, is by us and all praise exquisite for "that sort of thing." The engraving of "Sir Isaac Newton" displayed on a snow-white napkin, is admirably enlivened by the introduction of a straggling branch of the vine, and the peep through an open casement at a seaport. Here is a most tempting ham, skilfully carved, to exhibit its quality: in painting the bone of this well-fed joint, the artist had lavished his utmost skill—as it seemed to project from the canvas, and had all the appearance of reality. The fruit in this popular picture is equally to anything we ever saw on canvas; and the oysters seemed as if they would slip from their pearly shell.

The wonder of the collection, to our minds, was Walckenberg's picture of the building of Babel, formerly Lawrence's collection—a graceful and magnifying glass was needful to descry all the details of this most extraordinary painting. The Tower itself was made to appear stupendous from the diminutive figures employed in its construction. The surrounding country, interseited by rivers and canals, are crossed by a vast number of bridges and countless multitudes throng every portion of the landscape. Camels, loaded with materials, in long files and patient stateliness, are proceeding towards the base of the gigantic tower; barges, burthened with stone and timber, almost choke up the numerous streams; and moving figures, in all directions, seem to be labouring as if their life depended on the effort. Various combinations of very complicated machinery are detailed so accurately, that wood, iron, and brass, are definitely marked; some of the rulers and overlookers are sumptuously arrayed, and decked with chains of gold, and jewels upon them went for 180 guineas! When Mr. Beckford gave his order for this purchase, he said, "Buy it, although the price should be as high as the Tower itself."

We forbear to give the names that will in future be associated with these pictures; for as agents were generally employed, it was difficult to ascertain for whom they bid. The King of Bavaria, the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, the Duke of Bamford, the Marquis of Londonderry, Lord Ashburton, the Earl of Harrington, Earl De Grey, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Lord Northwick, General Sir William Davy, Charles Maude, Esq., Mr. Chaplin, and Mr. Hume, it was rumoured, had made purchases.

On the Sixth Day, (Wednesday), some china, and miscellaneous articles, of extreme beauty, were sold. A fine antique bronze—a vase with shells—brought £15. The following lots were bought by Messrs. Nathan: (393) a costly ebony coffer, with slabs of green porphyry, and Porto de Venere marble, ormolu enrichments, &c., 94 guineas; a pair of Egyptian tables of porphyry, 32 guineas, (395) the superb oak console table from the Common Drawing-room, 68 guineas. The magnificent Florentine Mosaic Table, with oriental alabaster centre, and lapis-lazuli enrichments, after a sharp competition between Mr. Nathan, and Mr. Robinson, of Wigmore-street, was knocked down to the latter for 370 guineas. Lot 448, two fine Etruscan Vases, were purchased for the British Museum; Lot 449, an Etruscan Vase, presumed to be unique, brought 210 guineas: one of these precious and celebrated Vases is engraved upon the annexed page (344; as is, also, (424) the Etruscan Vase, with drinking-cup, of red clay, the subject sacred to Bacchus, and extremely rare. Mr. Beckford was in the habit of remarking upon this Cup, on account of its similarity to the Etruscan vase, that it appeared an evidence of the supposed Western origin of the Peruvians; a notion he was fond of maintaining. The Messrs. Nathan were also purchasers of two Jad Cups, and a pair of porphyry half-columns, for 37 guineas.

We must defer the prices of the following day's sale until our next Journal. Meanwhile, we proceed to describe the large group of articles engraved at page 344.

The group of rare Venetian glass consists of a richly-engraved glass goblet, silver-mounted; a curious wine-glass; next is a sculptured glass vase, elaborately engraved; and a tall Bohemian glass flower-vase.

The Peruvian Drinking Cup has been already described.

The Chinese Coffee-pot, bamboo pattern, is curious and rare; each reed is separately carved.

Of the large group, the Etruscan Vase is 17½ inches high, very perfect, and of exquisite form, enriched with figures emblematic of the Eleusinian Mysteries. This is understood to have been purchased for the British Museum.

To the left of it is an antique Chinese vase, of bronze, spotted with gold. This is an incense burner. An accidental fire has amalgamated several kinds of metals, among which were portions of gold ore. This vase is the only specimen of China used in the fabrication of certain vessels which he presented as a mark of especial favour. There were not many, and the present is considered of great rarity and value.

To the left are two small Etruscan Vases: one, a beautifully modelled head of Isis, the other, with equestrian figures—black on a red ground. Behind it is a fine grey and blue cracle jar; and to the right of it, a magnificent French [illegible] inches high; flowers on a lapis-lazuli ground. To the right of the large Etruscan Vase is a smaller one, with gracefully-modelled handle. In the right hand corner is an antique sarcophagus of white marble, with lapis-lazuli, bound by fillets. And in the left corner is a small Sarcophagus of African black marble, and black plinth.

The fine Statue of St. Anthony of Padua, with the Infant Saviour, engraved at page 345, has been already mentioned. It is of the purest marble, and is, unquestionably, one of Rosa's best works, if not his chef-d'œuvre. Its location in Lucien Tower will be seen in our Engraving of "the Sanctuary," in our Journal of last week

On one side is a China bird, perched upon the stump of a tree, with foliage and insects, rare: at the base is a precious Japan sugar-basket, with silver-gilt rim, and full-down handle.

On the opposite side is a Stork, 16 inches high—rare old India china.

Next week we shall complete our Illustrations of this most interesting Collection of Valuables.

EXPERIMENTS ON WOOLWICH MARSHES.—Experiments have recently been made with shells, fitted with Sergeant-Major Freeburn's fuzes, in Woolwich marshes, and proved most successful. Out of twenty shells fired, seventeen exploded on striking the bulk-head. Experiments were also tried with Capt. Addison's new furnace for heating shot, which also succeeded. By that furnace, which weighs about a ton and a half, and is easily drawn along, thirty exploded red shot were heated red hot in twenty minutes.

ERUPTION OF MOUNT HECLA.—According to news received from Iceland to the 12th of October, the eruption of Mount Hecla still continued with the same violence; the lava ran from the south west crater without intermission, and had already covered a space of three miles, and hemmed up the mass in a plain at the foot of the mountain 30 to 40 cubits in height. This river of lava presented on a clear night a spectacle at once magnificent and imposing. Let the reader picture to himself a river of flaming lava precipitating itself from the summit of a lofty mountain, and assuming as it advances from the crater a red-hot colour, or a sort of bluish red. Three immense columns of smoke constantly ascended from the three craters which had formed and spread themselves over the surrounding districts. Up to this period the lava had not destroyed any farm, but the ashes which had fallen into the meadows had already exercised most pernicious effects upon the cattle, especially the cows. In some districts as many as 40 had perished. The pastures in the district of Rangarvalla, situate to the eastward of Hecla, were entirely devastated on the first eruption by considerable quantities of pumice-stone, and it is feared that a great number of sheep perished on the occasion. Much uneasiness is felt at the duration of the eruption, as the lava, when it receives fresh supplies, always approaches nearer to the cultivated lands.

THE WINDOW-FRAME.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF FREILIGRATH.)

By LEWIS FILMORE

At Newhaus, in his castle proud, the Royal hunting-feast was spread;
The trumpets sounded through the roof, the guests were rang'd, the grace was said;
The Butler pour'd the wine to each, the Servants taste at every call—
It was a sultry summer's day—they open'd wide the windows all.

And through them fell the eye upon the coolness of the Forest green—
The Forest, best of all its joys to Monarch, Prince, or Peer, I ween;
For in it he forgot his cares in clang of horn and cry of hound,
The claims of the unruly folk, of rebel Königsburg, he drown'd.

Alas! that stubborn Königsburg! that sturdy race of Northern blood!
How obstinately for their rights against their Prince that people stood!
And not its Nobles only! No! The Burger-chiefs the Nobles aid,
Both, by revolt against their KING, the champions of a PEOPLE made.

Stern spirit of the Northern coast! Inheritance that yet is thine!
For Freedom ever seems to choose a wave-beat region for her shrine!
As now the splendour of the crown is dimm'd a little near thy foam,
So then, from Brandenburg to thee, how many a heavy curse did come!

The Prince sat at his Hunting feast—the Boar's-head smok'd, the Rhenish flow'd,
"This day" he said, "shall my hand be bought upon those rebels be bestow'd!"
But as he spake a stop was heard—a Knight, bareheaded, bent his knee,
With boots all dust, and hooded spurs: "Ho, what then may thy message be?"

The rider drew a letter forth, too well that seal the Monarch knew,—
He tore it open, glanc'd within, and pale with hate and passion grew;
"Again from Königsburg! By Heaven! the Traitors think us dead or dull,
But this contempt shall be their last—the measure of their crimes is full!

"As sure as I this apple hurl"—and from the fruit beside him spread
The Monarch every royal honour to the rebel Königsburg dead, and red—
"As sure as I this apple hurl through yonder window's open space,
So surely will I crush the league made by this headstrong, rebel race!

So surely will I rule, as lord, o'er all the coast that Amber bears,
So surely shall the Brandenburg the master be of them and theirs!"
And as he spoke he rose in wrath to hurl the fruit he seized away—
The guests astounded held their breath, and gaz'd upon him in dismay.

The Apple sped! but where? Without? Not so; the Prince had miss'd his aim!
It struck the slender Gothic arch that formed the left hand window-frame!
And shattered fell within the Hall! Good! Yet awhile unfled stand,
And let that Cross a symbol be of hope and trust, my Native Land!

LITERATURE.

BURNS'S HERALD LIBRARY.

This popular Miscellany maintains the very attractive character awarded to the series, in our notice of the early volumes. In the additions before us we have, first, in National Poetry, a choice selection entitled Northern Minstrelsy, from the finest extant stores of Scottish Song; and largely from the minstrelsy of Burns, accompanied by a Glossary; and illustrated with several elegantly executed engravings on wood. As a companion to the above, we have a volume of German Ballads and Songs, consisting, chiefly, of new translations from Schiller and others; a number of Original Pieces, founded on German subjects; and a few Ballads, of exquisite humour: this is, altogether, a charming volume. In the department of National Tales, we find seven volumes from the German of L. A. Seidelmann, the Tales of Musæus, which have so long been established favourites in their own country; whence, also, the wood-cuts have been borrowed. 2. Tales from the Phantasus of Ludwig Tieck, as he is styled in a clever Preface "the last, the only survivor of the noble band of German poets." 3. The Portrait of the Emperor, Napoleon, from Hauff. 4. The Caravan, and other Stories, from the same author. 5. Wallenstein and the Swedes in Prague, a Tale of 30 years' War; by the same. 6. Laila, a tale of Switzerland; and Heinrich and Blanca. 7. Quentin Matsys, a tale, embodying the main incidents of the life and genius of the blacksmith and painter of Antwerp; from Mosher. OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM DUNDAS.

This gentleman, who has been long known in political life, was third son of the Right Hon. Robert Dundas, of Arniston, Lord President of the Court of Session, and M.P. for Mid Lothian, and grandson of Robert Dundas, Lord Arniston, representative of a younger branch of the ancient family of Dundas of that Ilk. By profession a member of the English bar, Mr. Dundas early entered on the great arena of politics, and in 1800 was appointed one of the Commissioners for the affairs of India, and made a Privy Councillor. In 1804 he succeeded Mr. Charles Bathurst Pitt as Secretary at War, and held the same office until 1806. He represented for many years the city of Edinburgh, but quitted Parliament in 1831. At the period of his death, which occurred on the 14th inst., Mr. Dundas was Lord Clerk Register, Keeper of the Signet, and Registrar of Entails in Scotland. The fees arising out of this last appointment fell little short of £4000 per annum. Mr. Dundas married, 1st June, 1813, Mary, daughter of the Hon. James Stuart Wortley Mackenzie.

SIR SALUSBURY DAVENPORT, C.B., K.C.H.

Rear-Admiral Sir Salusbury Davenport, C.B., K.C.H., of Bramall Hall, Cheshire, and Weedon Lodge, Bucks, a magistrate for the counties of Buckingham, Chester, Lancaster, Derby, and Gloucester, died at Cheltenham on the 17th inst. This gallant officer entered the navy in 1790, served under the Duke of York in the expedition to the Helder, as Lieutenant of H.M. ship Iris, 1795, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament for the capture of the Dutch fleet. While in command of the Stag cutter, he accompanied Captain Campbell, of H.M. ship Dart, when that officer cut the Desirée, French frigate, out of Dunkirk Roads, in 1800. In 1807, he commanded the Leopard, of 50 guns, and took out by force from Boston, Massachusetts, the U.S. American frigate. Admiral Davenport, whose patronymic was Humphreys, and who assumed the surname of Davenport by Royal Licence, in 1838, upon succeeding, through his wife, to the Davenport estates of Bramall, in Cheshire, with its celebrated and interesting mansion, was third son of the late Rev. Evan Humphreys, M.A., Rector of Montgomery and of Clungunford, county of Salop, by Mary, his wife, daughter and coheiress of the Rev. Salusbury Pryce; and derived his descent from Edwin, Lord of Tegaingl, in Flintshire, founder of the Twelfth Noble Tribe of North Wales and Powys. He married twice; by Jane Elizabeth, his first wife, daughter and heiress of John Tirel Morin, Esq., of Weedon Lodge, he had one son, the Rev. Salusbury Humphreys: and by his second wife, Maria Davenport, the heiress of Bramall, he has left five sons and two daughters.

HENRY ILTID NICHOLL, D.C.L.

This learned civilian was son of the late Iltid Nicholl, Esq., of Llanmaes, in Glamorganshire, and of Portland-place, London, her Majesty's Procurator General, and grandson of Iltid Nicholl, Esq., of Llanmaes, elder brother of Sir John Nicholl, the late distinguished Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. Dr. Nicholl's death occurred suddenly. He was in his usual health on the last Admiralty Court day, the 14th, and then took part in a suit of importance. Fever, attendant on the small-pox, terminated fatally last Monday morning.

LADY RAVENSWORTH.

Maria-Susannah Lady Ravensworth was daughter of John Simpson, Esq., of Bradley in Durham, and granddaughter, maternally, of Thomas, 8th Earl of Strathmore. She married, 26th March, 1798, Sir Thomas Henry Liddell, Bart., who was created Baron Ravensworth in 1821, and by him had a very numerous family, of which the surviving daughters are—Maria, Marchioness of Normanby; Anne, Lady Williamson; Jane, Viscountess Barrington; Elizabeth, wife of the Hon. E. E. Villiers; Susan, Countess of Hardwicke; Charlotte, wife of Captain Trotter, of Dyrham Park, Herts, and Georgiana.

Lady Ravensworth has been for some time hopelessly ill, and her numerous domestic circle were thus, in some degree, prepared for the melancholy event, which took place on the 16th instant, and deprived them of so honoured and beloved a member.

HENRY GEORGE LIDDELL JOHN MATTHIAS WILSON } Examiners.
CHARLES BANS ARTHUR WEST HADDAN }

THE NEW DEAN OF CANTERBURY.—WE have reason to believe that Sir Robert Peel has bestowed the vacant Deanery at Canterbury on the Rev. William Rowe Lyall, Archdeacon of Maidstone, and brother, we believe, of the member for the city of London.

CABINET COUNCILS.—A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, at the Foreign Office. The Ministers present were—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Aberdeen, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Granville Somerset, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. The Council sat four hours. Another Council, which sat three hours, was held on Wednesday.

THE LATE LADY HOLLAND.—The remains of the late Dowager Lady Holland were removed on Monday morning from the late residence in Stanhope-street, for interment in the family vault, Ampthill, Bedfordshire. The funeral was as private as the rank of the deceased would admit—consisting only of a hearse, drawn by four horses, and several mourning coaches. Her ladyship has left her Brixton property (the value of which is estimated at about £1500 a year) to Lord John Russell, for his life. At his death, £600 per annum out of the same property is to be paid to his lordship's children, the remainder reverting to the offspring of her ladyship's daughter, the present Lady Lilford. We understand that her ladyship's other children and grandchildren are very slightly remembered, if at all. She has left £150 a year, for an annuity of £150 a year, in addition to £50 per annum left by the late Lord Holland to the same individual, and all the members of her ladyship's establishment are more or less provided for. Mr. Metcalfe Bashington, her ladyship's medical attendant, receives a legacy of £1000, and an annuity of £50. To Mr. Macaulay her ladyship bequeaths a legacy of £100; to Mr. Luttrell, one of £100; and smaller sums to many of her personal friends. A picture in Holland House is left to the Queen, "if her Majesty will deign to accept it;" and the Hon. W. Cowper receives her ladyship's collection of "H.B.'s" caricatures.

DEATH OF A MILITARY KNIGHT OF WINDSOR.—We regret to state that Captain M'Lachlan, one of the Military Knights of Windsor, who left the town on Tuesday, a few days since, for the purpose of taking leave of his two daughters, who were about to proceed to Ceylon, expired at his apartments in Northumberland-court, Strand, on Saturday last. The late Capt. M'Lachlan, who was in the sixty-eighth year of his age, was in excellent health until within a very few days of his decease. The Misses M'Lachlan sailed on Monday, from Gravesend, in the Tiger.

THE CONDEMNED SLAVERS.—A remote has been received from the Secretary of State, respiting the condemned pirates till the 15th of December. The tidings were communicated to the prisoners by John Milford, of Cuba, Esq., who, speaking Spanish, has, at the desire of the High Sheriff, frequently visited them, and manifested the greatest attention and humanity to these unhappy men. The prisoners are all in good health, Serva, who was dreadfully diseased, having, by the medical treatment and discipline, been restored to health, and his stern spirit has yielded somewhat beneath the effects of confinement and reflection.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The most notable occurrence, of a sporting character, during the week, was the rowing match between London and the provinces, in the persons of their respective champions, Pocock and Clasper, on the waters of "Couly Tyne" This issue was decided on Tuesday last—to the emphatic discomfiture of the Metropolitan representative. We must here set down a few of the details, the better to give force to our commentary on the principle of mustering fleshly bodies by mechanical power, as practised in this country, and other portions of the civilised world.

Soon after noon, in the presence of an immense assembly, the start was effected, the men lifting their shallops through the stream with wonderful strength and admirable grace—

"They featherd their oars with such skill and dexterity."

Thus sped the race 'till they "fouled," and then going off again, it continued, 'till, as the report states, hard by "the Herd's House," other "fouling" took place "among some wooden piles." It has been remarked by an English traveller who has favoured literature with a contribution of his views in and concerning Ireland, that he found the national botheration pervading every department of his economy. Even in the cities of their places of abode, he complains that they uniformly put the cart before the horse—Mr. Hobler, being the Christian—as Castle Howard, for Howard Castle—Castle Blaney, for Blaney Castle, and so on, and so like. Pat is, no question, a counted fellow, full of odd conceits. Who but himself, for instance, would ever have set up such a thing as a race wherein the last should be the winner; every jockey to ride an adverse horse, and all, of course, straining for dear life to have his own behind. But save by grace of that sea which is second nature—a rowing match upon that most intellectual of rivers, even silver Thames, would be reputed as highly a more absurd contrivance—indeed more monstrously preposterous, there, than any where else. If the poor Red man had been discovered paddling his canoe in the liquid wilderness of the far Missouri, or Mississippi, putting with his face to the tail—it might have been urged in mitigation of the practice that his boat, like our first progenitor, had all the world (of waters) a-head where to choose its course.—We say, had an Ojibbeway, or even a Connaught Rodkandy been discovered in such exercise, there might have been some argument in abatement; but what shall be said of the London watermen? What, we earnestly inquire, would most probably be done to the cabman who should go off at score, with a fare through Fleet-street or Cheapside, driving with his behind before? "Without, however, our regard without the past annum, proved that Bull as a genus is nearer allied to the gull tribe than any liped without feathers. The private chemist of human nature who submitted their subjects to proof at Epsom, Doncaster, and other localities affording the fitting materials, must have been satisfied by the same results. "What's Dutch for No?" poor Power used to ask of the German Major, in "The White Horse of the Peppers." "Nein." "Nine is it? ouch then, eighteen must be Yes, because two negatives make an affirmative." The same logic helps us to account for the existing condition of the betting circles: out of the abundance of their cunning it comes to pass that not an individual with an ounce of prudence can be found in them. We are told that the evil of deficit among persons who bet on horse racing will presently cure itself—by its excess. The Kilkenny cats put an end to their respective tastes for jungle combat in the same way. In both cases might not the cure be rather than the disease? We will give an article, at no distant day, to a consideration of this problem.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The betting market continues in quite as depressed a condition as the railway market, and holds out very little prospect of improvement on this side Christmas. The transactions this afternoon were few in number, and of importance only as showing a disposition in three or four quarters to back Brocardo. We give the latest averages.

CRITICAL LIST.

500 to 10 against Warp, and 1000 to 15 each, in one bet, against Warp, Wolf Dog, Arrot, and Hope.
DERBY.

FOOT RACE AGAINST TIME.—The long-expected match made by Mr. Bragg, of the North Star inn, at Slough, with a sporting character at Windsor, to produce a man, within the present year, who would run eleven miles within an hour, came off on Thursday afternoon at Bedfont, between Staines and Hounslow. A number of persons from Windsor, Slough, and London, and the neighbouring towns, were present to witness the match. The person nominated by Mr. Bragg to perform this feat, was named Maxfield, known as "the North Star." The start took place between three and four o'clock, and he won the match, but with only seventeen seconds to spare.

POLICE.

THE MURDERS ON BOARD THE SHIP "TORY."—In our account of the examination of Captain Johnstone last week, at the Thames Police office, we stated that he would be re-examined on Tuesday. On that day, however, Mr. Broderip, the presiding magistrate, received a letter from Lieutenant Tracy, the Governor of the Westminster Bridewell, enclosing a certificate from Mr. Lavie, the surgeon of the gaol, which was to the following effect:—"I hereby certify that George Johnstone is not sufficiently recovered from his attack of erysipelas of the leg to enable him to attend his examination on Tuesday next.—JOHN LAVIE, Surgeon. House of correction for Westminster, Nov. 28, 1845."—The magistrate, after reading the certificate, addressed Inspector Evans, of the Thames Police, and said he should further remand the prisoner George Johnstone on the charge of wilful murder, from Tuesday, until Tuesday, the 2nd December. The inquiry, accordingly, stands adjourned until Tuesday afternoon next, at two o'clock; when, if the prisoner is sufficiently recovered, the investigation will be again proceeded with. In addition to three charges of murder, several cases of cutting and wounding the seamen will be gone into. The sailors have been directed to attend and give evidence against their former captain.

A CANDIDATE FOR TRANSPORTATION.—At QUEEN SQUARE Office, on Tuesday, John Belsted, a poor, miserable, attenuated being, was charged with felony. He had been observed on the previous evening, by the waiter at the Pine Apple, William street, Pimlico, carrying a quart pot partially concealed in a bag, and on being stopped the pot was found to belong to the proprietor of the Pine Apple, a respectable neighbour. It was further proved that he had been seen in possession of another pot a night or two previously. Prisoner, on being called upon to make his defence, said, "I am afraid I have not done enough." Mr. Bond: What answer have you to the charge?—Prisoner: I am afraid I have not done enough. I wish to be transported. I am starving. I have scarce a rag to cover me, and I've no food to eat. It is not true that I stole the pot. I found it in the street, and took it to get a little milk in; but I am tired of my existence, and pray transport me if you can. Mr. Bond committed him for a month. Prisoner: I am very much obliged to you even for that, but I was in hopes you would have done more.

THE ROBBERY AT THE BANKING HOUSE OF MESSRS. ROGERS AND CO.—On Tuesday, at the MANSION HOUSE, the Lord Mayor received from Mr. Hobler, the solicitor, that, twelve months having elapsed since the perpetration of the robbery at the banking-house of Messrs Rogers and Co., it would, no doubt, afford the public feeling to be satisfied of the nature and extent of the measures adopted to prevent the circulation of the stolen notes, and to cause the apprehension of the thieves. The plan of giving publicity to all the circumstances at the time, however, which, as the chief magistrate, would, in all probability, be productive of good, in impressing the necessity of keeping alive the inquiry amongst the police authorities of all the continental countries in which attempts to circulate the notes.—Mr. Hobler said the Lord Mayor had anticipated his wish in desiring to be informed of the steps taken to detect the plunderers, and it could not be necessary to enter minutely into the particulars. It was, he believed, twelve months since the monstrous robbery had been committed, but, up to the present moment, not the slightest clue existed which was likely to lead to the discovery of the perpetrators, nor had one of the notes been seen to issue from the clearance or been heard of anywhere, although some romantic accounts had occasionally sprung up, the offspring of the curiosity excited by the extraordinary circumstances. In order to prevent the stolen notes it is unnecessary to mention that the utmost activity and watchfulness had been exercised. Within twelve hours after the discovery of the very serious loss sustained by the firm, he dispatched his clerk to the principal cities and towns of France, Belgium, Holland, and Germany, to secure the vigilant co-operation of the British consuls and of the police in each country in furthering his detective measures, and he put himself in correspondence with every representative of the British Government, in every part of the world, upon the subject, on which he had been employed to act with instructions without limit or control. He rejoiced to say that the powerful aid he thus applied for had been most readily and cheerfully accorded. The expense attending the extensive means taken to circulate the information of the robbery, and to serve proper notices on all money changers and others who were likely to be resorted to for the negotiation of the notes, not to receive them, but to stop the parties by whom they might be offered, was of course large, but it was an object of inconsiderable magnitude in comparison with the anxiety to get hold of the parties implicated in the robbery.—The Lord Mayor said he had been given to understand that the General Steam Navigation Company had yielded prompt and efficacious assistance in conveying the published list of the stolen notes to the places to which they were directed.—Mr. Hobler said that no opportunity had been neglected in repeating the caution, for on the Continent as well as in Germany, when the Continent was inundated with English, a fresh supply of the lists of stolen notes, with cautions in different languages, was, by the zealous kindness of the directors of the General Steam Navigation Company, conveyed to different parts of the world for distribution. In England, Ireland, and Scotland, the most active measures had been pursued, the outports and principal towns having been well supplied from time to time with lists and cautions through the agency of the police, independently of the circulation of immense numbers through every Government office in the country, and the thousands which had been and were continually being supplied for by mercantile men and others in all descriptions. To these measures, and to unceasing vigilance in pursuing them, was it attributable that not one of the notes had got into circulation. Various other public bodies and companies had likewise expressed their readiness to assist in the matter. Every department of business had been applied to for co-operation, and the readiness to give aid had been universal; and it was most satisfactory to know that in nearly all the places above-mentioned the parcels of lists had been transmitted and conveyed to their destination without cost.—The Lord Mayor said it gave him great satisfaction to learn that such praiseworthy sympathy had been manifested by the parties applied to with the loss which Messrs. Rogers had sustained. He was convinced that the public, who had shown so much good feeling upon the occasion, would be glad to be informed that no effort was left untried to render the respectable firm upon whom so awful a robbery had been committed every service, and to mitigate the inconvenience which they must, for some time, have been necessarily exposed. His Lordship was of opinion that the publication of what had been stated by Mr. Hobler, who had acted with such skill and judgment in the whole of the distressing affair, would be the means of arousing the activity of the authorities originally appealed to. It was evident that the measures resorted to had produced a great effect upon the persons implicated in the robbery, for, as far as could be ascertained, not one of the bank notes had been seen, even amongst the stags in Bartholomew lane. It was, however, still indispensably necessary that the public should exercise the vigilance with which the proceedings of those who were engaged in the inquiry was marked from the commencement to the present time.

STRIPPING CHILDREN AND STEALING THEIR CLOTHES.—AT SOUTHWARK Police office, on Wednesday, Caroline Stephens, a well dressed young woman, was charged before Mr. Cottingham with stripping several children of their clothes, and leaving them exposed to the open air. There were seven charges preferred against the prisoner, three of which were selected. From the evidence it appeared that a few days ago a child, belonging to Mr. Donald Murray, residing in the vicinity of the Kent-road, left home for the purpose of going to school. On the way thither, the child was encountered by the prisoner, who induced her, by the promise of some sweetmeats, to accompany her for some distance. When the prisoner got the child into an unfrequented place, she proceeded to strip it of its clothes, in which situation it was found some time afterwards, and conveyed home almost in a state of nudity. On a subsequent occasion, the prisoner having ascertained the name of a little boy who was about to school by his parents, went there at the close of the day, and said she was sent to fetch him home. The truth of the prisoner's statement was not doubted, the child was given up to her, and on the way home she took it up a passage and soon divested it of its clothes, and then ran away. From the description given of the prisoner, she was soon afterwards taken into custody; and when told by the policeman the nature of the charges against her, she did not attempt a denial, her only expression being, "What must be, will be." Two pawnbrokers produced several articles of children's clothing, pledged by the prisoner, all of which were identified by the parents as having been taken from their persons. The prisoner, who concealed her face during the examination, and sobbed aloud, was committed.

CRUEL TREATMENT OF A BOY AT SEA.—At the THAMES Office, on Wednesday, Alexander Gordon, the master, and John Cummings, the chief mate, of the ship Methesis, from Brazil, now lying in the London Dock, were brought before Mr. Broderip, charged with assaulting William Scott, an apprentice, belonging to the same vessel, on the high seas.—Mr. Pelham defended the prisoners.—William Scott, a youth, sixteen years of age, stated that, on the outward voyage, the day after crossing the line, he was rather late in turning out of his berth, and the mate came down with the end of the fore bowline (a thick rope), and flogged him with it as hard as he was able. He was then driven down on deck, and went to work, with nothing on but his shirt, to tar the rigging down. The mate followed him up, and, while he was upon the foreyard, again beat him with the rope. After he had received three or four lashes, he ran further out on the yardarm, to save himself from the blows, and was followed by the mate, who continued striking at him. He then jumped off the yardarm, and made an attempt to catch the backstay, which he missed, and fell into the sea. The ship was going seven knots an hour; she was put about, and he was picked up in an exhausted insensible state. He had scarcely recovered his breath before the mate recommenced flogging him with the same rope. The captain then dragged him to the after part of the ship, and exhibited a heavy cat, and said that was made for him, and gave him a lash with it. The mate sent him up aloft to fill the foretopsail again, telling he had put on a dry shirt, and he accidentally dropped some of the tar on the top gallant sail, in consequence of the rolling of the ship. He was called by a boy to go to the wheel, and as he was going aft to do so, the mate seized him and made him fast to the mizen rigging, and after he had let down his clothes, and hauled his shirt over his head, the captain gave him two dozen lashes with the cat on his bare back. After he was released, and while his back was bleeding profusely, the captain ordered him to go on his bended knees, and implore his mercy. When he had done so, the mate seized him up to the mizen rigging a second time, and said he would give him another dozen. The captain, however, would not allow him to do so, but called one of the boys, who was ordered to give him a dozen lashes, and they were inflicted in the presence of the captain and mate. He was not ill-used any more that night, but on the following night the master said he intended to put some tarred rope yarn on his back, and pulled upon the mate to pour it over him, saying that he was afraid of burning his fingers. The mate said he was also afraid of burning his fingers, and ordered him to go down on his hands and knees. When he had done so he was stripped, and the mate poured a quantity of vitriol out of a phial over his back. The pain was excruciating, and he sung out for mercy. That night it was his watch on deck, and the mate compelled him to walk about on the poop with a handspike over each shoulder, and also made him count the number of tails of the cat, and how many knots there were. The cat had eight tails, and was very heavy. His back was sore and inflamed for some time, and he could not bear anything to touch it. In cross-examination by Mr. Pelham, the lad said the captain ordered him to return thanks to God for being saved from a watery grave, and when he was upon his knees, directly afterwards, the captain flogged him.—Joseph Morris, a seaman, who was discharged from the ship in South America, confirmed the evidence of Scott in every particular, and added that there were three overhand knots on each tail of the cat. The lad's back was dreadfully lacerated. He rubbed the vitriol off his back with a flannel, but the lad could not bear it to be touched, and shrieked aloud with pain. The boy was very badly used all the outward voyage by the master and mate.—Two lads belonging to the Methesis were also examined, and corroborated the whole of Scott's statement.—The prisoners, by the advice of their solicitor, said they should reserve their defence.—Mr. Broderip ordered the prisoners to find bail, each in their own recognisances of £200 and two good and sufficient sureties of £100 each, to appear and take their trials at the present session of the Central Criminal Court.

ACCIDENT AT THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—On Wednesday morning an accident of a very serious character happened at the works of the Houses of Parliament, in the early part of the morning, as two men named Patrick Edgin and Henry Lott were at work on some scaffolding at the Victoria Tower, nearly forty feet high, some part of it gave way, and they fell to the ground. Several of their fellow workmen went to their assistance, and both the men were found in a nearly insensible state. Without loss of time they were conveyed to the Westminster Hospital. Edgin is suffering from a severe concussion of the brain. Lott has one of his shoulders dislocated, and is otherwise much shaken. Notwithstanding the magnitude of the works at the new Houses of Parliament, an accident of this character has not lately happened.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD.—On Monday morning a fatal accident occurred on the Great Western Railroad, at the Abingdon road station, under the following circumstances:—A young woman, named Fanny Gosling, resiading at Oxford, started by the mail-train at half-past ten o'clock, to pay a visit to her mother at Clifton, which is a short distance from Abingdon-road station. On arriving at the latter place, instead of proceeding at once to Clifton, she attempted to cross the line for the purpose, it is supposed, of seeing some of her old acquaintance, who lived at the other side of the railroad, at the tavern. While she was standing on the platform, the mail train passed her; and, no doubt, thinking that the line was clear, she stepped on it, but the moment she put her foot on the second line of the rail, the fast down train, which she could not have seen previously, came in contact with her; she was knocked down by it and killed instantaneously; her feet were severed from her ancles, and her body otherwise much mutilated. Several persons witnessed the accident, and endeavoured, by calling out, to make her aware of the great danger she was in, but to no purpose; the poor woman seemed quite paralysed. The police officer on duty, at a great risk of his life, made an attempt to get hold of her, but before he could do this, the train had knocked her down. The unfortunate occurrence was purely accidental, and not the slightest blame attaches to the engineer, or any one else. An inquest was held at the Railway Hotel, Abingdon, on Monday evening, respecting the deceased Fanny Gosling, and the body was identified. The evidence confirmed the above account. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of one shilling.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE—THE AMATEURS.

We this week complete our Illustration of the recent amateur performance of Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour," at the St.

BRAINWORM, (MR. MARK LEMON.)

James's Theatre, with a pair of portraits—Mr. Mark Lemon's Brainworm, and Mr. H. Mayhew's Knowell. Both were meritorious performances; the former presenting much greater stage experience than the latter. We subjoin the entire cast of the play.

Ben Jonson wrote "Every Man in His Humour" for Henslow's theatre; not, however, in its present state, but with its scene laid in Italy. Jonson was still a bricklayer, or, as Dekker calls him, "the lime-and-water poet." In the play, as altered, the characters move in the localities of Ben's time; thus giving us so many glimpses of Elizabethan London. Master Stephen dwells at Hogsden, but he despises the "archers of Finsbury, and the citizens that come a-ducking to Islington ponds;" all traceable in the map of Elizabeth's time. The Old Jewry, and over the fields to Moorgate, are named; and Cob, the waterman, dwelt by the wall, at the bottom of Coleman-street. Captain Bobadil, too, was "a Paul's man."

In 1599, Henslow was, according to his records, lending Jonson 20s., 20s., and other small sums, in earnest of this play. Mr. Charles Knight, in his delightful paper, "Ben Jonson's London," mentions this fact; and, speaking of Ben's being at the same time a bricklayer and a poet, he well says: "Jonson had precisely the mind to prefer the honest labour of his hands to the fearful shifts and hateful duplicities to which the unhappy man of genius was in those days too often degraded."

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

If the reputation of this house suffered from the utter condemnation of "The Princess who was Changed into a Deer," it has retrieved its position by the success of the new ballet produced for the first time at Drury-Lane, on Monday evening. "The Devil to Pay" is another adaptation of the "Diable à Quatre," with which the play-going public have already become acquainted in its two forms, as the droll extravaganza at the Adelphi, and the elegant ballet at the Princess'. In spite of this double forestalment, the ballet was received with as much enthusiasm on Monday evening, as if nobody knew anything about its story or its "effects," and made a decided hit. For this good fortune, however, it was mainly indebted to the admirable dancing of Mdlle. Flora Fabbri a danseuse from the Académie Royale, who, without being heralded by any preceding puffs in the undertaking of the bills or paragraphs in the newspapers, created such a sudden and favourable impression, that the audience were, at times, quite frantic in their enthusiasm. It was to be perceived, after she had gone through a few more steps in her first pas, that she was an accomplished artiste, and, in a very short time, the whole house was in her favour. At times, her style reminded us of Cerito: a series of graceful steps, in which she fell on the point of the toe, elicited a round of applause only inferior to that which the "little realist of Naples" is accustomed to draw forth in her celebrated bounding dance in "Alma." The expression of her face was exceedingly pleasing and good-tempered; and her whole demeanour went a great way towards placing her at once on most friendly terms with the audience. This is a great point to be achieved with a dancer—one which Carlotta Grisi accomplishes to perfection, and to which a large portion of her success may be attributed.

Having so lately given the plot of "The Devil to Pay," which ballet here takes the name of the old farce, it is unnecessary to repeat it. The action is the same as that of the Princess' version, and the effects are managed in similar style, although some little advantage is gained by a larger stage, and a more extensive corps de ballet.

The ballet at the Oxford-street theatre is, however, by no means inferior to the one at Drury Lane. Mdlle. Petit Stephan re-appeared as the Countess, after an absence of some two or three seasons, and was very warmly received. Her performance was very expressive and judicious. A Mdlle. Dabas, from the Académie, also made her début, but did not achieve anything worthy of especial remark. She will, however, be found a useful addition to the ballet company. Mr. W. H. Payne was the tipsy basket-maker, which character he acted with all his drollery: indeed, everybody engaged in the representation of the ballet contributed, more or less, to its success. A few repetitions will make some of the corpphées keep better time, in several of the movements meant to be simultaneous.

In a word, the ballet was a "hit," and will draw capital half prices for some time; whilst Mr. Wallace's opera of "Maritana," which nightly increases in favour with the audience, will fill the theatre comfortably at an earlier portion of the evening. On Monday the house was crowded: we had some difficulty in finding a seat, even at the back of the upper circle.

FRENCH PLAYS.

Mr. Mitchell appears following the plan formerly pursued by Madame Vestris at the Olympic Theatre—that of serving up three or four light and sparkling vaudevilles, of that juste milieu, that we relish them without being in any way wearied. Thus, on Friday, we were treated with four one-act pieces; and all of them novelties to the habitués of this house. The first, called "Clementine," is a mere bagatelle, but very amusing. A young lady (Mdlle. A. Grave) has risen from a very inferior station by means of a large fortune bequeathed to her. She is engaged to a young roué (M. Ulric), who is continually reproaching her for postponing the day fixed for their union, especially as she cannot give any satisfactory explanation of the delay. Nor is his anger softened at discovering a young man (M. Mardeau) concealed in her chamber. He forces the stranger to write a recantation of the love he supposes him to bear to his own mistress; and on inspecting the handwriting, finds it similar to that of a note he had received from her. A serious misunderstanding takes place on both sides, when the lady in question enters, and, after some hesitation and confusion, explains the mystery. Never having learned to write, she had engaged a master, who had taught her privately; and as this clears up all the doubts of her lover, the various parties are made happy. To this succeeded "Le Marin; ou les Deux Ingenues." Two sisters (Mdles St. Marc and Leroux) are exerting all their respective fascinations to captivate a cousin of theirs (M. Lafont), who visits them. But one of the ladies is the destined bride of a certain sea Captain, whom the cousin constantly brings to their memory. They have never seen this sea Captain, and the cousin performs experiments on their relative dispositions towards him; and, after a few trials, he lets them into the secret that he himself is the naval officer, and he marries the elder sister, whom he finds the most eligible of the two. The piece was produced in London some years ago, when Mdlle. Jenny Coulon played the part now allotted to Mdlle. St. Marc.

Lafont, in the next piece, entitled "Père et Fils," performs alternately two characters—a rich old cattle dealer, and his spendthrift son. The principal interest of the piece is derived from the rapid change of dress, and transition from age to youth; and in a scene where he denounces his son, M. Lafont exhibited dramatic powers altogether different from those he ordinarily puts forth. The tender parental affection he exhibited towards a little girl, Clementine (Mdlle. St. Marc), who had been reduced to a menial station in life, and whom he discovers to be the daughter of his benefactor, was full of true feeling and pathos. This play is of more substance than any produced during the evening, and was more than ordinarily successful.

THE SCHOONER "ECHO," ST. KATHERINE'S DOCKS.

THE "ECHO" SLAVER.

This vessel, which has gained so much notoriety in connection with the murder of Midshipman Palmer by the Portuguese pirates, is now lying in the St. Katherine's Docks for sale. Since her capture, she has been sold and named The Elizabeth. She is not the rakish-looking craft we had been taught to expect; but, considering the purpose for which she has been engaged, is well calculated by her appearance to deceive as to her slave-dealing appropriation.

Since her arrival in the Docks, she has been an object of great interest and curiosity; more particularly from the circumstances which have occurred in connection with the sentence of the prisoners concerned in the late murder and piracy.

KNOWELL, (MR. H. MAYHEW.)

The night's performances finished with "Le Lansquenet." Two young men are invited to a student's ball, au troisième, and go by mistake to a sou'ds, au second—the disposition of the dwellings of Paris making this a not unlikely error. One of them (M. Ulric) there chances to meet a young lady (Mdlle. A Grave) with whom he has, on a late occasion, exchanged certain tender glances, and other incipient tokens of admiration and affection; whilst the other (M. Lafont) plays at cards, and, by good fortune, wins enormously. Among his victims is a young man, brother to the young lady who has so interested his friend, who has lost a large sum of money in the course of the evening, not his own, but intrusted to his care. At the ball, the lucky student is recognised by a Philanthropist (M. Curtigny), whose hobby it is to reclaim thieves and vagabonds, and who had recently found him paying a visit to his wife at the unseasonable hour of five in the morning, when the lady to avoid exposure denounced the intruder as a thief. The tale is readily believed by her husband, and the student humours him in it, also in the conditions imposed on him and his friend by the Philanthropist, in consideration of his not denouncing them as belonging to the fraternity of "light-fingered gentry," to which class he supposes them to belong. Meanwhile, a serious contretemps occurs. The young man intrusted with the money, is required to restore it to its owner; and matters seem hurrying to an unpleasant crisis, when the student intentionally loses, at Lansquenet, an amount of francs equal to that he had won from the young man. He thus saves him from disgrace, and the suit of his friend with the young lady is forwarded. After the usual éclaircissement, the laugh is turned against the Philanthropist; it being discovered that his confidential servant, who was taken from the galleys to be "reclaimed," has made off with all the coats, hats, &c., belonging to the guests. The intention of the piece would seem to be a hit at the system of gambling carried on in private society in Paris, and especially with respect to a game of cards which was all the rage in the salons last winter, from which the piece takes its name.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

GODSTOW NUNNERY.

This Nunnery was situate about two miles to the northward of Oxford, near the river Isis: only a small Chapel, with some of the outward walls, as exhibited in our Engraving, remains. The walls of the Chapel seem to have been formerly painted; and, we are told, there is a subterraneous passage from hence to Woodstock. It was about the latter end of King Henry I's reign that this Nunnery was instituted, at the instigation of Editha, or Ediva, a pious lady of Winchester, the widow of Sir William Lamelyne, she being ordered, in a vision, as the legend says, to found a religious house, where a light from Heaven should appear to direct her. The ground was given by John of St. John, Lord of Wolvereote and Stanton. Assisted by benefactions, Editha finished a Convent for Benedictine nuns, in 1133, which was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and St. John the Baptist. King Stephen, his Queen, Prince Eustace, and six Bishops, were present at the consecration, which ceremony was performed by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln: and great indulgences were granted by the Pope's Legate then in England, to the benefactors, and even to such as should visit the house on St. John the Baptist's day, or that of the Virgin Priest. Editha was Abbess here; her eldest daughter first, and her daughter Avis second prioress. The lands given were confirmed by grants of King Stephen, and of King Richard I, and the Institution flourished long after the reign of those Princes.

GODSTOW NUNNERY.

It is not doubted, however, that this Convent was both the residence and burial-place of Rosamond: and here masses were said for her soul, as well as that of her royal lover; the fund for which was established by King John. But we find that in the year 1191, Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln, going into the Church to pray, and seeing a tomb opposite the high altar lighted with a number of wax tapers, when he was told, on enquiry, that Rosamond was buried there, caused her remains to be removed to the chapter house. The history of Rosamond is thus recorded by Lord Lyttelton:—"When Henry arrived in England, in 1149, to dispute his title to the crown with Stephen, he proceeded as far as Carlisle, where he received the honour of Knighthood from his grand uncle, David, King of Scotland. Upon his return to meet his uncle, Robert, Earl of Gloucester, he happened to visit the Nunnery of Godstow, where he saw Rosamond, the daughter of Lord Clifford: she was not a Nun, but only boarded in the Convent to improve her mind, where she spent the remainder of her days in penitence. The fable of her being secreted in a bower near Woodstock, is merely the invention of the poet who wrote the song; and her being discovered by the Queen, is a lively picture of the jealousy of that Princess." On this piece of English history a long ballad of 48 verses has been founded.

MR. FARREN, AS "SIR SIMON SAGE."

LADIES' WATCH PROTECTOR.

This useful and elegant article of bijouterie has lately been registered by the inventors, Messrs. Dixon and Sons, of Hatton Garden. It has for its object the effectual security of a lady's watch while being worn. The invention takes the form of a beautiful brooch, by which the watch is fastened to the waist; it serves also as an ornamental piece of jewellery, which may be worn without the watch.

The inventors have already been honoured by her Majesty's command to manufacture a specimen of their elegant invention for her use. It is of the form represented in the Engraving. It is of the finest gold, beautifully engraved; encircled with the Garter, and emblazoned with the Star in brilliants; the whole surmounted by the Imperial Crown richly dight with diamonds. This chaste guard and brooch must be very costly; but its peculiar construction renders its loss next to impossible. It is, certainly, a beautiful work of art; and we are happy to record that her Majesty, with her accustomed and gracious liberality, has thus patronized the invention.

CONFLAGRATION OF THE CITY THEATRE, GLASGOW.

The river Clyde enters the city of Glasgow through a wide and verdant space called the "Green;" one end of which consists of the "Sant Market," which the Immortal Bailie Nicol Jarvie has rendered famous, far and wide. Upon this classic ground commences, on the 4th of July in every year, the largest, merriest, noisiest, and most densely thronged fair in Scotland. It would appear that this annual amusement is so much appreciated, that some of the showmen have found it answer to leave a sort of branch show behind, for the entertainment of the public all the year round; whilst the staff of their troop—either of actors, wild beasts, tame horses, or conjuring—pursue their travels as usual. In this way, the Salt Market has become the theatrical quarter of Glasgow. On it have been erected a wooden circus, the property of the well-known "Cooke," the bare announcement of whose "riders" brings crowds to his booth; a playhouse, also in wood, for the performance of the regular drama, called the Adelphi, belonging to one Miller—a modest little show; and lastly, an enormous brick temple, for the accommodation of the worshippers of singing, dancing, and conjuring, the property of Anderson, the celebrated Wizard of the North. This is the playhouse which was, early on Wednesday morning, the 19th of November, burnt down, and as completely destroyed as it is possible for the most destructive of elements to consume a building very slenderly constructed of bricks and wood.

At five minutes past twelve on Wednesday morning, flames were seen issuing from the roof behind, at its junction with the back wall, and in an inconceivably short space of time they spread over all parts of the building. The alarm was instantly conveyed to the police-office, and engines were at the scene of the conflagration with the utmost possible despatch. Although little more than ten minutes had elapsed from the first discovery of the fire, it had spread with such rapidity that a portion of the roof had already given way, and the remainder was yielding so fast to the progress of the flames, that all attempts to save the house from destruction were at once seen to be hopeless. Instead, therefore, of wasting their energies in a useless effort to save the City Theatre, the firemen directed all their force and skill to protect the Adelphi Theatre, in its immediate vicinity, from a similar fate. The wind was blowing rather strongly from the south, and the consequence was, that a constant shower of sparks and pieces of burning wood was thrown upon the roof and portico of the Adelphi, rendering its safety a matter of great doubt and uncertainty, especially as this erection is wholly composed of wood. A plentiful supply of water was, however, poured upon it, and the firemen mounting the roof dislodged the burning embers as fast as they fell upon any portion of the building likely to be ignited. This duty was for some time a very arduous one, but fortunately it was successful; no part of the Adelphi was permitted to catch fire, and the wind veering round a point to the eastward, sent the flames in a different direction, and saved it from all further risk. Meanwhile, the flames raged in the City Theatre with uncontrollable fury. In about half an hour after the commencement of the fire, the entire roof fell in, and the whole interior exhibited one blazing mass, which ever and anon shot in immense volumes far into the air, illuminating the whole city and surrounding country. The interior of the Theatre was of course composed of the most combustible materials; and as the doors and windows were soon destroyed, the openings thus made gave to the flames all the force and fury of a gigantic blast furnace, which reduced everything to ashes in a shorter period than those who did not witness the dreadful scene can well understand. The spectacle, though in itself a melancholy one, was full of sublimity and grandeur. Thousands of spectators were attracted to the spot. After raging for fully an hour and a half, and a quantity of water having been thrown in by the engines, the flames subsided, having consumed every article the Theatre contained; and the brick walls and portico alone remained, presenting a most desolate and dreary picture. The action of the fire upon the walls was so intense that they cracked in various places, and have since fallen. Nothing now remains but the ruins of two staircases, a portion of the wall nearest to the Clyde, and the four columns of the portico.

On Wednesday evening, the opposite wall fell down with a tremendous crash, at the time that Mr. Sheridan Knowles was performing in the adjoining theatre. The house was crowded, and the alarm was intense. The audience rushed towards the doors, but happily without serious accident. Mr. Knowles came forward, explained the cause, and all was quiet again.

With this, as with almost every great fire that occurs, no trace whatever of the origin of it can be obtained. We regard it as a most satisfactory consideration that the fire occurred after the performances of the evening were over, and the audience had taken their departure; for, although there might have been time for escape in the event of its having taken place an hour sooner, the alarm might have been productive of most fatal and disastrous results. As it is, there is still much to regret in addition to the destruction of the Theatre, although no one sustained the slightest personal injury. No fewer than one hundred persons will be deprived of employment, with the loss, too, of a large amount of their little properties, such as music, musical instruments, and dresses, none of which are insured. The Theatre, which has only been open about four months, is reported to have cost upwards of £7000; and Mr. Anderson estimates the loss of scenery, wardrobe, machinery, and properties at £3000, making in all a sum of about £10,000. To cover this loss he is insured to the extent of £5500 in the following offices:—In the Yorkshire £2000 on the building and £1000 on the scenery, wardrobe, &c.; in the Sun £1500, and in the Royal Exchange £2000. An iron safe which was placed in Mr. Anderson's own room, on the second floor, contained a number of valuable papers, including his insurance policies, the books of the Theatre, and upwards of £100 in bank notes, gold and silver. The safe was on Wednesday found in the lower part of the house, having descended with the floor on which it rested. It was taken out, but the whole of the papers and notes were reduced to ashes. From £40 to £50 in gold and silver was recovered completely blackened by the action of the fire.

We may observe, in conclusion, that however much we regret the loss which an ingenious performer and well-conducted man has sustained, yet a view of the ruins gave us the idea that it was a mercy the theatre was destroyed by fire without any loss of life; for that calamity has, in all probability, averted a much greater one. The extraordinary slenderness of the structure must suggest to every person who sees it, the possibility of a catastrophe similar to that of the Brunswick Theatre, in 1837. The greater part of the walls were exactly 16 inches, or one brick thick; the beams which supported the gallery, boxes, &c., were remarkably thin; and, in short, the whole edifice seemed, for its size, quite insecure. It was calculated to hold 3000 persons, and very far short of that number have, it would seem, been within its unstable walls, with no symptoms of danger occurring. Yet in the case of a tumult, or in the lapse of a short time, when decay began to operate, the worst was to be dreaded from an overcrowd in this extremely insecure structure.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

An adaptation of the French piece, "Les Petites Misères de la Vie Humaine, was produced at this theatre on Thursday night, under the title of "The Miseries of Human Life." The plot is of a slight nature, and the principal amusement of the play is sustained by Mr. Webster, in the character of an unfortunate man, whom everything and everybody seem to conspire in annoying. The whole course of social incidents happen to him mal depropos—new coats, made for a particular occasion, misfit, boots pinch, buttons come off, braces snap, while he is engaged in a delicate conversation with a lady; and, in fact, every moment he suffers new martyrdom, from a host of contretemps. The finale is the loss of his intended wife; an arrest for assault upon a cabman; and some dire stroke of ill-luck which is communicated to him by his servant (Mrs. Humby), which last is the climax to his misfortunes. He winds up with a tag appealing to the audience, and informing them that he has been deserted by his friends. Mr. Webster entered with through gusto into the part, and has the stage almost to himself during the whole of the piece. It is effectively written, though occasionally the accidents are too obviously foreseen. Thus the joke is sometimes forestalled, and when it comes out it is flat and insipid. Mrs. Humby and Mr. Tilbury contributed their respective capacities to the success of the piece, which was enthusiastically confirmed at the end, with the exception of a few solitary though sturdy hisses.

A new farce, founded on the railway mania, is announced for representation at this Theatre on Saturday next. Mr. Brinsley Knowles's new comedy maintains its position: we have engraved a scene from the fourth act, with Catherine Wilmot, (Mrs. Seymour); Percy Sage, (Mr. Huntley); and Mistress Sarah Wilmot, (Mrs. Glover); as well as a portrait of Sir Simon Sage, (Mr. W. Farren).

BURNING OF THE GLASGOW CITY THEATRE.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE PICTURE GALLERY AT TAMWORTH.—The splendid Gallery which was commenced at Drayton Manor some time since, for the reception of the large collection of paintings and other works of art, in the possession of Sir Robert Peel, is fast approaching towards completion. The architect is Mr. Scott, of Gosport.

LEEDS MEETING AT LEEDS.—ADDRESSES OF LORD MORPETH ON Tuesday evening a large meeting of the Free traders of Leeds and the neighbourhood was held in the Music Hall, to hear addresses from Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, in furtherance of the qualification movement, and "on the alarming aspect of public affairs, from the apprehended deficiency of the nation's food." The Mayor of the Borough (Mr. J. D. Lucock) presided, and, besides addresses from Mr Cobden and Mr Bright, speeches in favour of Free-trade were delivered by the Chairman, Mr. E. Baines, jun., Mr. Hamer Stansfeld, Mr. Flint, &c. The tone of the speeches was like those which have lately been delivered at meetings of the Anti Corn-law League, namely, congratulatory of the success which has already attended the cause of the Anti-Corn-law League, to put Free trade voters on the county registers; expressive of confident hope that the Corn-law will speedily be entirely abolished; and filled with strong recommendations to still use unabated efforts to place more Free traders on the list of county voters. The present Ministry were declared to be now "in a fix," and that there was every probability of the potato disease being the death of them. In the course of the evening a letter was read from Lord Morpeth, in which his lordship inclosed £5, concluding his letter thus:—"I wish to record, in the most emphatic way I can, my conviction that the time is come for a final repeal of the Corn-laws, and my protest against the continuance of the power of the State in the present emergency." Mr. Cobden remarked, that the £5, just sent by Lord Morpeth, was worth any £5000 that had previously been sent to the League; and he pointed out the adhesion of his lordship to the cause of Free-trade would strike terror into the hearts of the Ministry and the Corn-law monopolists.

ROCHAMPTON.—On Sunday morning last a sermon on behalf of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, was preached by the Rev. Dr. BLOOR, at Trinity Church, Roehampton; at the conclusion a highly satisfactory sum was collected. Since the opening of the present hospital, in 1842, nearly 4000 in and out door patients have been very successfully treated From a printed statement circulated, it appears that the western wing of the new hospital, at Brompton, will be ready for the reception and the removal of the patients from Chelsea, about Midsummer next.

FATAL CONFLICT WITH POACHERS IN SUSSEX.—Last Sunday night a desperate affray took place between poachers and the keepers of Sir Godfrey Webster, Bankfold estate, near Petworth, the property of Mr. Hasler, during which the head keeper, Denyer, shot one of the men, named Remnant, a desperate character, who is since dead.

IRELAND.

THE POTATO DISEASE.—The latest letters from the Irish provinces give a much less unfavourable report of the potato crop than any that have yet been received, admitting, however, that vast injury has been done; but stating the gratifying fact, already noticed in different localities, that the blight is appearing on the decay. From many faithworthy persons this intelligence has been communicated. There are other accounts of a totally different character, representing the disease as still exacting, whilst a general apprehension prevails for the safety of the remnant of the crop. Taken altogether, the accounts are much less unsatisfactory, and afford ground for hope that we have seen the worst.

ANOTHER FAILURE IN DUBLIN.—Considerable excitement was caused on Tuesday by the announcement of the suspension of payment by Messrs. Labertouche and Stafford, stock and share brokers, notaries, and West India merchants. This firm has had a very extensive business as share brokers, and probably had the largest transactions in the new railways, with one of which, the Dublin and Galway Company, they were connected It is quite impossible to obtain any accurate information as to the amount of the liabilities of the firm, but they are represented as considerable.

DEPLORABLE CALAMITY—SIXTEEN LIVES SACRIFICED.—(From the Freeman's Journal of Wednesday.)—At a late hour last night accounts reached Dublin of the occurrence of a calamity of the most deplorable nature, of which, in the course of the evening, the Royal Canal was the theatre, and by which the lives of very many of our fellow creatures were sacrificed. It is certain that sixteen are already dead! The night boat to Longford started on yesterday at the usual hour, two o'clock in the afternoon. There were eight passengers in the cabin, and, considerably upwards of twenty in the after cabin. Upon reaching the neighbourhood of Clonsilla, the steersmen went below to dine, and unhappily committed the rudder to a boy employed on board the boat. This boy, either knowing nothing of the proper mode of steering, or not attending to the serious duty committed to him, permitted the boat to run upon the bank of the canal, which caused her immediately to capsize, and speedily to fill with water. The fore cabin passengers were saved, as that portion of the boat lay almost out of the water, which is, of course, shallow at the bank; the unhappy after passengers plunged into the deepest portion of the canal, could not extricate themselves, and as no immediate assistance was at hand, many of them have perished in the waters.

MUNIFICENT GIFT TO GREENOCK.—The late Sir Gabriel Wood, whose demise took place in London a few days ago, has given in charge of appointed executors the princely sum of £60,000, to be expended in the erection and maintenance of a work in Greenock, for the reception of the aged, infirm, and disabled seamen of that port.

THE MARKETS

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—During the present week the arrivals of English wheat for our market have rather exceeded, and those of foreign fallen short of, the quantities for the corresponding day was small. MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK

From our City Correspondent.)

Considerable fluctuations have occurred during the week in the English Money Market, and the Foreign Exchanges, in consequence of the unfavourable position as regards America, and the state of monetary affairs here. The settling on Tuesday was all in favour of the Bears, and several fluctuations marked the day. Consols, for money, declined 5-64, being a depreciation of about ¼ per cent. Symptoms of improvement, however, were visible on Wednesday, and the Directors of the Bank of England separating on Thursday without any further advance in the rate being quoted for the bonds and coupons from 1842 at 95⅝, and from 1843 at 94⅜. The closing price of the Three per Cents is 97⅜. Dutch has been firm, and closes at 58⅜ for the Two-and-a Half per Cents, and 99⅜ for the Five per Cents. Brazilian is 80; and Belgian Four per Cents 95¾ Columbian is nominally 16⅜ to ⅝.

Notwithstanding the Consol Market has improved, and no increase was announced on Thursday in the price of the Bank stock, there is a large rate of discount, its beneficial influence has not extended itself to the Share Market. Every day attempts are made to effect sales, but purchasers are as scarce as formerly. Considerable anxiety is

THE NEWCASTLE BOAT RACE.

GREAT BOAT-RACE ON THE TYNE.

The great race between Henry Clasper, of Derwenthaugh, near Newcastle, and Pocock, of London, came off on Tuesday, on the River Tyne; the distance being five miles, from the Tyne-bridge to Lemmington-point, and the race for £100 aside. Betting on Monday night was in favour of Pocock, which changed on Tuesday morning, and, before starting, 5 to 4 on Clasper. There was a strong breeze from the north-west, which made the water rough, and was considered favourable to Clasper, who was, of course, well acquainted with every inch of the course, and knew how to take advantage of the sheltering headlands. The men started themselves, and, after a few strokes, Pocock got a slight lead, but soon resigned it to Clasper, who did the same in turn. Indeed, for the first 200 yards, the struggle was beautiful; the tiny skiffs battling with the waves, and the spray dashing over them, while each boatman exerted himself to gain a point over his adversary. After the first 200 yards, Clasper got a decided lead, being a full boat's length a-head, when Pocock went up inside and ran into him, and both became entangled for a few seconds; on getting clear, Pocock went away with the lead, which he maintained about a quarter of a mile, till, on reaching some posts in the river, a little above the shot-tower, Clasper came up inside and ran into him, being determined to pay him off in his own coin. Pocock's boat had, by this time, shipped a good deal of water. On getting loose, Clasper took the lead, and went away several lengths a-head, gradually improving his position; owing, no doubt, to Pocock's boat having become heavy and unmanageable from the quantity of water it contained. Pocock, in consequence, went ashore, and emptied his boat; meanwhile, Clasper left his opponent behind; and, when Pocock re-embarked, Clasper was more than half a mile a-head. This Pocock never recovered, so that Clasper had all the rest of the race to himself, and won easily by more than a quarter of a mile. Pocock's boat was open, Clasper's covered with stout canvass, which kept the water out. Clasper won the choice of sides, and selected the north or Newcastle side of the river. A great deal of money has changed hands on the event. The crowd assembled in various craft upon the river and on its banks was immense. The distance was rowed by Clasper in about 42 minutes.

FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

PARIS AND LONDON FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

At this season of the year there are no fixed rules for toilette, for the alternations of temperature cause perpetual variations in costume, while the prevailing gloominess of atmosphere is unfavourable for the display of the novelties already prepared for the winter's campaign. Many of our élégantes have, however, already begun to lay in a stock of winter apparel, and we may observe the prevalence of furs in every shape and form as characteristic, more or less, of all the selections they have made for out of door costume especially. In Paris mantelets and scarfs in ermine, zebeline, and sable, with sleeves and cuffs of the same fur, will be in the highest vogue, several of the Princesses of the Royal family having already adopted this style of covering; but it must be said that many of these mantles gives the fair wearers the air of denizens of the forest, rather than of the fairest and most refined inhabitants of one of the most polished of civilised countries. Nothing can be more becoming than fur, but in this, as in every other branch of costume, exaggeration completely reverses the effect intended to be produced. It had been predicted that ermine would lose much of its vogue this season; but this is far from the case, for it is employed in every possible form.

Amongst other eccentricities of the prevailing mania for furs, is the trimming the skirts of dresses with four or five rows of ermine or sable. As to the other forms of covering for out of door wear, the mantles called visites are much in vogue. They are made in velvet, and emerald green is one of the favourite colours. The Manteau Agnès is also much worn in Paris. It is quite disengaged from the figure behind, and forms into a species of corsage in front. This style of mantelet obviates the principal objections to the Pardessus and Polisse, which now happily exist but in the memory.

Small mantles in silk, simply gathered into a square piece on the shoulders, are still worn; they are made with a small collar, and are trimmed all round with a quilling of the same material en bouts, or with a slight fringe (effilé). For these mantles the favourite colours are deep blue, dark green, or violet; and they are admirably adapted for this season of the year en attendant the adoption of the full winter costume. The Grecian mantles, in velvet, very much hollowed out round the throat, with large sleeves, looped up with cordelières and tassels, and trimmed with gimp, garnet ribbon, or black lace, are also worn. One of the most general characteristics of the mantlets now in vogue is that they are rounded off from the front, in the same manner as the gentlemen's coats worn three or four years since.

As a sortie de salle nothing can be prettier than the new mantlet now adopted in Paris. It is made in violet or green velvet, or satin, in light colours, lined with white or pale-coloured satin, wadded and quilted. It is about three-quarters of a yard deep in the back, and is sloped off towards the front. It is made en bats, with seams down the back, on the shoulders, and under the arms, and is made in such a manner, that, though quite loose, it indicates the figure. Those in satin are trimmed with two rows of ribbon velvet, in the same colour, and rather wide; and those in velvet with two rows of a species of silk ferreting. There is no collar to this mantle, which, in Paris, is in great request, and has a charming effect.

The fashionable colours for bonnets are grey, stone colour, deep blue, and violet. Vêlones (simple by, bitharo, much more worn than plain velvet. The Pamela is now pronounced extinct; but it is replaced by numerous other forms, all of which, however, bear more or less affinity to it; and the most rebellious of our élégantes by degrees accustom themselves to a change which is undoubtedly advantageous to the face. They are made remarkably short at the ears, and when very open, the tour de tête, which consists of bows of ribbon, is detached from the side of the bonnet, and brought close to the face. Quilted satin, of a grey or stone colour, is much worn for bonnets. These are trimmed with large coques of satin ribbon, mixed with velvet and lined with pink, blue, or green satin.

For the promenade or for dinner parties, dresses of velvet, satin, or damask silk are much worn; while watered silk is becoming quite old fashioned and obsolete. Two flounces are still worn for silk dresses: they are made less wide than formerly. As trimmings, marasattes, or steel buttons cut to imitate them, are in the highest vogue. Buckles of steel are also used to confine bows of ribbon or velvet; but this description of ornament is too fanciful for a real élégante to adopt it.

There is as yet but little novelty for Evening dresses; the double shirts are not much worn, but the dresses are often looped up with flowers. Full bodies a la Grecque are in high favour. Gauze, embroidered in gold, will be a very favourite material for the large réunions of the coming season; at which it is expected that toilettes will assume a degree of brilliancy and magnificence greater than that of any preceding year. For a more unpretending description of evening costume, black lace will also be in great vogue.

As regards the head-dress of married ladies, the petits bords, under new titles, and with many varieties of form will still be much worn, for the Grecian toques in poncean velvet, embroidered in pearls and gold, are very elegant coiffures for evening wear. Another form of head-dress much admired by some of our belles is the toque Jamaïl, consisting of white gauze, embroidered in gold and silver, with broad lappets descending very low behind, and brought over the shoulders to the front, where they are kept in their places by a rich jewelled tassel. This form of toque, though somewhat fanciful, is extremely becoming.

We must not omit to mention an important change in the fashionable mode of dressing the hair amongst the Parisians, but one which we hope our fair countrywomen will not adopt without due deliberation, as it is far from generally becoming. The hair in front, instead of falling about the face in ringlets, or being braided low in the classic style, is caught up above the ears, and brought so much forward on the forehead as partly to conceal the eyebrow. This style of coiffure, which narrows the forehead and contracts the expression of the face, is, we hope, but a passing caprice of the Parisian belles, and will soon be abandoned. We subjoin the description of the plate, with which we this day present our readers.

A dress in brown Pekin, striped in velvet. A wadded emerald satin mantle richly embroidered, with gimp fastenings down the front of the mantle. A light silk bonnet with a single feather, and trimmed with broad lace to replace the veil.

A lavender satin dress with three broad flounces of black lace, each headed by three rows of narrow black velvet, the corsage trimmed in the same manner; tight sleeves, likewise trimmed at the wrist with black velvet, and edged with a row of deep lace, falling over the hand. A mantelet capuce in black velvet surrounded with fur. A bonnet in stone-coloured velvet, trimmed with narrow crossway folds of the same material, and a feather.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM, No. 96.

In this Problem Mr. Kling omitted the very obvious stipulation that White's Pawn is not to become a piece.

§ Q to K B's 4th would have been much better.

‖ Instead of this move, he should have played Q to K B's 5th (ch), which in all probability would have led to the following variation:—

23. Q to R 3's 5th (ch)	R to Q's 2nd—(If Q to her 2nd, White changes Queens, and then takes the B.)
26. K R to K's 6th	Q to her 4th.—(To guard the Q B P.)
27. Q to K B 4th, and must win easily.

¶ Threatening mate with his Q at her Kt's 8th.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Whatever may be the prospects of war, certain it is that no nation appears, at present, to have a perfect confidence in the continuation of peace. The uneasiness of feeling may be traced more in the acts of their Governments than their declarations. Suspicion of one's neighbours is always an unpleasant frame of mind to exhibit, and, as long as may be, is generally concealed. But the close observer can mark the preparations for the worst. The outward demeanour is that of courtesy—for there is a reluctance to give offence; but there is a slight degree of watchfulness too marked to co-exist with entire confidence. The eye of the Ruler, like that of Othello, after the hints of Iago, is worn "nor jealous, nor secure," and directed with a sharpness of observation which, a little increased, degenerates into mistrust.

Happy would it be for the world, had the time arrived in which it is foretold that "nation shall not rise up against nation; neither shall there be war any more." But that era has not yet come; we may not hope, even, that it is near; and as every generation must adapt itself to the present condition of things—utterly unable to anticipate the future—those who would fain have "peace in their time," are compelled to be prepared for an alternative they abhor, and provide the means of resisting that aggression which some, we know, are able to commit, and which others, there is reason to fear, are only too eager to begin. A peaceable disposition is no security against insult or oppression, while some nations are possessed by the ruffian spirit that recognises no limits to their will to do wrong, save the ability of others to check it by the strong hand. The civilisation of a state gives the weak of body a protection against the strongest, who might, otherwise, rob and maltreat his fellow with impunity; but the world has never been equally civilised everywhere, nor at the same time.

Some nation has always been pre-eminent, and aroused envy of her greatness, and as the extreme of civilisation is not favourable to the rougher and more martial virtues, the country that most requires attention to its means of defence, has often been found most deficient in them. The Romans, who conquered the world, degenerated at last into a worthless race, who sought safety from the purchased valour of mercenaries, and their empire fell beneath the irruption of barbarians. Strength to resist attack is one of the conditions of national existence, and will remain so as long as war must be regarded, however reluctantly, as possible.

And most reluctantly we are compelled to regard it as possible at the present time. It is not probable, perhaps; for as yet the rulers of the most influential nations are fully aware of the consequence of hostilities. But in France the popular mind is constrained to be peaceful against its natural tendency, rather than kept so it from a conviction of its wisdom, its morality, and its advantages. There the idea of national greatness is linked with a career of European conquest, like that it once pursued under Louis the Fourteenth, and again, and more fatally effective as an example, under Napoleon. Nothing could persuade the bulk of the French nation that such an increase of territory and expansion of power is not real prosperity, nor even remotely allied to it. They are ready to plunge into a war to-morrow with any people of Europe; and a war with England in particular would, we fear, be a popular measure in any ruler who should see in it a means of rising to power. Her immense military force, the greater portion of it always concentrated on her own territory, added to the aggressive disposition of her people, must always keep her nearest neighbours in a state of vigilance if not anxiety, especially when affairs look threatening from other quarters. If America should make an appeal to arms to decide the right to a large but barren territory, which neither party has as yet thought worth possessing, it will be less from any hope of contending with us successfully than with the probability of offering France an opportunity too tempting to be resisted of attacking her European rival; and that the opportunity would be readily seized we have little doubt.

It is the impression that while such feelings exist abroad, we cannot be perfectly quiescent, and at the same time secure, at home, which has produced the recent activity in preparations for defence. It appears that a portion of the militia is to be called out; the merchant steamers of the different private companies have been surveyed, to ascertain what is their capability of bearing an armament. The fortifications of our ports and arsenals have been inspected, old batteries are being repaired, new ones constructed, and improvements to be applied to them are now employing hundreds of men in our Dockyards; armed hulks are, it seems, to be moored off different points, to serve as floating batteries, and increase the strength of the coast against attack. All this implies that a terrible possibility has been at least contemplated.

We wish we could persuade ourselves that such measures of precaution were unnecessary. But there is no instance in past history of any nation who neglected the means of defence, or suffered them to fall into decay, either by wasting the public revenue, or forcing the people by oppressive government into weakness and degeneracy, that did not at last fall prostrate before the first invader. This may reconcile us to the necessity of measures which, to many abstract reasoners, may appear irrational. Arts, sciences, commerce, public liberties, social prosperity, all perish among an invaded people; and the more flourishing is the state of a nation, the more should it feel a readiness to defend the blessings it enjoys. But the will to do so is not enough; war—the scientific application of force—is not learned, and cannot be practised by intuition. The people of this country know not, except from tradition, what war is; the whole surface of Europe has been trodden down by hostile armies, while we only heard from a distance the fall of cities and the shock of hosts. Our insular position, and supremacy on the seas, preserved us from the actual presence of the destroying power, which was, and is, more felt in the pressure of taxation than in any other shape. Nothing more sad than human tears has bedewed our soil for centuries; of those we have had our portion; but the bloodshed and the havoc of war in our own borders have happily been spared us. But it would be imprudent to take it for granted, that what has not happened in such a lapse of time can never happen at all. The very facilities of intercourse that peace creates, are, like all human things, capable of being abused, and perverted to destructive purposes. Steam has reduced our strongest outwork, the Channel, to as little importance as a river was thirty years ago; and the new state of physical agents must be prepared for: there is no sort of reason to despond, though, in some, such preparations may excite alarm. Our naval superiority is as decided in steam power, as it was ere the construction of "those trim skiffs unknown of yore," which have worked such a revolution. Our efforts now, as then, must be directed to keeping the foot of the invader from our shore; for this purpose the present preparations are made: they are wise, for readiness to resist is the greatest preventive of aggression; but is it sincerely to be hoped they may never be required.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The great Donizetti, the composer, has appeared as defendant in a case brought against him by the great musical publishing house of Schonen berger. The maestro has been mulcted in many notes. It appears that Gaetano Donizetti sold to the above musical editor the copyright of the two first operas he should produce in France. These were "Polyeucte," a work in four acts, and the "Duc d'Alber," another opera of the same number of acts. The first opera, in spite of many excellences, had but little success and the performances were few and far between. But if "Polyeucte" was treated as a martyr, the "Duke of Alba" might be reared with enthusiasm and rejoice in a mighty popularity. It was upon the success of the "Duke" that M. Schonenberger counted upon his indemnification for the loss he had gained upon "Polyeucte." Depending on the fulfillment of the conventions, the musical editor entered into a treaty with Ricordi, of Milan, giving him the right of publishing, in Italy, the score of the "Duke of Alba," in exchange of the right, ceded to him by Ricordi, of publishing in France the opera of "Maria Padilla." Donizetti having thought proper to renounce the production at Paris of the "Duke of Alba," Schonenberger entered his action for the payment of the sums. The Tribunal pronounced judgment by default in favour of the plaintiff for 30,000 francs with full costs A verdict, I should think, little in harmony with the wishes of the popular maestro.

The interior of a French omnibus presents, in "little," a picture of Parisian life and manners, more real than can be found in any other place It is enough to add that, as elsewhere, at the theatres, in the public promenades, the ingenious and experienced thieves watch, and seek whom and what they may devour. The omnibus thief belongs to the category of light infantry: most frequently this industry is exercised by females, who, to dissimulate their intentions, have a thousand pretexts at command either it is pretended you are sitting upon a corner of their shawls, and which they politely seek to disengage; or it is a rude neighbour, from whose bold attentions they seek, with a bashful sentiment, to retire, and they modestly press near to you to escape the presumed insult. These little coquetries generally succeed, and it is but then when the trafet is consummated to explain to the end that you are minus handkerchief, snuff box, or purse. A whole posse, myself amongst the number, complained on Monday to the magistrates of the losses they had experienced in a particular conveyance, on the previous day; for I should have mentioned, that the presumed "picker-up of unconsidered trifles," was a very pretty young girl, aged, at most, eighteen years. It appeared, from evidence adduced that the young lady, at the early age of fourteen, had been condemned for a theft to four years' imprisonment upon this occasion, however, there was no positive proof, and none of the missing property found on her person. She is so accomplished an artiste as not to be discovered in flagrante delicto; several conductors recognised her as a general customer, and they had remarked, that at the end of each trip complaints and explanations took place on the part of the other fares. One of the conductors remembered, among other incidents, that upon one occasion, the young lady's delicate hand was discovered in the pocket of a gentleman's pelisse, when about to give her in charge, she supplicated his mercy, with tears in her eyes, not to destroy her, as she was the young mother of a beautiful child, for whose sustenance she had been, for the first time, tempted to commit a larceny. A search, however, instantly made at the lodging of Mdlle. Mathias, and there was discovered a perfect museum of purses, of all forms and materials, snuff-boxes, and eye glasses. Miss Liza Mathias was condemned to two years' imprisonment; my note book and purse were, however, non est inventus.

In fashions, there is nothing new that I can send for the enlightenment of your fair readers. Fashion has but two positive seasons—winter an summer. She has, to be sure, certain monthly caprices; but these appear not in the official gazettes. But all the leading modistes are in full preparation, and the fickle goddess will make her instant advent in the most marked and most enticing forms; but the modes of the "middle ages," it is supposed, will be in the ascendant. Caroline tells me that she has already been honoured with a private view of Mdlle. Taglioni's dress, and it is La Valentine de Milan. Many young and beautiful women have adopted a sort of veil called "Mante à Lavallière"—for that it recalls that of the poor Louise, in which she enveloped herself when she quitted the Royal residence, to enter the depths of the cloister. Our pretty Parisiennes, with their rebellious eyes and coquettish smiles, but little resemble the melancholy and repentant Lavallière, and cannot assume the sombre vestment of dark cloth, trimmed with black velvet, which gives to the ladies of fashion the aspect of Carmelites. Bonnets and hats are now the objects of important deliberations. The first authorities of Paris have remained the dissentients raised on the subject of the "Pamela" form; these have been proclaimed as the most beautiful, and thewmost graceful. Yet, to content many dissentients, another inventor has suggested it. The Clarissa Harlowe has been created—so that our immortal Richardson has gained a large glory and, as the inauguration of statues are all the mode, I have little doubt that we shall have his, in marble, bronze, or plaster, elevated in the Rue St. Honoré. Madame L—— has two busts of the novelist, already, in her principal show room.

The rain has been unceasing, and the mud is above ankle deep.

FRANCE.

There is nothing of striking importance in the French papers this week. Ibrahim Pacha arrived at Toulon on the 26th ult. from Genoa. His Royal Highness was received with all the honours due to his rank. All the men of war in the harbour, and the different ports, fired salutes and hoisted their flags. On landing his Royal Highness was conducted to the hotel of the Prefet—the road being lined with a double row of infantry. On descending from the boat, he was received by Admiral Bauden, the maritime prefect, the Major-General of the Marine, and all the military and civil authorities. It was the intention of Ibrahim Pacha to remain two or three days at Toulon, and then depart for Marseilles. His Royal Highness looked very well. The suite of the Prince is composed of 25 persons. Preparations had been made at Marseilles to render the stay of the Prince as agreeable as possible.

The Moniteur contains an account of the ceremonial of laying the first stone of the hotel destined to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. M. Guizot and M. Dumon, Ministers of Public Works, said the first stone of the intended building on Saturday. His Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in a short speech, congratulated the assembly that another monument was about to be added to those which had already rendered Paris the wonder of the civilised world. The building, which is to be called the Chamber of Deputies, will be completed for occupation in four years, according to the estimate of the architect.

The Gazette des Tribunaux states that the First Chamber of the Civil Tribunal of the Seine has pronounced judgment in the case of the executors of the Marquis of Hertford against Nicholas Sussse, valet to the late Marquis, declaring the demand of the executors for the restitution of coupons of interest on French securities to the value of 121,000f. not proved, and condemning the plaintiffs to pay all the costs

The Journal des Travaux Publics says, that all the companies intend ing to bid for the Paris and Lyons Railroad will unite, and that the contract will be definitively signed in a few days.

It appears that the affairs of M. Falcon, the Stockbroker, whose failure has been already announced, have been arranged by a payment to his creditors of 40 per cent. on his debts.

The Journal des Débats states, that the Academy of Fine Arts proceeded on Saturday last to nominate an Academician to replace Count de Vaublanc, deceased. The candidates were M. de Cailleux and the Prince de la Moskowa. M. de Cailleux was elected by a majority of 32 votes.

Most of the Paris papers join in the assertion that an expedition to Madagascar has been determined on. It is to consist of the frigates La Gloire, L'Amide, La Reine Blanche, La Belle Poule, and La Fegolte. At the head of this force at Bourbon, Captain Romain Desfossés, the commandant of the station there, is to assume the command of the expedition. The frigate will take in a number of marines, a quantity of additional artillery, and some companies of engineers.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA.

The Bombay Mail, of the 1st of November, reached London yesterday (Friday), by express. Matters in the Punjaub were still in a state of derangement. The Rance or Queen Mother continues to be the nominal head of the Government; but she had, on the assassination of her minister, wisely pressed her willingness to retire, and even to take her son, the boy-king Dhuleep Singh into obscurity, provided that a suitable jaghier were secured to them both. A fearful fire had lately occurred in Calcutta on the first night of the Dewalee (Lamp Festival) of the natives. It had its origin from some fireworks in a shop where a quantity of powder was stored. Having destroyed near 200 houses of various descriptions, it was stopped by the energetic activity of the Europeans. Fifteen persons lost their lives. Bombay escaped a terrible calamity, for about 4000 lb. of powder were removed from the houses on fire. If that powder had blown up the consequences would have been appalling, thousands would have been killed.

The Governor General, Sir Henry Hardinge, reached Agra on the morning of the 30th of October, having travelled with great speed from Cawnpore. He was to leave that station on the 28th, and to proceed to Delhi, where would meet the Commander-in-Chief.

CHINA.

The latest news from China extended to the 30th of September; but it contained nothing of importance. Trade was dull, except at Shanghai.

The Governor of Hong Hong was not popular, because he had also attempted to levy taxes on the inhabitants, who had protested against his right to do so.

The expedition which had proceeded to chastise the pirates on the coast of Borneo, at Malaodon, on the north coast of Borneo, had destroyed the town, and returned to Hong-Kong. The treaty for the cession of Laboan had been ratified.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Medway steamer arrived at Southampton on Thursday evening with the West India mail. She brought home his Excellency Sir Charles and Lady Mary Fitzroy, Mark Kerr, and about thirty passengers; carried 33,304 dollars on Mexican Government account, 285,305 dollars on merchants' account, 1589 ounces of gold dust, 2657 ounces of silver, and 142 serons of cochineal.

The West Indian papers contain very little of interest. The islands were all healthy, and had not been visited with hurricanes this season. The crops were generally looking favourable. The papers are still fully occupied with the discussion of railways in the islands and immigration, both popular subjects with the colonists. An influential meeting of the parish of St Mary had been held on the latter subject, and petitions unanimously carried, praying the House of Assembly to offer every encouragement to immigration on an extended and efficient scale.

IRELAND.

MYSTERIOUS MURDER AT ENNISKILLEN.—A very shocking murder—happily, however, unconnected with the agrarian system—has just come to light in the vicinity of Enniskillen. On Wednesday week, a Miss Irvine, sister to the Clerk of the Crown for the County of Fermanagh, was found dead under the feet of her horse, in the stable attached to her house, which stands almost in the suburbs of Enniskillen. She was covered with wounds and bruises, particularly on the head; one of her arms was broken, and the hand of it very much damaged. It was supposed that Miss Irvine, who, though an elderly lady, was of very active habits, had, upon this occasion, gone to fetch some grain from the loft over the stable, where they are usually stored, and that in her descent, either the step-ladder had slipped, or that she had fallen from it under the horse's feet, and had thus been kicked and trampled to death. The death was considered accidental, and the body was buried without an inquest. Things remained in this state until late on Friday evening, when a lad, about 16 or 17 years of age, who had been recently taken into Miss Irvine's service, came forward, and gave such information as induced the magistrates to arrest the woman servant who lived with Miss Irvine at the time of her death. This woman had been reared by her mistress from her childhood, and her suspicion had previously attached itself to her; nor, indeed, to anybody else. The body was exhumed, and an inquest was held. Two physicians—Doctors Ovenden and Nixon deposed, "We understand that the injuries of which the lady died were not such as could have been produced by the hoofs of a horse, and that some at least of them were inflicted by a sharp instrument, such as a hatchet or cleaver" (of the latter there had been one in the house with the servant now in custody). The boy deposed that a few evenings previous to the murder, his fellow servant had said to him—"Now, if some stranger should come and murder the mistress, who would become of us?" He also stated that on the day of the murder, this woman had sent him out of the way, on the pretext of fetching her an apron, and other articles of clothing, from some distant place, and that on his return she would not admit him by the shortest and most usual entrance, but sent him round. On her opening the door for him he saw blood upon her hands, but supposing she had been killing a turkey, he took no further notice of it. The woman said nothing about the murder, and he went about his business, until having occasion to go into the stable, he saw blood, upon which water had been thrown, flowing from under the stable door, and on entering it he found his mistress dead, as described. The woman and the lad are, of course, both held in custody until the result of the inquest shall be known. The motive to this horrid deed is not yet ascertained. Some impute it to the desire of robbery, as the old lady was rich, and the woman has been observed to have more money than usual about her. Others think it arose from resentment and revenge.

POLICE.

THE MURDER AT NEWINGTON.—COMMITTAL OF THE PRISONER.

On Saturday last, Samuel Quennell was charged at LAMBETH Office with the murder of Daniel Fitzgerald. The evidence consisted of a recapitulation of the circumstances of the murder as they are given in another part of our paper. The prisoner was remanded until Monday.

On that day he was again examined.

W. Quennell, Kennington-lane, deposed that he is half brother to the prisoner by the same father. Prisoner is twenty-two; witness is thirty-nine years of age. Prisoner was in his employment as a bagman. Knew Daniel Fitzgerald, the deceased, who was also in his employment, up to his death in September. Prisoner was familiar with about five months ago, and he discharged the prisoner. He worked on witness's premises last Wednesday week. Witness told him last Saturday week, at night, on paying him his wages, that he must look out for work somewhere else, as he should be slack. This he told prisoner on Wednesday previously. On Saturday he added as a reason what Fitzgerald had told him. Witness's wife first began, "Samuel," what have you to say to what you told me, that you had spoken to him, after he had been so kind to you?" Prisoner said, "I don't know I have been saying anything wrong." "What you have been saying to Dan, that you had a good place and give your brother a good character and if you got money, you meant to set up in business against him, and go round to his customers." Prisoner said, he had said some things, but Dan had told more than what he had said, and that it was through Fitzgerald that he had said what he did say. That Fitzgerald had tried to get him to say things against witness. It was all Fitzgerald's fault. A person came in at this point of the conversation to pay witness an account, and stopped its progress, when prisoner went out. Prisoner gave no reason for Fitzgerald's doing this. His manner of saying this was his usual manner, sullen and distant. Witness never heard him speak against Fitzgerald. To the best of witness's knowledge, prisoner and Fitzgerald were always on the best of terms. Before the Saturday witness heard of these words from Fitzgerald, but had said nothing of it, lest it should create jealousy between them. Witness's wife, seeing some difference between witness and prisoner, asked Fitzgerald what the reason was, and thus came to know and to speak of it. After Wednesday prisoner did not speak to witness. The conversation happened on the Saturday following. Witness saw prisoner on Sunday morning, near the Ship public house, but had no conversation with him since the conversation in question. He saw him in the street. Witness is not aware whether prisoner ever after came to his yard. Prisoner lives in Frederick-street, which is near Peacock street. One might go from Kennington lane to Frederick-street, through Peacock street. Five o'clock is the proper hour for leaving off since last Saturday week. Witness believes prisoner knew this. Twelve o'clock is the dinner-hour. Had not seen the prisoner since Saturday week, when he left witness's employment seven or eight years, and the prisoner for five months. Had observed prisoner and Fitzgerald, and thought them too familiar. Had not seen his brother lurking about the premises. By "sullen," witness means a disagreeable manner of answering.

Mrs. Quennell (wife of the last witness): Recollects Saturday week, and the prisoner coming to her husband all [illegible] Had not heard what he told him how he could be so unkind as to speak so to Fitzgerald about his master? In the morning Fitzgerald told her, that at the building where prisoner was at work, prisoner had told him that he had urged Dan on to it. Fitzgerald had said to the prisoner he knew Quennell better than he (prisoner) did. Mrs. Quennell added, "That was no excuse for you; you (prisoner) ought to have come and told us what Fitzgerald had been saying." Witness thought she saw tears in prisoner's eyes that evening; he appeared much hurt. Thinks Fitzgerald and prisoner were on good terms; both were much together about a fortnight before, when deceased hurt himself so as to be off work about a fortnight. Witness did not see prisoner after that. Mrs. Quennell expected him up on Monday. She had seen Fitzgerald afterwards On Tuesday she asked whether Fitzgerald had seen prisoner? He said "No."

By Mr. GAMES: She knows prisoner knew where Fitzgerald lived.

Mrs. Quennell was re-called. She certainly did not know of any quarrel, or intimation of intention to quarrel, by either party. Witness has been at prisoner's lodgings. Never knew prisoner had a pistol, but has never been into prisoner's room [illegible] Does not know whether prisoner and deceased had seen each [illegible] before the occurrence. Witness, as he went to dinner, saw prisoner opposite to the public house, and there he spoke to Fitzgerald who was there. Witness was not near prisoner. Prisoner was in the road before the Horse and Groom, with his face towards Kennington-lane.

James Parker: Has never seen the prisoner before. Never but once before, and that was Saturday night week, nearly about eight o'clock, at Mrs. Tubbs's, in the New-cut. Her shop is a general sale shop Prisoner came up to the shop front, and handled a pistol, which was hanging at the top door. Witness was then in the shop. Prisoner turned it round and examined it; he then pulled the trigger and broke the hammer. This called witness's attention to the prisoner, for he thought it a bad thing for his family, it being Saturday night. Witness heard the shopman say it was a bad job, but he must pay for it. Something passed between prisoner and the shopman after that, but it was not heard. Witness recognised the shopman in court. After some words between the shopman and prisoner, [illegible] went a little way from the shop door, but returned, and both came into the shop. He bought the pistol, and paid 2s. for the accident, and 3s. for the pistol, adding, "I did intend buying one, but not to night." After this, having put the pistol into his pocket, prisoner took up an accordion. The pistol bought was one of a kind the same as that in court. He tuned the accordion, and smiled when asked to buy it, and laid it down and went out. Witness never saw him after. He kept his eyes closely upon prisoner all the time, and is certain he is the same person. It quite sure. Prisoner wore a cap at the time, but does not know what kind of cap.

By Mr. GAMES: Witness did see 3s. paid; it was paid outside the shop. Is quite sure it was 3s.

By the Magistrate: Knows the whole amount was 7s.

W. Welling, ollman, Walworth road: He had seen prisoner before more than once. Is acquainted with him six months. He is a labourer. Knows the prisoner. Saw him first on Thursday evening at the top of Peacock street, near the Peacock, about a quarter past five o'clock. She was close by when the pistol went off. Before that she saw two men, and said to her companions (little girls) she would not go that way; she saw something white, that was the men in white clothes. Witness had scarcely said so when the pistol was fired. Witness was conversing with his back against Mrs. Brent's door, and saw a man, whom she knows now was Fitzgerald; he was standing in Peacock-street. The pistol was fired immediately after. Prisoner came up Peacock-street, and passed witness, and knocked against her, nearly knocking her down. Prisoner was walking then up Peacock-street. Witness then saw Fitzgerald near Mrs. Brent's, and saw Mrs. Brent lift the door mat. Witness is not sure that it was the prisoner who leaned against Mrs Brent's door. She is sure it was prisoner who passed her; she looked up into his face. Prisoner began to run when he got up to the jumper bridge. Witness is certain of the prisoner. Has no doubt he is the same who passed her.

On this evidence the magistrate committed the prisoner to take his trial at the sessions.

THE ALLEGED MURDERS ON BOARD THE SHIP "TORY."
RE-EXAMINATION OF CAPTAIN JOHNSTONE.

On Tuesday, the adjourned examination of George Johnstone, the captain of the ship Tory, on the charge of murdering William Reason, chief mate, William Mars, second mate, and Thomas Reason, seaman, took place before Mr. Broderip, at the THAMES Police-court.

The front part of the Court-house, where, on the previous occasion, was besieged by at least 300 persons, anxious to be admitted, and loud and general were the feelings of execration and disgust expressed by the crowd against the prisoner.

Julian Cardiavallo, an Italian, was first examined, and deposed as follows: I will state what I know of the death of William Reason. I do not know exactly the day on which he died, but I was in the cabin at the time. At the time I was in the cabin Thomas Reason was called, and he came in and sat down on the sofa. The captain then seized him by the collar of the shirt, as I asked him some questions about the mutiny. Before this time Reason had been hurt, and was taking physic to cure the cuts which the captain had given him. The captain having shook Reason a great deal, put him into a corner on the larboard side, and said to the boy, "Bring the bayonet, the sword is not good for anything" The boy gave the captain the bayonet. At this time Reason was very quiet. The captain struck in the way which occasioned his death: I saw the way in which it was done. The captain lifted his arm and struck Reason with the bayonet. I think the blow was on the breast I called the cook directly; I then cut the flannel on Reason to see if there was a hole, and a small hole was there which was bleeding. While I was doing so the captain said to Reason, "To for God's sake speak a couple of words." The captain then threw the bayonet on the floor. Reason died, as far as I can think, about a quarter of an hour after. I cannot exactly say. The body was taken on deck, but I could not see exactly whether he was dead or not at that moment

William Dunn was next examined: I was cook on board the Tory. I was down in the cabin one day when Thomas Reason was called, but I do not recollect the date. It was about a quarter past twelve. I saw the captain with a bayonet in his hand over Reason. I saw as if the captain was strik ing the bayonet constantly into Reason's breast. Reason called for mercy. The captain said he should have none from him. The boy Glover came to me in the pantry, and told me that the captain had killed Reason. I got some cotton, and saw Reason lying on the floor. The captain had his hand on Reason's left breast. The captain then told me that Reason was dead. The captain took his hand off Reason's left breast, on which I saw two wounds the bayonet just below the left nipple. I told the captain he had better get some lint to stop the wounds, on which he called the boy Glover, and told him to fetch some cotton. The boy did so, and I then placed on the wounds. Reason was then taken on deck saw the captain continually heaving a sword at Mars while he was at dinner. I went down into the cabin, and Mars was groaning and bleeding. I saw the captain repeatedly heave the sword at the dying man. The sword frequently rattled against the cabin door, against which Mars was standing. The captain said he would cut him up in inches. The cabin-door was opened, and I saw Mars with his head on one side, dying. The captain ordered the hands to get a rope and haul Mars on deck and squeeze him, and when they did not he would have their lives. Mars was taken to the main hatchway, and a strand was put round his body, but whether the men hove upon it I cannot say. He asked for a drink of water, and the captain made use of a worm came up out of his throat. I went down into the cabin again, and shortly afterwards a man came into the cabin and told the captain he was dead. The body was soon after overboard, and taken to the gangway. I read the prayers over him, and he was buried.

Stephen Cone, an able seaman, with wounds on his person, who had been grievously wounded by the prisoner, was then next written. His evidence was short, but expressive. He said I was in the cabin before the death of Mars. I saw the captain make one cut at his head with a sword, and he took off a piece that size, your honour. (The witness placed one hand on the other, denoting that the prisoner cut a piece off the head of Mars half the size of his hand.)

Mr. Broderip: Did you see the prisoner do that?—Cone. I did, sir; he cut a piece right off his head, and he then stabbed him on different parts of the body.

Thomas Gair, a seaman, whose case has excited so much commiseration, next appeared in the witness-box. This poor fellow, it will be recollected, was mutinsted in a shocking manner by the prisoner, and pistols, loaded with powder, were discharged in his face by the captain's own orders, so that he was much disfigured by gunpowder, and his forehead and cheeks were covered with adhesive plasters. The much-injured man was asked only a few questions, and stated that he was cut by the captain, and that he saw him wound Mars while he was in irons.

Mr. James Christopher Evans, jun., an Inspector of Thames Police, stated that he went on board the Tory on the 11th of last month, with the Inspector Isbester and other officers. The ship had just arrived off the West India Dock entrance, with a cargo of tea. He saw the prisoner in the cabin, and he represented himself to be the commander of the ship. He told him who he was, and said he understood there were men in confinement, whom he wished to give in charge for mutiny. The prisoner said, "Yes, I have." He asked them how many there were, and the prisoner replied, "Only one, and whose of them." He observed to him that he understood there were only 10, and the prisoner said "all hands were, more or less, concerned in mutiny, and he wished the whole of them to be taken." He went upon the quarter-deck, and from there to the half-deck, and saw 12 men, who were pointed out by the officer of the Coast Guard service, who took charge of the ship at Deal. The men were all lying down in various directions. He then went forward to the topgallant-forecastle, where he saw four more men. He had them all brought on deck and released them from their irons. He called the prisoner on deck and asked him if he gave charge of the men. He said he did. He asked him what he charged them with, and he replied, "piracy and murder." He took charge of the men, and brought them all to the station-house, where the prisoner attended and charged his crew with piracy and murder on the high seas, and signed the charge sheet. Several men were in a very bad state, some had their faces disfigured with gunpowder, others had received sword cuts, and a few had a good deal of clotted blood about them. One man's ear was cut in two, and was hanging down. Another man, named Morris, who was also given into custody, had received a pistol shot wound in the leg. That man was at present a patient in the Dreadnought, hospital ship. He examined the cabin of the Tory, on the larboard quarter, and saw a great many deep cuts about the partitions and beams. Such cuts would be produced by a cutlass. On the 12th of November he took the prisoner into custody, and upon reading the station house told him he was charged with the murder of Mars and Reason. The prisoner said, "I deny it." The prisoner was about to say something else, when he informed him that what he did say he should have to repeat before a magistrate in evidence against him. The prisoner then said "I did not kill Mars. I struck him; but I did not murder him."

An adjournment now took place

The examination was resumed on Wednesday. Thomas Spence and Stephen Cone were the first two witnesses. Their evidence related to the death of Rambert, and did not disclose any new fact of importance.

Mary Blewitt was next called, and said—I reside at No. 23, Albany-street. I was a passenger on board the ship Tory. I remember three of the men being in irons, in some part of the rigging. I was in the cabin, and the cabin passenger, for the first fortnight. I saw Edwards in the half-deck, a little more forward, but not left of the poop. On the 25th of September, I believe, about three or four o'clock, I heard Captain Johnstone demand that the men be found, and brought, wherever he was, to him. Barry Yelverton was the one who found him, and brought him to the captain. I was then looking on, of which Captain Johnstone was not aware. He had a pistol in his left hand, and a cutlass in the other. I believe the pistol was loaded, for Captain Johnstone always ordered them to bring his pistol loaded. The captain struck Rambert right and left—on the head first, and afterwards on the body. Rambert had no arms, but his hands were free. During the time Captain Johnstone was striking him, he begged for mercy to spare him. Captain Johnstone replied, "Oh, you overgrown monstery you must die now!" and with that he cut him with his cutlass. Rambert said, "Ask the sailors, Captain Johnstone, if I ever said a word against you;" on which the captain seemed to get more enraged, and struck at him more furiously than he did the time before. "Go on your knees," he said; which Rambert did, and then, after calling him an "overgrown monster," he struck him severely with the cutlass. "Rambert exclaimed, "Oh, my God! I am killed! I am killed!" With that he dropped on one side, and said, "Oh!" when Captain Johnstone sent for the irons. After that the carpenter came and put the irons on the quarter-deck, on the half-deck, and forward. Rambert bleeding very much at the time in question. Rambert asked the boy Nash to tie his head up. The boy said he had nothing. During that time, I believe, the captain retired into his cabin for refreshments. Captain Johnstone had not made many minutes delay when he came up again, and went up into the mizen-mast-top, where the man, Stephen Cone, was in irons. He called Cone up to him on the quarter-deck, and violent that I heard the blows from where I had been looking on. I could not see what the captain struck with, only that he went up with a cutlass in his hand. With that I heard cut, "My God, my God! if that is Stephen Cone, he will kill him." I said this to Mrs. Thompson. That was the first time I spoke while the captain had been striking Rambert. With that Rambert heard my voice, and said, "Mrs. Blewitt, I am dying; give me a handkerchief to tie my head up, I am bleeding to death." I replied, "I am in that state I am not fit to move. I am so exhausted and faint." With this Rambert said, "He is coming down again, he will kill me. O, my God! O, my God." To that I made no reply. As Captain Johnstone was coming towards Rambert, he said "Where is the overgrown monster," or "where is the overgrown brute," but I cannot say which. With that he met the carpenter "Where is he," and then ordered Rambert to be taken away to the main hatch. After this, I believe the captain was forward with some of the men, and I heard, as far as I can now recollect, that Rambert was to be taken out of irons. Directly after that I heard a rush on the poop. There was a boat on the poop. I saw Rambert trying to make his escape, between the end of the boat and the companion. Julian was on the poop at the time, with a musket and a bayonet on the top of it. I saw Julian presenting the bayonet towards Rambert. With that I heard the captain crying out, "Where is the boy, Julian? he?" "He is gone overboard," said Julian. The captain answered, "The ——— I shall have half of them overboard before sunset to-day." The next words I heard were, "Captain Johnstone is a boy, and I am a man." A glass of grog for all hands, but I do not know whether all the crew were there. I was so exhausted and faint that I lay down and observed no further, only I was in hopes there might be peace. I may further state that I paid my passage to London, I was treated very unkindly by Captain Johnstone, and had to come ashore at Deal.

Thomas Gair, the man who was so very seriously injured, deposed: On the night before Rambert jumped overboard, I went to the cabin at about eight o'clock. I had been there about twenty minutes, when I heard him say to the captain, "Spare my life." I heard a good deal of noise in the cabin. It might be from a fall. When I was relieved at ten o'clock, I saw Mars and Rambert both wounded, and they said that the captain intended to murder all hands, and we had better prepare ourselves. He gave several of us iron bolts to put, and gave some of us cutlass bars. Rambert told us to go up into the fore-top. He told us to come down again fifteen or twenty minutes afterwards, and secure the captain. We told him we would not. We put all the bolts and cutlass bars away again, and told him we would have nothing more to do with it, thinking the captain would not do harm to any of them.

Mr. Humphries (to Gair) Were you armed with a belaying pin or a cutlass bar?—Witness: A cutlass bar.

Mr. Humphries: How many others?—Witness: I can't say. I had one, and Peter Curtis had one. Others had capstan bars, but I don't recollect their names.

David Johnson, able seaman, was then sworn, and it will be seen that his evidence is of great importance, negativing altogether the imputation of mutiny attempted to be cast on the seamen by the prisoner. He deposed as follows:—On the 23rd of September, between the hours of eight and nine o'clock, I was at the helm, and Mars, the second mate, said to me, "I am afraid there will be a noise to-night." About a quarter of an hour afterwards the captain came up to me, accompanied by Rambert, Mars, the carpenter, and the apprentices. The captain said, "Who is there at the helm?" I said, "It's me, sir." The captain said, "Yes, you are there now, but you don't know how long." The captain then went to the break of the poop, and called the waiter out of their beds. Gair, Reason, and Lee came on the poop. The captain immediately took Reason by the shirt, and threatened him, and pursued him with intending to take his (the captain's) life. Reason said, "No, sir, I do not." The captain immediately made a cut at him with a cutlass, but I cannot say whether he cut him at that time. The men were alarmed at the captain, and ran off the poop. Shortly afterwards the captain called them all aft again. Reason, Cone, and Lee were put in irons on the main hatch, and the captain frequently went to them during the night, and cut at them with a sword, and wounded them. The next morning, at daylight, I saw the three men all over blood. They remained in irons all that day. I mean the 24th of September. The captain and the two mates, Rambert and Mars, came upon deck again in the evening, and the captain again cut Reason, Cone, and Lee several times, and they had very much. The captain and Rambert pursued the rest of the crew round the deck, with arms in their hands, threatening them. The men were all quiet at the time. I cannot say exactly the time Rambert went overboard, but I saw the captain cut Rambert several times close to the half-deck hatch. I was upon the poop when Mr. Rambert was put in irons. He was let out of irons and crushed again on the main hatch, and while he had his handcuffs on the captain cut at him very fiercely. I was then at the pump. I had to go to the helm at four o'clock on the morning of the 26th. Mr. Rambert was then in irons on the half-deck. The captain came aft, and gave orders for Rambert to be let out of irons. Rambert was no sooner released than he ran forward. The captain ran after him with a drawn sword, and must have wounded him, for he left a track of blood on the decks all the way he went. The captain was armed with a loaded pistol besides the sword or bayonet. I am not sure which. The captain called out to Julian Cordi (alias Julian) to fire at the men on the forecastle. Julian fired, and Rambert jumped overboard, the blood at the time streaming from his wounds

Mr. Symons then put into the hands of witness two papers in the handwriting of Symons.

Mr. Symons: Have you anything more to say about these papers?—Johnson: We were told if we did not do as the captain wished, he would make us all go the same way as Rambert. I was afraid I should be the captain on the poop. I was afraid of my life after what I saw the captain do to the men and Rambert.

Mr. Humphries: How many of the men had belaying pins?—Witness: About two thirds of the crew. Some could not be found. They were stowed away.

Mr. Humphries: Now give me the names of some of those who had belaying-pins and capstan bars in their hands.—Witness: I should say all hands were of one mind to go aft and try to take our own parts if the captain attempted to murder us all. We did our duty, and never had any intention to do wrong to any one. There was never any mutiny in the ship at all, and we did our duty.

Mr. Humphries: What sort of a thing is a belaying-pin?

The witness described it to be an iron bolt with a Turk's head worked upon the top of it.

Mr. Broderip: Mr. Evans, are you sure the wounded man, Morris, will be able to attend on Tuesday next?—Inspector Evans: Yes, sir, he will.

Mr. Broderip, addressing the prisoner, said it was his duty to remand him for further examination on Tuesday next.

SUPPOSED MURDER OF AN OLD WOMAN.—On Wednesday Martha Browning, a young woman, apparently about 25 years of age, was brought to QUEEN SQUARE Police Court, charged with the wilful murder of Elizabeth Mundell, an elderly female, with whom she resided, in Rochester row, West minster. Some evidence was given of a criminatory character, but the case is still wrapped in much mystery, and the prisoner was remanded till Monday. The Coroner's Jury, who investigated the cause of the death of the deceased, had previously returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

LADY JOHNSTONE, OF WESTERHALL.

This lamented lady, whose death occurred a few days since, at Torquay, where she had very recently arrived from Oxfordshire, was daughter of Charles Gordon, Esq., of Cluny, in Aberdeenshire, and sister of Colonel Gordon, who, supposed to be the wealthiest commoner in Scotland. Her ladyship married, first, 18th January, 1804, Sir John Lowther Johnstone, Bart., M.P., of Westerhall; and, secondly, 12th September, 1820, Major Richard Weyland, of Woodsaton, in Oxfordshire, for some time M. P. for that county. By the former she had. with two daughters, Elizabeth, married to the wife of the Rev. Henry Buckley, and Anne Elizabeth, wife of the Rev. Edmund B. Estcourt, one son, Sir George Frederick Johnstone, of Westerhall, Bart., who claimed the dignities of Marquis and Earl of Annandale, as collateral heir male of the grantee, but died 7th May, 1841, before the House of Lords came to a decision. The claim has been renewed in his son, the present Baronet, Sir Frederick Johnstone, and is still pending. By Major Weyland, her second husband, Lady Johnstone has left one son and one daughter, viz., John Richard, an officer in the army, and Johanna Elizabeth, present Countess of Verulam.

J. G. H. BOURNE, ESQ

This gentleman, the late excellent and highly-esteemed Chief Justice of Newfoundland, whose death was recently announced, was born at Eastwood, Notts, and received his early education at Nottingham in that county. From that seminary he went to Eton, where he became distinguished for his classical attainments, and subsequently entered Pembroke College, Oxford. There he took his Master's Degree, and there remained, until elected to a Fellowship at Magdalene College, which valuable appointment he abandoned on his marriage. He then served his terms at the Middle Temple, and, having been called to the Bar, the 29th Nov, 1828, joined the Midland Circuit, and was nominated one of the Revising Barristers. The duties thus imposed upon him he did not long fill; for within a short period, and at the early age of thirty-four, he was placed on the judicial bench of Newfoundland. In this elevated station he gained universal esteem for integrity, humanity, and kindness; and, on his departure from the colony, a numerously signed address in the most complimentary terms of respect for his character, and deep regret at his departure, was presented to him. He published "Views of Labrador," "England Won," &c., and translated some of Beranger's best poems.

MRS. GASKELL, OF THORNES HOUSE.

The death of one, whose charity and benevolence shed happiness and comfort on the neighbourhood in which she resided, and who devoted her unceasing attention to the benefit of the poor, has cast a gloom over it around.

The benevolent lady to whom these remarks refer, was the second daughter of the Right Hon. Charles Williams Wynn, and wife of James Milnes Gaskell, Esq., M.P. for Wenlock, and one of the Lords of the Treasury. She was married in 1832, and has left a large family to deplore their grievous loss. In March last she experienced an attack of illness, which then caused much uneasiness to her friends; but since that period she had rallied wonderfully, and during the last fortnight her improved appearance was unanimously remarked.

On Friday, the 21st ult., she accompanied Mr. Gaskell to Westwood Hall, on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, and, while there, was found, late on Saturday night, in a state of insensibility, from a fit of apoplexy. Medical aid was quickly at hand, but no efforts could save. On Sunday morning, before eleven o'clock, Mrs. Gaskell breathed her last.

A provincial journal thus alludes to her death:—"The arrival of a messenger, with the sad tidings, at Thornes, was the signal for sorrowful hearts and tearful eyes. The inhabitants of that district owe to her their church, their parsonage, and their schools: the latter have been maintained entirely by her munificence."

THE CASE OF ALLEGED MATRICIDE.—We mentioned last week, that a man named Hampshire was supposed to have caused the death of his mother. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court on Monday and Tuesday.

ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—A collision of trains occurred on the Great Western Railway, on Sunday last, but we are happy to state that it was not attended by any injury to the persons of the passengers or servants, beyond a few contusions. The solicitors to some of the principal lines of Railway, in connection with the western counties, had taken an express train (one of ten other express trains similarly employed) in order to proceed to Exeter and deposit their plans, &c., according to the requirements of the act of Parliament, when, on their approaching Maidenhead, an accident occurred to one of the fire-boxes of the engine, which obliged the engine driver to stop and set down his passengers. Shortly afterwards, another express train, which had started with several legal gentlemen connected with the Great Western and Bristol and Exeter Companies, came along at a fast pace, and, before the driver could have time to arrest its progress, ran into the disabled train. By the force of the collision the first carriage was dashed to pieces, and the others much injured; but, we are happy to state, that, beyond the fright and a few bruises, no one was injured. The solicitors afterwards proceeded in company, and deposited their plans, &c., in good time.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Letters from Vienna mention that the Austrian Government was occupying itself with a fresh organization of the Bourse there. Parties interested in the operations of the stock market, will, in future, be required to give proof of their solidity, by showing the possession of an adequate capital, upon which they will have to pay a duty.

A young woman named Carr, who was lately a domestic servant to Lord Strangford's family, has become possessed of a fortune, estimated at £10,000; the luck really happening through the novelist's hackneyed medium, the death of an uncle in India."

The Emperor of Russia has appointed Mr. Murchison an effective member of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburgh, with the privilege rank, &c., in the Imperial service pertaining to that office, and has confer on him the Grand Cross of Stanislaus, as a recompense for his geological labours in the empire, and the publication of his new work, "Russia in Europe and the Ural Mountains."

Mercantile letters have been received from Hamburg, confirming the information that Buenos Ayres is blockaded by the combined forces of France and England. Commerce is, of course, at a stand still.

The Univers announces that the city of Trent was preparing to celebrate with great pomp the third centenary of the re-union of the Council of Trent in the beginning of 1846. A special committee, charged with regulating the ceremonial of the commemoration, had been appointed, and the Patriarch of Venice, the Cardinal Archbishop of Salsburg, the Prince Archbishop of Goritz, and a number of German Prelates, had already promised to attend. The Pope, on his side, had granted a jubilee of six months on the occasion. The first stone was laid on the 25th October, and the monument is to be inaugurated on the 13th of this month

All navigation between St. Petersburgh and Cronstadt has been stopped since the 11th ult. by the frost. On the 12th St. Isaac's Bridge was removed, and the Neva became so filled with blocks of ice, that on the 14th all communication between the shores of the river was stopped.

A letter from Weimar, dated Nov. 15, says:—"Ronge arrived here yesterday evening, amid the most enthusiastic shouts of popular welcome. He is once more the guest of Counsellor Hoffman, from a window of whose house he made a short speech to the multitude assembled below; but, short as it was, it was not suffered to proceed without interruptions, as a ceaseless hissing, proceeding from a neighbouring house, rendered many of his words inaudible. This irritated the people, who, shouting "Throw out the Jesuit," broke the windows of the house in question. The police took no notice of this circumstance, and before the disturbance ended."

The Moniteur (Brussels paper) of Sunday, contains a Royal Decree, which authorises the free admission of flour into the ports of Belgium to the 1st of January next. Most of all descriptions is declared free of duty. The admission of grain to free entry had been previously decreed, but the object of the Government was found to be defeated by a combination of the miller, and this is the method the government has invented to remedy.

Accounts from Constantinople of the 12th ult., describe the efforts of Sheikh Effendi to disarm the turbulent inhabitants of Lebanon to be eminently successful. A French dragoman having been seized and arrested, the French Consul at Beyrout threatened, that if not at once released, I would cause the Belle Poule frigate to fire on the town. The threat at once procured the desired effect.

The correspondent of the Observateur of Carlsruhe, says that the Bishop of Strasburg has arrived at that city, with the intention of concluding differences between the Baden Government and the Bishop of Fribourg on the subject of mixed marriages. He proceeds to say that the hold attitude recently assumed by the Grand Ducal Government gives little hope at this step being attended with success.

An Imperial Ukase, issued on the 1st of September last, subjects the Israelites of Russia to a fresh tax, the produce of which will be devoted to the establishment of Jewish churches. The tax is levied upon the wax candles lighted on Saturdays and other feast days. The Jewish agriculturists and soldiers in the army are exempted.

The latest accounts from Palermo state, that the Emperor of Russia has changed his first plan, and has determined to past some days at Rome. These accounts add, that all the differences between the Emperor and the Papal See, relative to the Catholic Church in Russia, are completely set to the satisfaction of the two parties.

The inhabitants of Avignon were much alarmed on Monday last by a fire breaking out in the Jewish Synagogue in that city, which consumed the building. The loss is estimated at 55,000f. Several manuscript books, containing the Jewish law, richly ornamented and emblazoned, were consumed.

A letter from Stockholm, 18th ultimo, says:—"The fear of famine in Sweden and Norway is daily increasing, and our Government and Legislature is adopting every possible measure to alleviate this terrible scourge. It has ordered that all the provisions destined to be sent between the locality situated on the Gulf of Bothnia and the ports of Archangel, shall be exempt at the expense of the State, and has just concluded with Russia a convention which removes temporarily all the prohibitions established by treaties between the two countries relative to the exportation and import of all articles of food, with the sole exception of spirituous liquors."

The following extract from a private letter, dated Mexico, October 1, is highly interesting:—"The American Government has made proposals to this Government for the settlement of the Texas question, and the Mexicans are favourably inclined. Mr. Parrott, who has been acting here for some past as a secret agent, goes in this vessel, an American war steamer, to Pensacola. I have no doubt but the business will be concluded by the Mexicans paying a sum of money to the Mexicans; at all events, there is no fear of a war between the two countries."

The Paris Gazette states, that the late reported success of Schamyl, the great Circassian warrior, had been confirmed. He had captured a Russian transport, which was destined to revictual a small fortress situated on the Lesghian line. The soldiers escorting it were all cut to pieces.

The King and Queen of Prussia are sojourning at the Palace of Charlottenberg. His Majesty proceeds daily to Berlin, to transact state affairs. The reigning Prince of Hesse Detmold is in the Prussian capital, accompanied by his son, the Hereditary Prince, who has entered the Prussian Gardes du Corps.

A letter from St. Petersburgh, of the 15th ult., has the following:—"The Civil Governor of Tambof has published a notice that, conformably to instructions given him by the Directing Senate, he has decided that, in order to effect the payment of a part of the debts contracted by Count de Kutaisoff to the State and private individuals, amounting to the sum of 1,568,932 paper roubles (1,600,000f.), there would be publicly sold 3702 peasants belonging to that nobleman in the two districts composing the Government of Tambof."

The Precursaur of Antwerp, of the 30th ult., says:—"The arrival of numerous ships, in anticipation that the navigation may soon be closed, and partly in consequence of the increased importation of provisions, give ample employment to the labouring classes, who have now as much as they can do."

The Cologne Gazette says:—"It is reported in some political circles that the Pope has decided to recognise the Protestant Church, and the Greek Church. There are various statements on the subject; some say that the Pope will ratify, as far as Germany is concerned, the treaties of Munster and Osnaburg of 1648, and that he will order some conciliatory measures with regard to mixed marriages."

The Brussels papers remind their readers, that, on the 16th inst., the King of the Belgians will complete his 55th year.

Within the last week five hundred cab-horses, worked on the great northern road, have been sold, in consequence of a further opening of the Northern and Eastern Railway.

ALGERIA.

Various official despatches from Algeria are published in the Moniteur, which clearly show that the subjection of the hostile tribes is not a very easy task. One is a despatch from Marshal Bugeaud, dated from the bivouac on the Riou, between Guelleb el Oued and Kreuzg el Ketta, the 9th or 10th inst., and gives an account of his march in the mountains of the Matmatas, in search of the absconding tribes, and his endeavours to punish the mountaineers, who had taken part in the revolt. His progress appears to have been much impeded by natural obstacles, and in several skirmishes which took place the Arabs offered a vigorous resistance. The French were, however, victorious in all these affairs, and they succeeded in taking a few prisoners and a quantity of cattle. The Marshal concludes by saying that all the insurgents in the eastern portion of the province of Oran were struck with terror, and that he had reason to expect numerous submissions ere long.

With the report of Marshal Bugeaud is one from Colonel St. Arnaud, dated Orleansville, the 18th ult., giving an account of the affair with Bou-Maza. In this affair the French had only four men wounded, but from a report of Lieut-Colonel Répond, dated Orleansville, the 16th, the following series of affairs with the troops of Bou-Maza, he had 100 killed and 200 wounded. The hostile Arabs fought desperately, and frequently attacked the French. They lost a great number of men, and also the Kaidhat of Bou-Maza, who was found among the slain. There is a report of more importance from Colonel St. Arnaud, dated the 22d ult., from Tenez, for he states in it that he had received positive information that Ahd el-Kader was at Lohha, near Tiaret, where he had been joined by all the population. The colonel had been compelled to abandon his operations near Tenez, on his return to Orleansville, in order to be prepared for any event that might occur. He states, however, that he had no fear as to the safety of ALGERIA.—PASSAGE OF THE IRON GATES.

VISIT OF THE RAJAH OF TRAVANCORE TO QUILON, MADRAS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The accompanying sketch represents the arrival of his Highness the Rajah of Travancore at the cantonment of Quilon, Madras, on the 10th of September last. It had been predicted by the Brahmins attached to his Court that a famine would prevail this year in his dominions, unless he would visit Quilon and go through certain ceremonials there for the prevention of such a calamity. Accordingly, notice was received by the officer commanding Quilon, from General Cullen, the British Resident at his court, to receive the Rajah with all honour on his arrival. His Highness's residence is at Trivandrum, the capital of his dominions, and about forty miles from Quilon; a rapid communication between which places is by a backwater, running along the coast, which has been enlarged and extended by canals, &c., executed by his Highness during the last few years. The sketch represents his Highness' arrival at the cantonment bridge, at Quilon, by boat; to the landing-place of which a spacious pandál, or covered way, was erected from the road, and decorated with garlands of flowers. Here his Highness mounted his state elephant, superbly caparisoned with jewels and beautiful velvets, and attended by two of his peõns, with choudries, or fly-brushes, with elegant gold handles, to brush away any insect or dust approaching the Royal person. His Highness was attended by his Highness the Elliah Rajah, his brother, and, also, by the second Prince, his nephew, who rode immediately behind him on horses, superbly housed and decorated. Immediately preceding him were his state palanquin, composed entirely of silver, and fitted up with dark green velvet. His wardrobe was carried by attendants, in boxes covered with tiger skins, and massively bound with silver. At the head of the procession are his Highness' cavalry and infantry brigade, followed by the state carriage. Immediately after his Highness the Elliah Rajah followed the stud, elephants, English carriages, colour-bearers, ladies of the family, and handsome palanquins, &c. His Highness was received by the 12th Regiment Madras Native Infanty in review order, and by the principal civil and military officers of the station. Many ladies were present, and the whole cortège presented a superb and beautiful spectacle, such as is seldom seen, now-a-days, amongst our eastern Princes.

IRENA MACRINA MIECZYSLASKA, SUPERIOR OF THE BASILIAN CONVENT OF MINSK.

In former numbers of our Journal, we gave some of the details of the persecution carried on by the Russian Government against all those forms of religious belief that differ from the Greek Church, and against the Roman Catholic faith in particular. The policy of discouraging all religions, save that of the State, was commenced by the Empress Catherine; but the severities practised under the orders of the present Emperor, exceed anything witnessed in modern times, and rival the cruelties inflicted on the early Christians by the worst of the Pagan Emperors of Rome.

We need not again enter into these details, which will be found in No. 186 But as the subject has excited great interest, in consequence of the Emperor, having shown himself ready to allow his daughter to embrace the very religion he so ruthlessly oppresses, we give a sketch of the Superior of the Convent which was broken up and destroyed by his orders, after having survived the storms of the wars and revolutions for two hundred and twenty years, the inmates being murdered, mutilated, exposed to death by starvation, and the accidents of rude employment, and to insults and outrages of all descriptions.

Fourteen out of thirty-four survived their atrocious treatment, though in a dreadful state of weakness and mutilation. They were ordered into exile in Siberia; but, before the convoy could set out, the Superior and three of the sisters effected their escape, of which the author of "Revelations of Russia," in a new work, entitled "Eastern Europe and the Emperor Nicholas," gives the following account:—

"At the commencement of the present year, profiting by the scene of riot and drunkenness, to which the saint's-day of the protopope of the convent had given occasion, they effected their escape. Leaping down a high wall into the snow they alighted in safety, and immediately fell on their knees in thanksgiving. They then separated, to facilitate their flight. The Superior, in the midst of all the severity of the season, was driven to hide for days together in the woods, without other food than berries, or anything to quench her thirst but the snow. Once, driven to extremity, she knocked at the door of a wealthy-looking house, and being received with veneration by its owner, was provided with money, provisions, and a correct map of her route. She crossed the frontier disguised as a shepherd; but even then was not in security, as the cowardly Government of Prussia gives up even its own subjects to the Czar. It was not until she had reached Posen, in the midst of a Polish population, that she felt in security."

The three others also effected their escape in safety; the Superior, after residing a short time at Paris, proceeded to Rome; her statement of the sufferings of herself and co-religionists, made on oath, before the Archbishop of Posen, and attested by the seal of the diocese, had been previously forwarded to the Vatican. It will hardly tend to procure for the Emperor of Russia a very cordial reception on his arrival at Rome, which is at present expected. From the work above quoted we also subjoin the following personal description:—

IRENA MACRINA MIECZYSLASKA, SUPERIOR OF THE CONVENT OF ST. BASIL.

"Irena Mieczyslaska had been thirty years renowned for her charity and benevolence throughout the Government of Minsk, as head of the Basilian Convent, consisting of thirty four nuns, in the city of that name. It will be hence at once perceived that she is advancing into the vale of years. The aspect of her countenance is at once noble and indicative of determination. It derives the first expression from the position of the eyes, which is such as we rarely meet with out of the Scandinavian or Anglo Norman race, viz., obliqued upwards from the outward corners, that is to say, in a direction precisely contrary to the eyes of the feline species, of all Mongolian races, and many inhabitants of the southern countries. The finely-chiselled corners of her mouth seem to mark a decision of temper, of which she has given the most heroic proofs in her conduct."

RANGOON, THE PRINCIPAL PORT OF THE BIRMAN EMPIRE.

RANGOON.

By the last received Indian Mail, accounts from Amerapoora describe affairs at the Burmese capital to be in a most agitated state. "Tharawaddie, the King, having thought proper to appoint and install an 'heir apparent,' selected a son of legitimate birth and claims for that purpose, which gave offence to the Prince, who has been playing rather a conspicuous part since his father assumed royalty, and, as the heir apparent is little better than an idiot,—something like disaffection began to be manifested. Tharawaddie, therefore, summoned his son, the Prince of Prome, to the presence; but the summons was evaded. He then commanded his chief, Woongee Moungdau-gher, to appear before him, and, having been informed that he had been to the house of the Prince of Prome, the savage monarch set upon him as soon as he came, and put him to death with his own hand, by spearing him through the body. Others of the principal Woongees were speedily despatched by the hands of executioners, and murder became the order of the day. The Prince of Prome, on hearing of these outrageous proceedings of Tharawaddie, collected a body of troops on whom he could depend, and, crossing the river Tsagaing, was preparing to meet the coming storm. He is represented as an enterprising man, fit to cope with the present state of affairs; and it is prognosticated that he will succeed in dethroning the King, and placing himself on the throne—a change which will be hailed with joy by the people, who regard Tharawaddie as the greatest tyrant and monster of cruelty that ever filled the Burmese Throne."

This intelligence will, in all probability, have the effect of drawing attention to Rangoon, which is the most commercial port of the Birman Empire; where the imports of British manufactures are very considerable; including piece-goods, woollens, glass-ware, &c.

Rangoon is built on the most eastern branch of the river Irawadi, about twenty-six miles from the sea, and, though the navigation is somewhat intricate, the difficulties are easily overcome by good pilots; so that vessels of 1200 tons have proceeded to the port.

The town lies on the left bank of the river, from the banks of which the ground rises gradually for more than two miles to the foot of the hill on which the grand Dagong Pagoda is built, the base of which appears to be 70 or 80 feet above the level of the Irawadi. The town and suburbs extend about a mile along the bank of the river: the streets are narrow; the houses are raised on bamboos, or strong timbers. The few brick-built houses belong chiefly to Europeans, who pay a heavy tax for this privilege: no subject of the Burman Empire is permitted to erect a brick building. These brick houses are built within the myo, or city, which is an irregular quadrangle, surrounded by a stockade, composed of heavy beams of teak timber. On the south side of this stockade, towards the river, is a ditch, over which there is a causeway. From this face of the stockade, two brick-paved roads lead to the great pagoda, Shewi Dagong, and along the sides are built a number of zidis, or monuments, in honour of Buddha. In form, they resemble a speaking-trumpet standing on its base: the tower part is generally a polygon, and the shaft, or upper part, is round, the apex being ornamented with an iron net in the form of an umbrella, called a ti. The Shewi Dagong is in the same style as the rest, but richly gilt all over: it is said to be about 370 feet high, and is surrounded by an inclosure, in which is an immense bell, of very rude fabric. This pagoda is a place of pilgrimage, frequented by many strangers.

Rangoon is very convenient for ship-building, as the tide rises from 18 to 24 feet, and the great teak forests are near it; whence the timber may be floated down the whole way.

Rangoon has been built about a century. The climate is temperate, agreeable, and salubrious. The place, at first, rose slowly: even at the beginning of the present century, the number of vessels that cleared out was only from 15 to 25 annually: in twenty years, they were doubled. Since the time of its occupation by the British (from 1824 to 1826), its commerce with Calcutta, and other British possessions in India, has been continually increasing. The most active commerce is carried on with Chittagong, Dacca, Calcutta, Madras, Masulipatam, the Nicobar Islands, and Pulo Penang; there is also some trade with Bombay and the Persian and Arabian gulfs. The exports are teak-wood, catechu, stick lac, bees' wax, elephants' teeth, raw cotton, orpiment, gold, silver, rubies, and horses. Raw cotton, of superior quality, is sent to Dacca for the fabrication of the finest muslins. The principal foreign vessels which visit the harbour, are British, American, and Chinese.

THE NEW BRITISH MUSEUM.

Although two years more may elapse before the whole façade of the New British Museum is completed, we have availed ourselves of an opportunity of thus anticipatorily presenting to our readers the design, as amended by the Architect, and enriched with sculptural decoration.

Nearly two years since, we engraved Sir Robert Smirke's amended design (see No. 89, page 28, of our Journal). By comparison of this Illustration with the above (obtained by the same authentic means) the reader will, at once, perceive the extent and character of the additions. Thus, the frieze will bear an inscription; the tympanum of the pediment will be filled with appropriate sculpture; upon its apex will be seated our tutelar national representative; and at the two other extremities will be equine figures. The steps to the portico will also, be flanked with noble groups of sculpture. The design will, doubtless, be much improved by these enrichments; and they are characteristic of the principal contents of the Museum. We wish that it were otherwise; ngreeing, as we do, with the writer of a pleasant paper in "Fraser's Magazine" for the present month, that Mr. Baylis' "Fryer's Bank," at Fulham, is more worthy of the name of "the Museum of British Antiquities" than the national institution so designated. The author well observes:—" Rich as that collection is in the classic works of Italy and Greece, and the mysterious remains (until recently) of ancient Egypt; specimens illustrative of Norman, Saxon, Romano-British, and Celtic manners, tastes, and manufactures, are sought for in vain in the building nominally appropriated by the nation for their reception, arrangement, and preservation. Equally deficient is the British Museum in medieval antiquities; and the consequence is, that the artist who desires truthfulness in an English work, knows not where to seek for the necessary information." A plan, for supplying this defect, has been mooted within these few days; and it is high time that the inconsistency was corrected.

The design of the New British Museum is likely to be treated with as much severity as that of the National Gallery. It has certainly not been spared by the architectural critic of the "Companion to the Almanac for 1846," who writes thus:—

"The British Museum is progressing slowly, but quietly. Although two or three years more may elapse before the whole façade is complete, unless it be proceeded with more expeditiously than hitherto, we can now very plainly perceive, from what is done, the entire design and its character. There will be far greater display than usual in regard to columniation—to the number of columns and continuity of them. But, at the present day, we hardly need an example of the kind to make evident to us the effect of a Grecian order, and of a number of Grecian-lonic columns; and with the exception of the columns themselves, the architecture is bare and cold, and has an unfinished air. At the best, the merit of the design is quite of a negative kind, as it consists entirely of colonnading, and nothing more; yet, even were the main building or centre satisfactory in itself, the official residences, which are brought in to compose with it as wings, are of such opposite character—so much at variance with the structural character affected, that they will not have the look of belonging at all to the Museum, but will show merely as two ranges of stone-fronted houses, just Grecianised after the most common-place fashion, by putting pilasters between three rows of windows."

There is much truth, and some asperity, in these remarks. A very striking defect appears to be in the size of the building, which is strangely out of keeping with the grand character of the architecture.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1845.

LAST Sunday shone not as a Sabbath at the Board of Trade; the fatal 30th, falling on that day, it was, at the earnest petitions of a host of surveyors,

Whose sore task
Could not divide the Sunday from the week, reckoned as a working day, and, till midnight, the place was a scene of unparalleled activity for a Government office, generally remarkable for the dignified composure and gentlemanly air of condescending leisure with which the employés go through their routine of avocation. Till midnight, all was bustle and confusion; piles of plans, and mountains of maps, were deposited at the very last moment, the race with time having been but narrowly won. But, on the whole, more were ready, and completed, than were expected to be so; as far as the "Standing Orders" are concerned, no less than 788 Railway Bills are ready to proceed to their next stage. An immense number have been abandoned, but enough remain to task the utmost energies that Parliament can bring to this branch of its business for the ensuing year.

Some doubts exist as to which, where so much has been done so hurriedly, there may not have been a good deal done very badly —so imperfectly into

POSTSCRIPT.

THE PROPOSED RETURN OF THE COURT.—The Queen, Prince Albert, and the Court (as at present arranged) will return to Windsor Castle from Osborne House, Isle of Wight, on Tuesday next. Her Majesty will hold a Privy Council on Thursday or Friday (next week), when a Proclamation will be agreed upon, appointing a day for the meeting of Parliament for the despatch of business.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO PARIS.—The following is an extract from a private letter, dated PARIS, December 1:—" That the Queen of England will visit Paris in the course of the ensuing month appears now to be pretty certain. I have just heard that an autograph letter has been received by LOUIS PHILIPPE from Queen Victoria, stating that, unless some unforeseen event occurs, it is the intention of her Majesty and the King of the French a visit, at the Palace of the Tuileries, at a very early period after the close of your next Session of Parliament. This, from all accounts which have reached us, through the highest quarter, may be expected to take place some time in the month of July. The preparations for the reception of the English Sovereign, not only at the Tuileries, but at Versailles, which have been some time in progress, are of the most magnificent and costly description. The embellishments will be placed in the hands of artists of first rate talent, several of whom are expected to arrive from Italy to aid the native artists of the capital. It is supposed that the visit of the English Sovereign will be prolonged for at least ten days or a fortnight."

RUMOURS OF MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—A variety of rumours have been current in political circles with respect to the movements and intentions of the Ministry. It is confidently said, that, at the Cabinet Council on Wednesday, Sir Robert Peel intimated that if his colleagues refused to support a proposition for making immediate repeal of the Corn-laws, he should feel it necessary to resign office This intimation is said to have overcome the opposition of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, who, at length, gave his reluctant assent to the premier's proposition. It is said that the resolution of the majority of the Cabinet is likely to lead to the resignation of at least three of its members—Lords Wharncliffe, Stanley, and Ripon. The name of Lord Haddington has also been mentioned as one of the probable seceders. These rumours, we may add, should be received with some caution.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE CORN LAWS.—The Standard of last night says:—" We are now, we rejoice to say, in a condition to give the most positive and direct contradiction to the statement of a proposed repeal of the Corn-laws, which appeared in yesterday's Times. The statement, we may be remembered, embraced three propositions:—First, that Parliament is to meet in the first week in January. Second, that Ministers have resolved upon a repeal of the Corn-laws. Third, that the projected repeal is to be announced in the opening Speech. Every one of these three propositions is false. Parliament will not meet in the first week of January, or much, if at all, before the usual time of meeting. The Cabinet has come to no decision whatever upon the subject of the Corn-laws. It must be unnecessary to add, in the third place, that a resolution not formed can hardly have a place provided in the Queen's Speech. Upon what we have written above, we stake the character of this journal."

THE REQUISITION TO THE LORD MAYOR.—The following answer has been received from the Lord Mayor by Mr. Ashurst, as the head of the deputation who waited upon his lordship a few days since with a requisition to convene a Court of Common Council, for the purpose of addressing the Crown on the subject of opening the ports:—"The Lord Mayor, having had under his consideration the requisition for calling a meeting of the Court of Common Council to consider the propriety of petitioning her Majesty to take all such means as she may constitutionally possess for throwing open the ports of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland for the free importation of food, desires to acquaint the deputation he had the honour to receive, that, although he differs in opinion with the requisitionists, he will afford them an opportunity of discussing the subject at a court which he will hold on Tuesday, the 9th instant, at two o'clock precisely."

THE FREE-TRADE MOVEMENT IN THE METROPOLIS.—The following requisition to the Lord Mayor was yesterday (Friday) presented:—"We, the undersigned Electors of the City of London, being desirous of holding a public meeting for the purpose of expressing our sentiments on the subject of the Corn-laws, in connection with the prevailing apprehension of scarcity, request that your lordship will call a meeting of the electors in the Guildhall of this City, to be held at an early day; and that your lordship will be pleased to preside at the same." This requisition was signed by 1,500 electors of London (very many signing in the names of their firm), and was presented by John Dillon, Esq., at the head of a large deputation. The Lord Mayor answered that he would consider the request, and send an early reply. Meetings of the boroughs of Southwark and Marylebone have been held for the purpose of addressing the Queen to convene Parliament, and to throw open the ports for the free importation, duty free.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING AT EDINBURGH.—An important and influential meeting was held at Edinburgh on Tuesday, at which resolutions, praying for the admission of foreign corn, duty free, were agreed to by 1,500 electors of Edinburgh. On the platform were Lord Dalmeny, M.P., Sir James Gibson Craig, Bart., Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Bart., Sir George M'Pherson Grant, of Ballindalloch, Sir Charles Forbes, Bart., M.P., T. Spring Rice, Esq., M.P., John Abercrombie, Esq., Henry Cockburn, Esq., Adam Black, Esq., Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Sir John Forbes, M.D., Lord Provost of Glasgow. The Lord Provost was unanimously called to the chair. The Lord Provost read letters from Dr. Chalmers and Lord Dunfermaine, apologising for their inability to attend the meeting. Sir George M'Pherson Grant, Mr. W. G. Craig, M.P., Mr. Macaulay, M.P., Mr. James M'Laren, Mr. Rutherford, M.P. In the course of his speech Mr. Macaulay declared, that he had always been opposed to the Corn-laws, and that when he was offered an appointment by Lord Melbourne, he expressly stipulated that he should be allowed to act independently in regard to them.

ANOTHER INCENDIARY FIRE.—On Thursday, about half past twelve o'clock at noon, in the midst of the stack-yard at STOKESTOWE Hall, three miles from the town of Nottingham, which, owing to early discovery after the flames had made their appearance, was prevented doing extensive damage. It is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

FIRE AND SUPPOSED LOSS OF LIFE.—Yesterday morning, between twelve and one, a fire broke out upon the premises belonging to Messrs. Cooper and Wilard, boot and shoe manufacturers, at No. 9, Bedford-place, Commercial-road East. One of the lodgers first discovered the fire. He endeavoured to extinguish the flames, but he soon found that he was unable, and he hastened to the upper part of the dwelling to rouse his wife and the rest of the inmates. Scarcely had he got into the apartment than he had but a few seconds before quitted, when flames and smoke shot up the staircase with such rapidity as to cut off escape. He succeeded in procuring a rope, which he fastened round the waist of his wife, and managed to lower her out of one of the upper windows. One of the females threw her infant out of the window, and, reaching upon the window blind the canvass gave way, and the child fell to the ground, but was fortunately caught in the arms of a spectator, and received no personal injury. Several other parties effected their escape by leaping from the upper casements just as the flames were bursting through the front window-shutters, and extending nearly half across the carriage road. By a quarter past two o'clock the conflagration was subdued. At that time the smoke of the stock in trade belonging to Messrs. Cooper and Wilard was observed, and the furniture of the lodgers consumed. It is feared that a bed-ridden female, 80 years of age, named Lea, has perished.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

UNITED STATES.—By the arrival of the Victoria, at Liverpool, from New York, there are advices to the 17th of NOVEMBER—one day later than those received by the Caledonia. There is no important political or commercial news.

PORTUGAL.—We have received accounts from Lisbon to the 29th of November, by the Black Eagle steam packet, which arrived off Cowes yesterday. That vessel carried out the Duke Ferdinand of SAXE Coburg, father of the King of Portugal, and arrived at Lisbon on the 25th, after a stormy passage of five days. A Royal decree had been issued for raising 8000 recruits, bringing the effective force of the army up to 24,000 men, in accordance with the regulation of the 9th of July, 1942, which fixed it at that number.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE GREAT METROPOLITAN MEETING.

During the last ten or a dozen years, the course of Epsom Races has not "run smooth." In 1835, Mr Briscoe, the Lord of the Manor in which the Downs of sporting immortality are situated, went to logger-heads with the Race Committee, and a trial was held at the suit of the Lord against one Mr. Roberts, as representative of that body, when in the latter—we had almost said, of course—went to the wall. Horsepan arose a dismal lamentation, and the newspapers of the day assured the frighted multitude that Epsom was doomed. Anon, however, the belligerents kissed and made friends, and we were told that Mr. Briscoe having come to a satisfactory arrangement with the Jockey Club, the dispute was set at rest.

According to this arrangement, the Downs were to be invested in the stewards for the time being, to whose every authority the Lord of the Manor would grant was to be given, and, besides many excellent things to result from the temporary inconvenience, there were to be "several hundreds a year appropriated to the racing fund." Well; matters ran went on comfortably enough, till, by the order of the proprietor, the Warren—whilom one of the Derby features—was closed, and the solemnity of scaling denied, for the nonce, to the curious, who could pay a shilling for the privilege of viewing it. This blow was followed by a great discouragement—the prohibition of places of vulgar gambling, whereby a very considerable reduction of the exchequer was brought about. In this way—its monotony now and then enlivened by such episodes as the last year and one or two others contributed—the Derby reached a sixty-fifth anniversary and the great metropolitan meeting a crisis. It was pronounced necessary for the prolongation of its existence, that some new blood should be poured into its veins. The state of the turf in Surrey seemed prophetic or dissolution; the condition of Epsom was far from healthy; while Hampton was waiting fast into apathy. Morden was left to its fate; but a friend in need arose for the former in the person of Lord George Bentinck. The greatest practical speculator that English racing has ever known. In the course of the past autumn persons, qualified for the undertaking, communicated with his lordship upon the position of affairs there, both as regarded the sense and the sinews of action. The consequence was that, under the auspices of this new and influential patron, plans were announced for the future which would give an éclat to the great south country meeting hitherto never accorded a British course. It was stated that Mr. Henry Durell, the steward's clerk, and the fittest man, probably, that could have been selected—had become lessee of the Grand Stand. Following the admirable example set by the late Duke of Richmond, which made complete masters of the races, lawn was to be extended, so as to contain within its circle the weighing stand, and every business bureau, and also to be made available for the ring—this is constituting the Grand Stand, the focus of all interest—the capital of the course. In front of it the Derby and Oaks fields were to be saddled for; and, in short, the principle of centralization was to be effectually carried out.

During the interval since this good news was made public, the spirit of improvement has been active, and rumours were rife that even better things were in store for the frequenters of Epsom Downs than had been promised. These took a local habitation on Tuesday, when a meeting of the inhabitants of Epsom was called, for the purpose of submitting to them a most important suggestion of Lord George Bentinck's. At this meeting, it was proposed that the Grand Stand, the focus of all interest—the capital of the races, should enter into a subscription, "to make such a Derby course as would enable the spectators to see every inch of the race, from the start to the finish"! Here was, indeed, a notable project—worthy its designer—worthy those for whose convenience it was devised. How does our public imagine it was received? Some of the interested parties who attended the meeting, actually moved a vote of censure on the conduct of the individual who laid the proposal before the assembly, coupled with a resolution to the effect "Lord George Bentinck was no proper person for a steward (of Epsom), because he did not belong to the parish!"!!

It is proper the public should be aware that this popular nobleman intimated no disposition to take the direction of Epsom Races under his immediate care—a step which would never have been elevated to a position they have a right to occupy. Is he to be turned aside—disgusted, from bestowing this boon upon the town by a party? shall a clique be permitted to mar the promise of the great Metropolitan Meeting? We think the subject of sufficient social importance thus to place it prominently before the public. We look for such an expression of opinion upon the question, as shall secure the citizens of this metropolis a festival suitable to the occasion and those who shall assist at it.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A better attendance than we have seen for some time past, and plenty of backers of horses. The consequence was, that Sting, Rewards, Iago, Ginger, and Humdrum were in some degree of force, but without any striking effect on the prices; we suspect, however, that the last three are destined to become prominent favourites. Forth's disaster will be in great favour: we should like to know which of the four is to be the nag. That there's a flyer in the stable we are convinced

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE MURDER AT NEWINGTON.

We stated in great part of our impression last week, that at about a quarter past five o'clock, on Thursday morning, one of the most cool and deliberate acts of murder that have been committed in the metropolis for many years was perpetrated in Peacock street, Newington.

At that time Isabella Fitzgerald, a labourer in the employment of Mr. Quennell, a respectable builder in Kennington-lane, and a countryman of his, named Owen M'Carthy, were proceeding home, and as they had turned into Peacock street, they were met at rather a dark spot by a person who came in front of them, and who, without the slightest parley or uttering a sentence, deliberately presented a pistol to the breast of poor Fitzgerald, discharged the contents into his body.

The murderer ran off but was pursued by two gentlemen and taken to the station-house. In a few minutes intelligence had reached the station that the unfortunate man, Fitzgerald, was no more, and that, so deliberate was the act of assassination, the poor man never even uttered a single groan.

One of the policemen picked up the ball which had caused the fatal wound, at the bottom of the staircase of the premises, and a pistol-bullet mould, it having fallen from the body while the deceased was being moved.

The murderer, upon the charge being about to be entered against him, gave the name of Samuel Caussay, Esq., M.P. This description of course was brother of Mr Quennell, the builder, and, as well as the deceased, had been employed by him. While the charge was being taken. Inspector Coster asked the prisoner if he had any thing; James Clinton, him, and his reply was that he had not. Immediately after, however, the prisoner was in the act of taking something out of his pocket, when Lockier seized his arm, and found that he had got a pistol in his hand, which was immediately secured. It was a good-sized pocket pistol, single barrel, percussion lock, and it was evident that it had been but just discharged.

Poor Fitzgerald resided at No. 11, Peacock street, and his assassin lived close by, so that the unfortunate man met his death within a few yards of his home, indeed sufficiently near for his wife and five children to hear the report of the shot which deprived them of a husband and a father.

The prisoner, who is an unmarried man, and 22 years of age, maintained a perfect silence.

An account of the examination and committal of the prisoner will be found under the head of "Police."

THE INQUEST.—On Saturday afternoon an inquest was held on the body of the unfortunate man, at the Peacock Tavern, before Wm. Carter, Esq., and after an investigation of nearly four hours, the inquiry was adjourned till the following Wednesday. On that day the jury re-assembled at the Peacock Tavern, to further prosecute the inquiry touching the decease of the unfortunate man, Daniel Fitzgerald.

The witnesses examined were those who gave their evidence before Mr. Henry at the Lambeth Police-court on Monday last.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the coroner summed up, and the jury, after a brief deliberation, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against Samuel Quennell.

DESTRUCTION OF COOKE'S CIRCUS, AT GLASGOW.—Cooke's Circus, at Glasgow, was destroyed by fire on Monday last. The Circus cost between £1100 and £1200, about three years ago. It was recently fitted up by Mr. Dalton for a minor theatre. It is not known how the fire originated, but the matter will, no doubt, undergo the usual investigation. Mr Cooke has the building insured in the Sun Office for £800, and Mr. Daniels, the scenery, dresses, &c., insured in the same office.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO THE LADY OF LIEUTENANT WAGHORN, R.N.—We regret to state that MRS. WAGHORN, the lady of Lieutenant Waghorn, met with an accident last week, by which she sustained a compound fracture of one of her legs. The accident occurred on the way from her residence at Snodland to Strood in a four-wheeled carriage, driven by the man servant. When the horse shied at a Punch and Judy Exhibition, and ran away. The lady begged his mistress to keep her seat, telling her he should be able to pull the horse up; but she became alarmed, threw herself out, and thus unfortunately her leg was fractured.

SUICIDE OF A GENTLEMAN.—On Monday, Mr. Carter held an inquest at the Dorset Arms Tavern, Clapham New road, on the body of Mr. Samuel Cresson, aged fifty-four years, who committed suicide on Saturday. The deceased was in the receipt of an annuity of £900 per annum in the Bank of England, and for some years past had been under the care of Mr. Young, surgeon, of Kennington lane. His mind had been in a deranged state for a considerable period, consequently he had attendance night and day. On the night of Friday last week, deceased had down by the side of his wife, and during her sleep he proceeded to the stair-case and suspended himself to the banisters by a silk handkerchief, where he was subsequently discovered by his attendant. Verdict, life being quite extinct. The Jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed his own life, being at the time in a state of temporary mental derangement."

MR. WARE ACCUSED OF MURDER.—MR. MARLBOROUGH BAILEY.—The adjourned coroner's inquest on the body of the policeman Stubbs, who was killed by the collision on the railway near Barnsley, was resumed in Leeds on Monday last, before Mr. Overend, "Manslaughter" was returned. Thomas Wheatley, the driver of the pilot engine, that ran into the disabled train.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.—A deputation from Ashton-under Lyne, consisting of his worship the Mayor, Messrs. Buckley, Whittaker, and Biggs, waited on Sir R Peel on Monday to present a memorial for the opening of the ports from the inhabitants of that town. The Premier received the gentlemen with his usual courtesy; he inquired very particularly respecting the present price of provisions, and the change that has taken place within the last fortnight.—During the week, meetings have been held in various parts of the country, at which resolutions requesting Government to open the ports were agreed to.

POLICE DISGUISES.—In the course of some trials last week, at the Central Criminal Court, before Mr. Baron Rolfe, for passing bad coin, it appeared in evidence, that, in order to detect this description of offenders, the police assume various disguises—such as the dresses of cobblers, itinerant greengrocers, and costermongers—the choice of costume being left to the fancy of the wearer. The persons thus disguised do not belong to the "detective force," but are entered on the "plain clothes" list. The practice, it was stated, is sanctioned and encouraged by the authorities.

COMMISSIONERS OF BANKRUPTS.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. Burge (the Queen's Counsel, and formerly Attorney General of Jamaica), to the Commissionership of Bankruptcy, vacant by the death of Mr. Boteler.

UR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR DECEMBER.

THE STAGE NEGRO.

The character of the Negro, as exhibited on the stage, is a strange compound of physical and moral singularities, that are well worthy the attention of the student of human nature in its dramatic, which is certainly its most astounding form. The Stage Negro seems to be deeply imbued with the beauties of the British Constitution, and is constantly indulging in sentiments of gratitude towards England, that must be delightful to the ears of the most patriotic native of our highly-favoured isle. The Stage Negro is continually running about in an ecstacy of delight at the reflection, that, "dreakly him put him foot on British groun, him free as de air, free as Massa himself" an announcement which is usually followed up in an early scene by the Negro receiving a variety of cuffs or kicks (in which, by the by, he seems to delight) from some of the other characters in the drama. Sometimes the Stage Negro grows sentimental, and asks, in reference to some cruel practices, "Am he no hab some claim upon him." Whether not a man and a brother, for, though him face black as him coal, him heart white as snow, him." The old constituent feeling and sentiment shattering Stage Negro is, however, rapidly disappearing from the stage and we get, in these days, very few of these cutting allusions to the traffic in slaves, and those rather appeals to the sympathies of the human race, which were the harm of the dramatic negroes of our infancy. The Stage Negro has become a vulgar dancer merely, with a banjo in his hand, and without a bit of sentiment about him any other. How sentiment and pumping about, wheeling about and turning about, but wholly devoid of that solemn admiration for the British Constitution, and for the liberating influence of the sands at Margate, or the shingles at Dover, which we once used to hear with a feeling of pride at being natives of a land that admitted of so much puffing on the part of our dramatists. The Stage Negro of the present day can only indulge in frivolous allusions to Miss Lucy Long, Coal Black Rose, and other light characters, or call upon some imaginary individual, of the name of Josey, to Jim along—a process that we are utterly at a loss to form any conception of.—Cruikshank's Table-Book.

CHRISTMAS.

I like Christmas books, Christmas pantomimes, mince pies, snap-dragon, and all Christmas fruit; for, though you and I can have no personal gratification in the two last named deleterious enjoyments to eat that abominable compound of currants, prunes, and puff paste, which infallibly results in a bilious pill, or to dip in a dish of hot metheglin and for the purpose of fishing out scalding raisins which we don't like—yet it gives us pleasure to see the young people so occupied—a melancholy and tender pleasure. We indulge in pleasant egotisms of youthful reminiscence. The days of our boyhood come back again. The holy holidays! How much better you remember them than any other. How sacred their happiness is, how keen, even at this minute, their misery. I forget whether I have told elsewhere the story of my friend, Sir John C——. He came down to breakfast with rather a disturbed and pallid countenance. His lady affectionately asked the cause of his disquiet. "I have had an unpleasant dream. I dreamed I was at Charter House, and that Rams flogged me!" He is sixty five years old. A thousand great events may have happened to him since that period of youthful fustigation. Empires have waxed and waned since then. He has come into £20,000 a year; Napoleon is dead since that period, and also the late Mr. Pitt. How many manly friends, hopes, cares, pleasures, have risen and died, and been forgotten! But not so the joys and pains of boyhood; the delights of the holidays are still as brilliant as ever to him, the buds of the school birch-rod still take bitterly the shrinking os coccygis of memory. —Fraser's Magazine.

GENIUS OF RAPHAEL.

Of all the modern artists, Raphael has most perfectly fulfilled the first great law of all dramatic painting, namely, to combine the greatest distinctness with pectoral beauty of representation. He attains this distinctness, by presenting, with classic severity, the essentials only of his subject, in simple and natural action, and in the most favourable point of view—the expression of each individual figure, even to the most trivial accessory, is as precise and clear as the representation of the whole; so that it may with truth be affirmed, that in Raphael's picture compositions there is not a single action in his draperies—not a fold which has not its natural motive. This luminous distinctness is united to agreeable forms with the greatest apparent artlessness; and the perfect repose, the life breathing tranquility, which, like a reflection of his own rich and lovely spirit, are poured out over the world, give to his works that irresistible charm which captivates the more powerfully the oftener they are contemplated, the more intimately we are familiarized with them. The inexhaustible fulness of their meaning unfolds itself only by degrees to the soul; and with ever-rising admiration, we discover the unfathomable depth beneath the transparent surface—the unconsciousness of genius clothed in child-like simplicity.—Dublin University Magazine.

THE SEA.

In watching the sea, the mind never becomes weary; each wave, as it curls its silver foam and dashes on the waves, has some novelty in it. There is no monotony in the motion of the waves, and the mind speculates momentarily on each variety of motion and of form, finding in all an inexhaustible fund of amusement, excitement, pleasure, and wonder. It is less true than remarkable, that the ocean is the only substance which, in its movement, has not a wearying effect upon the gazer. All other forms, animate or inanimate, may amuse for a moment, a minute, or an hour; but their charm is gone; there is a monotony in themselves; they are unchangeably the same in their general form. Even the brook, rippling along, has a monotony which is not in the motion of the sea. Perhaps the nearest approach to the pleasing variety shown in the movement of the ocean, is the ever changing, ever varying, display in the features of the HUMAN FACE; one moment expressing the calm of resignation or repose, the next the fiery raging rippie, as the ever changeful thoughts—like the uncertain winds, playing over the waves, display themselves upon its surface—and, anon, the boisterous storm of anger, madness, or revenge!—W. H. Yates. New Monthly Belle Assemblée.

SOMETHING NEW ABOUT THE GERMANS.

We are now about to state something concerning the Germans which we have never seen directly stated before by any writer, and which will probably very much surprise most readers. Every body who is at all conversant with German literature must be aware of the quantity of morbid sensibility it contains; especially since the appearance of the far famed "Sorrows of Werter." What, then, will be thought of us when we assert our opinion that the Germans, as a sweeping general characteristic, have no physical sensibility? They appear to us to have no nerves, in our usual acceptation of the term. Either such nerves as they have, are of a harder and coarser texture than we are accustomed to understand and experience of such delicate temperaments, or else they are encased in so tough a coat that the usual wear and tear of the external world does not affect them. The morbid sensibility, therefore—we had almost said the sensibility of any kind—which they so constantly, and often so beautifully and most touchingly display in their writings, we consider to be, with a very few exceptions, as simply an affection of the intellect; it is a sheer mental matter, and with little accompanying nervous emotion. As for the Germans, as a people, they really cannot have any nerves. A man once came directly under our parlour window to set a saw. It was a huge saw-pit saw, and the screeching was quite frightful, and penetrated to the remotest corners of the brain. Our window being open, the sound have gone to some other place. We shut the window, but the sound came through with little abatement. We called to our landlady, and expostulated, asking if she had ever had such a visitor before. "Oh, yes—often, she believed—she had never particularly attended to it!" Her husband coming in to pacify us, remarked "that he had noticed the same performance under his windows upon previous occasions, and had seen the man coming to do it as usual, but it had never occurred to him that anybody would object to it. The saw must be set somewhere; however, he would order the man to go a few yards further off!"—Douglas Jerrold's Shilling Magazine.

RACING IN THE OLDEN TIME.

While upon the subject of racing in the hundred of WIRRAL, I cannot do better than give an account of English horse-racing in the olden time, and which is to be found in MORTIMER'S description of LEASOWE Castle, the residence of SIR EDWARD CUST. "In the drawing-room is, among other valuable pictures, a very ancient one of a horse-race that occurred here in the days of James the First, including portraits of that monarch and his sons, sharing in the sport; in which also a buxom lady, in a carriage driven by servants in the royal livery, participates. The Wallasey Leasowe is probably the oldest ground in the kingdom, being noticed by WELSH as existing in the early part of the seventeenth century. The races at the Rood Eye, at Chester, or at Smithfield, and other places, were comparatively the sports of a mere fair, and could offer no rivalry to the aristocratic amusements of the Leasowe course, which in 1683 had rather an illustrious jockey in the person of the famous Duke of Monmouth. Attended by a great retinue of gentry, the Duke was on a visit to the county popularity in the western counties. At Chester he condescended to become sponsor to the daughter of the Mayor of that city, and, amid the festivities attendant on that event, bearing that the principal families of the county had assembled at the Wallasey races, he went thither, and rode himself; which he won, and bequeathed the prize to his infant god-daughter."—Sporting Review.

DEPOSITS OF RAILWAY PLANS AT THE BOARD OF TRADE.

OFFICE OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.—SCENE ON SUNDAY NIGHT.

A strange spectacle was witnessed in the metropolis on Sunday last. The Legislature having, probably from an oversight, fixed the 30th of November as the last day for the reception of Railway plans, sections, &c., at the Board of Trade, many parties, pressed for time, left the completion of their work to the latest possible period, and, consequently, the vicinity of the office of the Board of Trade, on Sunday afternoon, presented a scene of excitement and bustle happily very unusual on the Sabbath.

At one o'clock the offices were opened, and, during the afternoon, cabs and carriages of all descriptions came down, but not in very rapid succession; and the plans were delivered without much trouble to those who had charge of them, or inconvenience to the Government officials.

As the evening advanced, the arrivals became more frequent, and at nine o'clock they poured down Whitehall most plentifully, and in the most deplorable disorder.

Having disgorged their freights of parchment and paper, the cabs drew off, and the depositors exhibited unequivocal signs of joy at the triumphs they had secured.

The method adopted for the reception of the documents was as follows:—The parties charged with their delivery were admitted to the lobby of the office of the Board of Trade, where they entered the name of the agents for whom they were concerned, in a book provided for that purpose. The name was then passed to an official, who conveyed the same to the inner office, where it was entered by the clerks.

The several parties were then successively called in, to describe the names and titles of their respective plans.

A good deal of amusement was caused by the similarity of names amongst the agents, particularly when any gentleman of the name of Smith was wanted. At every such call, there were at least half-a-dozen respondents, and it very seldom happened that the right agent was pitched upon by the subordinates below, who, being ignorant of the projects with which the agents were connected, always ushered up the Mr. Smith who happened to be most clamorous.

From an early period of the evening a large concourse of persons had assembled, and displayed the utmost freedom in their remarks upon the huge piles of paper which were to be consigned to their resting place. The bearers were also, in several instances, made the objects of some bitter jests; but their attention was too much occupied by the matter they had in hand to heed them.

The scene was an animated one in the waiting-room of the Board of Trade about eleven o'clock on Sunday night. But an hour remained, and yet some thirty individuals were in waiting with huge piles of parchment and the various necessary documents. Anxiety was depicted on every countenance—some fearing that, after all the labour and excitement they had undergone, they would not be able to complete the requisite formalities within the very limited time that remained. Eager inquiries were made from one to the other as to the opinion whether those who had actually arrived with their plans would be allowed to remain and complete the business after the hour of twelve had arrived, and various and amusing were the mutual recitals made of the "hairbreadth" escapes and daring doings of those entrusted with the task of lodging the respective plans. Six express trains had been ordered on one line (the Great Western) very nearly at the same hour, for each of which it was said about £80 were paid; and there was no lack of reports of casualties and contretemps caused by this unusual pressure upon the line. Indeed, it was known that one train had actually run into another; and this fact formed the basis of some harrowing reports of the loss of life and mischief that had occurred.

Besides all this dashing and whirling upon the line with the trains, it is said the electrical telegraph was set at work very ingeniously and usefully. For instance, in cases where something had been forgotten, a message was sent to request that such a plan or section should be sent up, and straightway the omission was repaired. Where the business was happily completed, the electric telegraph conveyed to the anxious projectors the simple but emphatic and consoling intimation of "All right." This notice could in some instances have been reversed with entire truth, for it appears that in the hurry the valuable documents had been forgotten, so that "all left" behind would have been a very accurate intimation.

The Chronicle alludes to instances of sharp practice resorted to by Railway Companies to defeat competitors. Our contemporary says—

"The majority of plans from the provinces have been sent up by express trains, and it is whispered that in this respect those companies with the locomotives at their command, and to whom the lines belonged, availed themselves of this advantage to such an extent for the exclusive transmission of their own plans and sections, as actually to refuse special trains to their competitors. In one instance, however, they were most adroitly out-generalled, and a ruse was resorted to that for its originality and rarity lays claim to no little admiration. One of the established companies, with express powers at their command, peremptorily refused to the promoters of a competing line an express train for their deposits to town. Not to be outwitted, they hired an undertaker's hearse, placed plans, sections, and clerk inside, and despatched it by special train to town."

As the fatal hour of twelve approached, the anxiety of those in attendance increased to a fearful point. The fate of empires seemed as nothing to the all-important question whether the Directors of the Rouffi-the-Corner Direct and Smash and Squeak Extension should, or should not, be in a position to ask the Parliament to agree to their bill. Happily, however, the fears and forebodings of the modest representatives of the nurseries firms of John Rose and Richard Does, then and there present, were destined to terminate in the accomplishment of their wishes. They were all enabled to deposit their valuable commodities with the Board of Trade, and we wish that department joy of them. This last act of deposition was easy of accomplishment. The name of the Railway was given in at the same time with the plans, and formal notice being taken of the fact, the business was completed.

Thus far, those who had obtained access to the building before twelve fulfilled their mission. A different fate, however, awaited three gentlemen (rolled into one post-chaise), who were a little too late, and of whose misfortune the Post thus relates the sad incidents:—

"As the clock struck twelve, the doors of the office were about being closed, when a gentleman, charged with the delivery of the plans of one of the Surrey Railways, arrived, and with the greatest difficulty succeeded in obtaining admission. These were the last notices deposited. A lull of a few minutes here occurred; but just before the expiration of the first quarter of an hour a post-chaise, with reeking horses, drove up in hot haste to the entrance. In a moment its occupants (three gentlemen) alighted and rushed down the passage towards the office-door, each bearing a plan of Brobdignagian dimensions. On reaching the door, and finding it closed, the countenance of each drooped; but one of them, more valorous than the rest, and prompted by the bystanders, gave a loud pull at the bell, which was answered by Inspector Otway, who informed him that it was now too late, and that his plans could not be received. The agents did not wait for the conclusion of the unpleasant communication, but took advantage of the door being opened, and threw in their tremendous papers which fell upon and broke the passage lamp. They were thrown back into the street with as little delicacy as they were pitched into the hall. When the door was again opened, again went in the plans, only to meet a similar fate from the officers. The three agents were now maddened to desperation, and the principal amongst them commenced to tell his tale of woe to the bystanders, from which it appeared that they had that morning left Harwich, charged with the deposition of the plans of a certain Railway proposed to benefit that district; that they had arrived in London as early as half-past ten, but, through the ignorance of the post-boy, had been driving about Pimlico and its neighbourhood, in search of the office of the Board of Trade, for more than an hour and a half previous to their fruitless arrival thereat. The crowd, who had patiently listened to the recital of the unhappy individual, greeted its conclusion with a burst of laughter, which seemed to pierce his already broken heart. At two o'clock—the time at which our informant left—the three luckless agents of the Harwich Railway were still wandering at the door, vainly endeavouring to move the sympathies of the obdurate officials."

Thus ended one act of the Railway drama, or tragedy, as it may be, which would have been memorable for the incidents already connected with it, but which cannot fail to be marked as an era in our history, from the circumstance of its having been performed on a Sunday. Opinions about the cause of this deposition of the plans on such a day are divided. Some assert that it was an accident, whilst others contend that it was "a planned thing."

It is almost impossible to conceive the amount of business connected with Railway Illustration that has been carried on, particularly in London, within the last fortnight. In every department of the work it seems as if it were driven off to the last moment. The consequence has been, that everything has risen to a great premium. Surveyors and levellers have made quite a harvest of it, many of them getting from six to fifteen guineas per day. So great has been the demand, that many unqualified parties came into it, and undertook work to which they were perfectly incompetent, which has been the cause of putting the most celebrated engineers to great trouble and inconvenience, and explains the reason why many of the lines were so far behind. For the last month, there was not a copper-plate to be got; all the large houses had their orders, and, in many instances, the money paid in advance, to secure their execution As the number required never exceeded fifty of each plate, nine plates were made ten of to a great extent, and these were with difficulty procured, at about double their usual price. Copper-plates engravers were procured in every quarter; many of the large houses, for the last two months, have been all over the country engaging hands, and paying them large salaries, to keep them for the grand push; this last week, some of the most celebrated engravers of the day have been employed in this way. Lithographic and Zincographic draghtsmen have also been collected from every large town, not only in England, but from France and Germany, and all have been able to make their own terms. The prices rose in proportion to the demand; and, at the last, any price was offered to parties who had the means of executing work that had not previously been engaged for this purpose.

EVE OF THE 30TH.—CORRECTING PLANS AT A TAVERN.

Copper-plate and lithographic printers had also their share of the business; and large salaries were paid for their services.

For the last week both engravers and printers have been working day and night; and with all this, not half of the work was completed—in many instances, only the outlines of the plans were engraved, and the sections were either drawn, or tracings were deposited, with the plans and figures filled in by hand. This, at the last, brought in another set of hands, namely, draughtsmen and writers, and most of the engineers had from twenty to one hundred employed in this way. Rooms at various hotels were engaged for this purpose, and as these parties came in for the finish, many of them had never been to bed for a week, and, as may be supposed, were done up at the last. We give a sketch of one of those rooms on the eve of the 29th, when all parties were nearly hors de combat.

Letter-press printers, also, came in for their share of the bustle, in printing the books of reference; and, at the last, large prices were paid to get them done in time.

All day, on Saturday, special messengers were starting off with these plans and sections, to deposit in the various counties. But Sunday was the grand day, when special engines were, in many instances, engaged for the purpose. And, with all this, many of them must have been behind time. Many of the plans were deposited on Saturday, but the business done was trifling, in regard to that of Sunday.

The scene in the Lobby, of which we give a sketch, was of a very bustling description; but only those who were in it can form any correct idea of their chance of succeeding. The President and Vice-President frequently visited the scene of the bustle during the time.

One of the most eminent lithographers was compelled to bring over 400 lithographers from Belgium, and failed, nevertheless, with this reinforcement, in completing some of his plans. Some lithographers have been known to throw their contracts overboard, having been bribed by their opponents to give up the work, and in other cases charges are made of surreptitious and wilful pillages of stones.

We regret to say that we have heard nothing positive about the "three gentlemen from Horwich" whom the Post left at two o'clock at the Board of Trade. Not being able to deposit their plans, perhaps they stood at the door till day-break, and being, no doubt, legal gentlemen, they could not be persuaded to break the House that this act was a compliance with the "standing orders."

Various untoward incidents are related connected with the day, from which we select the following:—All the deposits for the important lines connected with Birmingham and the district have been made within the specified time, with the exception of the Dudley, Madely, Broseley, and Ironbridge; and by a combination of fortunate circumstances, the Great North of England's messengers to the Board of Trade and Shrewsbury arrived there, one seven, and the other three minutes after twelve o'clock. A question will probably arise whether the deposits be not permitted to stand in this case, as it is alleged that the Shrewsbury clocks were a quarter of an hour faster than those of London, and that moreover they never kept "railway time." An untoward accident happened to the gentleman who was proceeding from Euston-square to Whitehall. The cab in which he was riding broke down this caused a delay of ten minutes. Some idea may be conceived of the exertions made by the parties connected with this line, and of their determination to accomplish their purpose, by the following anecdote:—Horses had been engaged at one of the principal hotels, to convey the documents to Stafford; the animals were kept in the stable all night, and having turned out at nine o'clock at night, and attached to the chaise, it was found that his progress was only at the rate of four miles an hour. In vain did he deal out sundries warrantedas; neither impose upon the pastboys, whose sluggishness abundantly proved the weighiness of the bribe they had received. Finding ourselves unavailing, the attorney leaped from the carriage, unfastened the traces, and threatened to shoot the postboys for mercy: he then resumed his seat in the vehicle, and the remainder of the stage was performed at the rate of fifteen miles an hour. Outrages appear to have been committed on the premises of Messrs. Gibbs & Co., for the arrest of the peace at Preston, in consequence of their not considering themselves bound by the Government notice to keep their office open for the reception of plans after Saturday night at twelve, conceiving it to apply only to the Board of Trade. Bullets were thrown in at the windows so as to induce an opening of the doors, that the plans might be pelted in. At Preston several, owing to this, were late in their deposits.

The cabmen made a good harvest. Towards night cabs were decidedly at a premium. At one period they arrived in very rapid succession, and it afforded some amusement to see the anxiety depicted on the countenances of those who emerged from them. Numbers of cabs were in waiting at the Board of Trade for hours, and the arrivals and departures were watched by the bystanders with more than common curiosity. In short, there is, perhaps, scarcely another instance on record of so much business done at a Government office on a Sunday, nor is it often that there is so much stir among the cabmen. They, at least, ought to thank the Government for giving an "long a day" as possible to the surveyors and levellers.

ENGINEERS' ROOM.

Is there an engine here? Oh no!
But engineers are cramming—
Doors bang so quickly—that we know
Jams and their jamming.

Pray what's your plan—the*best plan* here
I think is to be quiet;
For all the other plans I find
Are kicking up a riot.

Men hullaboo—just as they do
At any great election;
And there is not a single Sir
But's in a state of flection.

The time's arrived—run, gentles, run,
For love of Railways run, sirs;
Or you will find your Line is done
Before it is begun, sirs.

RUSH OF CABS

Whist! ho! how fast! the cabmen can't!
Their horses keep in hand;
So quick they go, at once you know,
They're not upon the stand.

Impertinence uncheck'd, I vow,
May all their tongues encumber;
For they have got no currency,
You cannot—take their number.

Look how they all besiege Whitehall
It's one entire crush;
They rush against a man, and then
They never care a rush.

Then why do Sets to every cab
With pleasure pay their chine?
Because they say, is helped to-day
To carry on your line!

LOBBY OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

Hark! Hark! in the Receiving-room,
How all their feet are tramping;
Yes, all their feats are those receipts
Which all intend feet are stamping.

They wouldn't make an inch way, there,
Not for Sir Robby;
And yet they are not in the room—
They're only in the lobby.

They cram the halls—they line the walls—
They sit upon the shelves,
And numbers feet are stamping on their bills,
Could never pass themselves.

At last, a few are ushered in,
With manner to be tart meant,
And never felt they were so much out,
As in the home department.

THE RECEIVING ROOM.

In the Receiving Room they out
Their very liveliest cagery,
With awkward bow-like "don't know how"
Depositing their papers.

And as they're one by one let out,
They say "it's very fine,
But I don't like this job at all,
It isn't in my line!"

The plans and sections all complete,
Are piled upon the floor,
They cry Oh papers! to the room,
And O-pen to the door.

Then to the now spapers they dash,
By rivals smartly vied with,
And soon proclaim in them that all
The orders are complied with.

RAILWAY STAVETING.—An engineer upon one of the great trunk lines running out of the metropolis, declared to the meeting of the company to which he is attached, that he could teach any intelligent and well-educated youth Railway surveying in three mornings of three hours each. In support of his statement he appealed to a lad he had with him. The lad verified the statement, and said he was then about to start for the neighbourhood of Aylesbury, where he was to have three weeks' surveying at ten pounds per week.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.—A correspondent of the Times supplies the following amusing arithmetical puzzle:—Moorgate-street has given out 83 prospectuses of railways, the capital for the completion of which requires the sum of £793,750,000. One railway has been planned at each of the Nos. 2, 14, 32, 35, 36, 39, 42, 47, eight railways more no number is mentioned; seven at No. 64; six at each of the Nos. 68 and 68; five at each of the Nos. 34, 37; four at each of the Nos 8, 29; three at each of the Nos. 33, 41, 48, 54; two at each of the Nos. 3, 23, 24, 28, 46, 60, 61. Gresham-street has issued prospectuses for 20 Railways, requiring for completion the sum of £17,580,000. Eight Railways are planned at No. 5 of this street, which require of this £17,680,000 the sum of £7 [illegible] the balance being required by one at No. 4a, two at [illegible] and the remaining five at other [illegible] require from the pub to the sum of £6,[illegible] to the sum of subscribed capital of £5,345,[illegible] Moorgate-street the sum of £83,839,600. The prospectuses of the eight Railways from No. 5, Gresham-street, require £7,950,000 from the public, who have, however, only subscribed capital to the amount of £923 900, leaving a balance due to No. 5 of £7,346,800. To meet the sum of £9,630,000 required by the other numbers of the houses in this street, the public have subscribed capital to the extent of £766,198; therefore, a debt is due by the public to those numbers of £8,854,000. So the total sum due by the public to enable the Gresham-street speculators to carry out their proposed plans amounts to the sum of £16,200,670.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

ASHFORD, THANET, AND CANTERBURY BRANCH.—According to present arrangements, and the forward state of the works of the line, the company anticipate its opening by the 1st of January of the ensuing year. The several stations are near completion.

BRIGHTON, DORKING, AND ARUNDEL ATMOSPHERIC.—The shares in this company have just been issued, and it is stated by the committee, that they forbore to issue the letters of allotment until they should be able to announce that the plans and sections had been lodged. They state that the deposits on 5,000 shares allotted to the provisional committee have been paid up; and they engage that a greater expense than 7s. 6d. per share shall not be incurred without the sanction of the shareholders expressed at a meeting to be convened for that purpose.

CENTRAL KENT COUNTY. The Central Kent County Company have made arrangements with the South-Eastern Company, by which the construction of the line will be effected. In virtue of this arrangement, the scripholders will not be entitled to a distribution, at par, of certain shares in the new capital of the South-Eastern Company, distinguished as No. 4.

IRON OR WOOD.—The Directors announce that, owing to the probable pressure of business in the ensuing session, consequent on the vast number of projects, and the fact that landowners representing nearly one-half of the line have not yet seen fit to modify their declarations of opposition, notwithstanding the wish for the Railway manifested by the islanders, they have resolved to recommend a postponement of the project, rather than incur a useless outlay by an encounter on standing orders, for which they feel themselves unprepared. They have determined to allow parties, who may so elect, to receive back a portion of their deposits, retaining the residue until the expenditure is ascertained, with a reserved right to the shareholders of removing their subscriptions for a like number of shares. [It is to be hoped that this excellent example will be universally followed.]

MANCHESTER AND LEEDS, AND LEEDS AND BRADFORD AMALGAMATION.—An arrangement has been entered into between these two companies, by which the Leeds and Bradford, and Leeds and Bradford Extension shares, become Manchester and Leeds stock, to the extent of their share of capital, viz., £900,000. The Bradford and Leeds proprietors are also to have 75 per cent additional on the £900,000, which per centage is to be issued as follows, viz., £300,000 in £20 shares, which will raise, when paid up, the amount which the Leeds and Bradford Company were empowered by their act to borrow. The remainder of the 75 per cent., viz., £375,000, will subsequently be issued to the shareholders, subject to a call at the time of £3 per share. In addition to the calls on the original shares, and £10 on the extension shares, now due, which will make £20 paid up on each, it is intended to call for a further sum of £21 per share in the course of next year, which will then make the paid-up capital £41 per share. Both the old and the new shares are to remain an unproductive stock till the opening of the line, when they will begin to receive dividends in proportion to the extent and cost of the lines which shall be in operation. Of course this arrangement depends upon the Legislature sanctioning the act of amalgamation.

WHITEHAVEN JUNCTION.—This line has been completed, and its opening for public traffic was intended to have taken place last Monday; but, in consequence of Captain Coddington reporting unfavourably of the gauge laid down, the Board of Trade have refused to certify its security for the conveyance of passengers, &c. The company have consequently been forced to postpone the opening, in order to relay the rails, which will necessarily occupy some time. Before the rails were removed, a train of twenty-five laden coal-waggons passed over the line.

SETTLING DAYS IN DARKNESS.—Tokens-days for registered Shares, 17th and 30th; Account-days, 16th and 31st.

COMPETITION FOR RAILWAY TRADE.—The London and Birmingham, the Midlands, the Grand Junction, and the Great Western Companies, were closely tried on Sunday for special trains. The number of these trains may, perhaps, be gathered from the following fact:—An agent engaged a special train at twelve o'clock on Sunday morning, for which he paid the regular charge of £37. While the parties were engaged in placing sundry trunks, &c., in one of the first-class carriages, a second agent with his clerks arrived, and desired a special engine to be got in readiness. At that moment there were three special trains at the terminus, the engines of which were "getting up their steam," and the whole of them were appointed to start within the hour. The second agent was told that he could not have his special train got ready in less than one hour and a half. This he declared would prevent his depositing some of his plans before the required hour; he was told there was no hope for him, and in his despair he applied to the agent who had just paid his £37. An arrangement was come to, by which the agent B was to pay the agent A £20 for his passage in the special train of the former. Before the engine, however, had quite got up its steam, a third agent arrived, and was fortunate enough to make a similar bargain with the agent A; so that the gentleman who paid the £37 not only obtained his special train for nothing, but cleared £13 into the bargain.

AMALGAMATIONS.—An important correspondence has taken place between the Great Western and South Western Companies. The Directors of the latter company, by letter dated October 30, express great surprise at the announcement of an intended line to promote a new direct line between London and Exeter, by way of Hungerford, Westbury, and Yeovil, such plan never having been communicated to them or the Board of Trade. These and other events, they say, show the circumstances have so altered with respect to the question of further communication towards Exeter and Cornwall, that the principles which guided the Board of Trade in their report are by no means applicable. They, therefore, propose to address themselves immediately to the Board of Trade, and ascertain their opinion as to the formation by the South Western Company of a line by Salisbury and Yeovil to Exeter and Cornwall. Consistently with this intention, they address a letter to Lord Dalhousie, requesting him to name a day for hearing a deputation from each of the companies. The Board of Trade declines to interfere; and, in a letter dated the 7th of November, the Directors of the South Western declare that they have come to the conclusion that their company is at liberty to act as it shall deem advisable for its interests. The Directors of the Great Western deny that they have broken the agreement of the 24th of January, by severing which, they say, the whole question arises; and consider the other company as guilty of a gross breach of faith towards them.——The Lancashire and North York Company have amalgamated with the Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Company. The Blackburn, Darwen, and Bolton, an existing railway, has also been amalgamated with the same line.

FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

MAINE AND NECKAR.—The section from Heidelberg to Frankfort will be opened to the public in May next. A temporary bridge will necessarily have to be erected on the Neckar, in order that the line may cross that river. Shortly afterwards a magnificent stone bridge will be built.

DARMSTADT AND FRANKFORT.—Several experimental trips have now taken place on this line, all of which have terminated most favourably, and it is expected that, by the 1st of April next, the whole line will be opened for public traffic.

HANOVER AND BREMEN.—The Minister of the Interior at Hanover, does all in his power to hasten the construction of this railway. The measures taken are so efficacious, that in the course of 1847 the whole line will be brought into operation.

ATHENS AND PIRAUS.—Much joy and excitement have been created in the public mind at Athens, by the arrival of several English Commissioners, for negotiating with the Government for an English company, to construct of a railway between Athens and Piraus. The connection of the two towns in this manner would in some measure rectify the mistake of not having made Piraus the capital of Greece. One of the great difficulties in the way a project of this nature, would be the obtaining the land necessary for the purpose; the States are, however, sitting, and it would be easy to pass a law effecting that.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE EXPERIMENTAL SQUADRON.—The experimental fleet arrived in Plymouth Sound again on Wednesday, about noon, in the following order:—Vanguard 1, Albion 2, Rodney 3, Canopus 4, and the Superb last. The Darring has not yet arrived.

THE RUSSIAN MEN OF WAR IN PLYMOUTH SOUND.—The Grand Duke Constantine of Russia and the line of battle ship and corvette have not yet left Plymouth Sound, the wind having continued foul. On Tuesday, being the birth day of the Emperor of Russia, his Majesty's ships, the Ingermanland, 80, and the Prince of Warsaw, 80, were dressed with various coloured flags, and at 11 A.M., fired a royal salute. The British ships, the Queen, 110, bearing the flag of the Port Admiral, and the President, 50, bearing the flag of Rear Admiral Dacres, in Plymouth Sound, and the Caledonia, 120, flag ship of Rear Admiral Fynn, in Hamoaze, paid the same compliment to the Emperor at 12 o'clock, the standard of England being hoisted at the main, and the Russian standard being run up at the foremast of their ships, during the salute of 21 guns.

RETIREMENT OF LORD ALAN CHURCHILL.—Lord Alan Churchill, son of the Duke of Marlborough, after a brief service, has retired from the army. His lordship held commissions in the 8th Hussars and the 6th Dragoon Guards.

REPORTED INTENTION OF THE GOVERNMENT TO REPEAL THE CORN LAWS. The following is from the Times, which is generally the best authority in all matters of news, but we confess there seems some doubt about its accuracy in this occasion. The paragraph appeared in the Times of Thursday morning, and a Cabinet Council had been summoned for the after noon of the same day. The important subject of the Corn Laws was in all probability discussed at this meeting; but it is not likely that any decision upon the course to be taken could have transpired beforehand. "The decision of the Cabinet is no longer a secret. Parliament, it is confidently reported, is to be summoned for the first week in January; and the Royal Speech will, it is added, recommend an immediate consideration of the Corn Laws, preparatory to their total repeal. Sir Robert Peel in one house, and the Duke of Wellington in the other, will, we are told, be prepared to give immediate effect to the recommendation thus conveyed."

A WEEK'S GOSSIP.

"He hath strange places cramm'd
With observation—the which he vents
In mingled fancies." SHAKSPEARE.

What should the chronicler of the week's wonders, the fisher-up of the straws that float on the surface of the time, gossip of but Railways? True, the fever has passed from furious to intermittent; but there are symptoms of the convalescence as curious as those of the disorder. Sailors will tell you of the long sullen swell which follows a gale—when, though there is no breath of wind to stir a reef point, old Ocean rolls and wallows as if the sore throes were still agitating his entrails—and so it is with us, just subsiding from the storm of speculation. One of the most ludicrous and yet saddest symptoms of our return to sanity, is the crop of legal questions that seem likely to spring from the large seed of scrip that has been so freely sown by the speculators. Are directors responsible to shareholders, and shareholders to directors?—can the deluded sue the deluders at law, or in equity?—can scrip be forfeited at pleasure, or is it like Dejanira's poisoned shirt, to stick to the unhappy wearer whether he like it or no? The Times says one thing, the Chronicle another one asserts that 7 and 8 Victoria, section 26, applies to Railways, the other denies it: and unhappy scripholders, or directors, afflicted with unwonted qualms of conscience, look bewildered from one contradictory opinion to another. What a cleverly constructed statute that must be, which, framed expressly for controlling speculation in joint stock companies of all kinds, leaves it uncertain whether it include Railways—the most rife and most important of all!

Then there have been graver effects of this Railway madness—failures, and frauds, and suicides—meantime, the world, anxious to display its gratitude to George Hudson for all these blessings, is subscribing its tens of thousands for a memorial,

"As worshippers do, giving their sum of more
To him that hath too much."

Here is a song for Mr. Hudson's special singing:—

'Tis I'm the Railway King,
And where is the King so free?
No profits my projects may bring,
But still bring a profit to me.
My subjects are not only able
But willing to pay for my cheer;
So I feast at the Premier's table,
And drop in to sup here with a peer.
For I'm the Railway King;

A King and a true one is he
Who reigns by arithmetic clear,
Whose charter is writ a. s. d.,
And whose rule to his subjects is dear.
That mane is so all spranchil,
Though in truth 'tis an ironical,
Who rains against me in the end
Will be forced to admit he's a fool.
For I am the Railway King!

I suppose I'm no more than a man,
But really 'tis hard to think so;
For they'd make me believe, if they can,
That I am a god here below.
Capel courts my Royal domain,
Where the sport of stag hunting I take,
And the bulls a. d the bears there are fan
To be tame when my sceptre I shake.
For I am the Railway King!

And so his Railway Majesty has really taken "Gibraltar"—we mean one of the large houses at the Albert Gate—so called because it was thought that, like that famous fortress, they "would never be taken;" and there, appropriate emblem, stands stately over each gateway a stag, of at least ten brevakes, not to speak of trunk lines. Was the builder gifted with a prophetic vision?

But we have more matter for mirth, and with less smack of bitterness in it—for there is something sad in the common wearying, of which the Keble performed before George Hudson, Esq., is a reflection, in the scene round the office of the Board of Trade on Sunday night last—the better day the better deed—when the agents of some 570 lines deposited their plans and references there, in obedience to the standing orders—so called, we presume, from the impediments they throw in the way of public business.

What a night that might be when all the runs of desperate agents striving to outwit each other—of collisions of special trains, and solicitors seriously injuring each other in the smash—of broken-winded post horses, and plans smuggled on long Railway lines in sequess and in baskets—of those who arrived too soon, and those who came too late—of wonderful solicitors, who assure you they have not been in bed for a fortnight—of steam clerks, who have gone on copying estimates, and performing abstruse calculations, with their eyes shut, and in a sheer state of sleeping companions as fast asleep, and as hard at work, as themselves—of lithographers fraudulently stealing each other's stones, to baffle competing lines—of turnpike men who wouldn't wake to let anxious agents through the gates, and unusually stupid post-boys, who didn't know where the Office of the Board of Trade was, any more than the sagest gentleman they drove.

We cannot resist the temptation of trying our hand at a scene or two, which, if ever the historical drama of our time is written, may figure well in the play of "Victoria and Albert," and which we place at the disposal of any future Shakspeare who may arise appropriate to our era—

SCENE I.—A Central Railway Terminus. Agents rushing about with plans; special trains coming and going; porters, clerks, &c.

1*st Agent.* One hundred pieces for a special train!

2*nd Agent* Two hundred, by my halidame!

Railway Clerk (aside). Now by my faith, and by the holy poker—
Emblem of stoker's worship—I do swear
This is fine sporting weather for us genls.
Our governors must turn the money in
By constant turning out of special trains.

(A Special Train appears.)

Clerk. The special train for London!

1*st Agent*. Mine! (Rushes towards it)

2*nd Agent*. (Seizing him)—Villain, thou liest!

1*st Agent*. Thy words are actionable! (To his Clerk.) Take them down.

3*d Agent*. The chance is mine! (Steals towards train while the others are quarrelling, and jumps in.)

For London, ho!

(The train steams off—the other agents utter expressions of agony and disappointment.)

1*st Agent*. A horse! a horse! a hundred for a horse! (Exeunt disperesdly.)

SCENE II.—Like Shakspeare's "On a Ship at Sea," shall be "In a First-class Carriage on the Line."

Jenkins (an Agent, alone, looking at his watch nervously). When things of this sort are done, then 'tis well
They be done quickly; but this is too fast! [Carriage swings fearfully.]
The stoker must be drunk: he feels not how
He tears the fortune of the Jen'kins Line,
And me, its Cæsar. Ha! What sound was that? [He looks out of the window.]
Oh, agony! another special train
Is coming up behind, and I can see
The hated agent of the rival line!
'Tis Tomkins. Lo, with fiendish glee, he shakes
His fist at me from out his carriage window. [Frantically from front window.]
Stoker, more steam, or we shall all be smashed.
His gestures say it is impossible!
Now, by my troth, but this is very dreadful. [With resignation.]
A victim to the company! fall,
And to my duty! [He folds the plans round his body, and then surveys himself.]
Yes; this is glory's genuine great coat!
So wraps the dying chief his country's flag
Around him! Never shall these cherished plans Adorn proud Tomkins' triumph. Ha! it comes.

[A crash. Jenkins is shot out of the window. The carriage disappears in a cloud of small fragments.

Tomkins (without, à la O. Smith). Ha! ha! ha! ha!

SCENE III.—Exterior of the Office of the Board of Trade. A large illuminated clock on the centre points to half past eleven. The hands more gradually forwards while this scene is going on. A crowd laden with papers is struggling to get in at the doorway.

Inspector Otway. What ho! John Smith!

Inspector Otway (with dignity, but disgust). Methinks there be twelve John Smiths in the field,
And aux call out each one, instead of one!
Once more I summon John Smith, agent for The Great North Diddlesex and Grabbit Valley.

John Smith (extricating himself with difficulty from the crowd). I feit 'twas I! Lead on, I'll follow thee!

[Rushes off, Inspector Otway solemnly beckoning him.

1*st Mob*. Well, you're a precious lot of fellers, you are!

2*nd Mob*. Wen'son, methinks, is precious cheap to night,
Ven stags thus congregates!

3*rd Mob*. Twig that 'ere smouch.

4*th Mob*. Wot 'll take for yer hat?

[Agents turn away in silence. A wounded Agent is borne on by two Policemen.

Wounded Agent. Nay, leave me, friends. 'Twas nothing but a stun.
I'm better now; and what if broken limbs
Had been my lot, still had I saved my time.
Behold! my cab broke down, but here I am.

[Strikes an attitude, and points to the clock.

Enter Tomkins, he appears moody).

Tomkins. I wish I had not smashed him; yes, I wish
They'd given the job unto another man.
Poor fellow! how he flew when my fast train
Ran into his! Tomkins, 'twas not the stoker—
'Twas thou that did'st the deed. Horrible thought,
I am a Railway murderer; but, pshaw,
He would have done as much for me, I know;
And yet—poor Jenkins—we were fellow clerks,
Sat on one stool, swigged porter from one bottle.
Would that he lived! (Weeps).

[En.er Jenkins, his head bandaged, his arm in a sling. He staggers faintly towards, and, speaking with long intervals between the words].

Jenkins. The clock! The clock! What is the time of night?
Mine eyes are dim! I can—not—see—the—clock.

Policeman (gruffly). Quarter to twelve!

Jenkins. Oh! bless thee for the word.
Jenkins hath managed to fulfil his trust,
Though wounded sore. Now I can die in peace.

Tomkins. That voice! (in horror).

Jenkins. My rival—once my friend—John Tomkins! say,
Was that well done to run into me so?

Tomkins Art thou a ghost—a spiritual Jenkins?

Jenkins. Not so: the real article: flesh and blood!

Tomkins (remorsefully). His leg, he lives!

Jenkins (cheerfully). And no bones broke to speak of.

Tomkins. Come to my arms, much injured friend, Oh come—

[As they approach to embrace, Inspector Otway appears at the door.]

Inspector. George Jenkins!

Jenkins. Ha! We'll put off our embrace
Until next time. [Rushes into office.

[During this scene the stage has been gradually cleared of agents with plans. The mob remain grouped right and left. The clock is within two minutes of twelve.]

Inspector Otway (with the door in his hand,. Two minutes more and we shut up the shop;
And then 'twill not be opened, tho' Prince Halbert,
The Royal Consort, with his Prussian bubbles,
Cryed, "Open, Otway, open to thy Prince!"

[Clock strikes twelve; as the last stroke is heard, a cab drives furiously on. A huge pie is thrown from the front window, and falls between the door-post and the door which Otway is just closing. He is so terrified at his shutting it.]

Inspector Otway.—Od rot the plan! This is unregular!

Agent (stepping from a cab).—I call you all to witness I have made the regulsite deposits!

[Sinks exhausted into the arms of the cabman. His pockets are examined, and he is borne off into an adjoining tap.]

Inspector.—Well, that's the last whoe'er the next may be!
So help me! three strong men and a steam-engine.

[Hastily shuts door. Heavy bolts are heard to clank inside. All is quiet.]

1*st Mob*. Well, the fun's over. I'll to bed.

2*nd Mob*. And I
To whack my wife. The night is cold, and I
Have not the wherewithal to warm me.

[A chaise and four gallops on. Three gents leap out.]

1*st Gent*. Past twelve!

2*nd Gent*. Done brown!

3*rd Gent (furiously)*. Who dares to say done brown?
'Tis not we are to blame—it is the clocks!

[Shakes his fist at the dial plate.

I do impugn thy truth, thou lying clock!
It is not twelve—it must not, cannot, be!
And thou, infernal post-boy (seizing him), did'st not say
Thou knew'st the Office of the Board of Trade,
And yet hast driven wildly, through all sorts
Of streets in Pimlico, and sold us thus!
Take that, and that, and that. (Kicks boy.)

1*st Mob*. Shame! Shame! Shame!

2*nd Mob*. Hit one of your own size.

3*rd Mob*. Ah!

3*rd Gent*. Bear with me, friends. Our's is a most hard case.
We've spent much money; we have had no dinner;
We got to town at ten, yet here we are,
Late after all. 'Tis very hard to bear!

[Buries his face in his handkerchief.

1*st Mob*. Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! Sich spoonics! Sarves you right.

3*rd Gent*. Inhuman wretches! But no matter (faintly swooning with his hand), I die! (He is lifted into the chaise. His friends follow him. Slow music. Scene closes).

And so ends our drama of "The 30th of November, or the Plans Deposited." The title would not read badly on a minor playbl.

On Thursday the town was startled into a sense of propriety by the announcement in the Times that Parliament was to beconvened in January, and measures taken for repealing the Corn laws Good, if true. Sir Robert has just nicked it, Lord John's impudence was a high hand; there he is higher we left, before the going—gone—passed into gone, and the public hammer knocked down the last bidder. The wary customer has made the bid, and secured the lot. Peel can carry Free trade—Lord John now could not have done it. This decision comes apropos to set at rest all fears of a quarrel with our excellent brother Jonathan, whose bread-stuffs will now find a market. He knows better than to fight with a good customer, though the notions of mason and tuson are very lax indeed. But he will learn, in time, that truth and honesty cannot be repudiated quite as readily as bank bonds, and that the power which issues these debentures, of humanity, will be learned to be each of us, on starting in life, is one which laughs at democratical vapouring, and columns of occupation.

A column of this novel kind is advertised to start for California. Each man to bring a rifle, or large shot gun; so much powder and shot; provisions; and a waggon for every family of eight. We would suggest the addition of a light field-piece for every half dozen families, and a complete ambulance, or field hospital, for each community that swells this novel kind of crusade—a crusade which seems to preach that democracy is to supersede law, and territorial right, and religion; and that a man has only to be an out-and-out native American—i.e., hater of foreigners, and thick and-thin demagogue—to repudiate his debts, stab the man who offends him, take possession of his neighbour's field, and call all the world rogues and scoundrels that don't applaud and follow the example. Great encouragement this for honest advocates of progress, and popular improvement at home!

Meanwhile, what is England doing to prepare for the encounter, should democracy prevail over the sounder Anglo-Saxon element of the American public? She is talking about harbours of protection, examining and furbishing up the guns at Portsmouth and Devonport, and calling out the Pensioners. It is all very well to expect that every man will make a stand for his country, but it is hard to demand it peculiarly of those who have only just begun to stand upon, and, as for their wives and children, how can we, when every man has only one, which he must want for his private defence? These poor fellows had long ago squared accounts with glory thus:—

"Pay to Sir Stubbs to Madame Glory—Dr. to one contused rheumatism and 6d. a day. Received, John Stubbs."

And it is hard to call upon them now to contract fresh liabilities to that very unsatisfactory paymistress, the nation, and to divide, i.e. those which fall to the commanding officers, seldom amount to more than 6s. 8d. in the pound, while the poorer creditors must be satisfied with a farthing, or perhaps a mere I O U on some bankrupt nothing in any court of law.

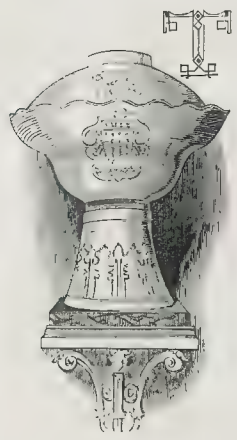
Besides, there are so many young men mere recruits, who have not a fair chance for their share of glory yet, and it is hard that their prospects should be interfered with by the peaceful veterans, who have called out from the shade of his laurels to reconvert his pruning hook into a sword and his night cap into a shako.

Thank our stars, however, we have a stouter defence to trust to than the Pensioner, ay, or the standing army either, or the battery, or the fleet, and that is the mutual interest of nations, now that the fetters are being taken off, that have prevented the growth of kindly feelings, as much as of the inter dependent sources of common national prosperity.

EARL STANHOPE AND THE CORN LAWS. Earl Stanhope has written a letter, declining an invitation to dine with the Cambridgeshire Farmers' Association, in the course of which he speaks thus energetically upon the proposed repeal of the Corn Laws. The noble earl says:—"If that measure is to be considered as inevitable, from the zeal and perseverance of those who oppose Corn Laws, and from the lamentable torpor of those who ought to support them, I do not, like Lord Ashley, wish or seek any compromise, in order, as he expresses it, to 'break the force of an inevitable blow.' On the contrary, if free trade is to be applied with respect to corn, the same principle must also be applied with respect to all other articles of general consumption, and to all the other products of British industry; and in such a case let the repeal of all protective duties be immediate and entire. Under such circumstances, I say again, as I did in the House of Lords, 'I throw down the gauntlet, and dare you to the attempt.'" Earl Stanhope speaks of the present Ministry in these terms:—"The free-trade policy of the present Ministers, who would never have been restored to power if their new Corn Laws and their new Tariff had been expected or those who supported them at the last general election—the base and treacherous and unprincipled conduct of so many of their adherents, who, by an utter disregard of their promises and professions, have covered themselves with indelible disgrace, and justly incurred the hatred or contempt of their fellow citizens—the indefatigable exertions and reckless attempts which are made by some enemies of the Corn Laws—and the culpable supineness of the agricultural community, which seems at present to be quite benumbed and paralysed—all these circumstances concur in placing this country in a state of the utmost danger, from which it could be rescued only by that which I have so often, but so ineffectually, recommended—by energy and union."

PIGEON FLYING.—On Monday, a pigeon, belonging to Mr. Dalton, of Kennington, flew from Dover to London in one hour and twenty-five minutes.

SALE OF THE BECKFORD COLLECTION.



VASE WITH CHINESE FORMS.

THE SIXTH DAY (Wednesday), was, perhaps, the most attractive in the entire Sale. We briefly reported its results in our Journal of last week; but their importance warrants our return to some of the items.

The several Lots disposed of on this day were the contents of the Crimson Drawing-room, engraved in our No. for Nov. 22: they consisted chiefly of China, and Costly Furniture; the competition for many of the rarest articles being amusingly great. Among the former was a pair of Indian Bottles, Mazarine blue and gold (370), which sold for five guineas; a Cream Ewer, figure subject, mounted in silver gilt (373), £8; a pair of Chocolate Cups (375), £6 15s.; a pair of enamelled Basins, 6 guineas; a pair of scalloped Dishes, 15 guineas! Among the Furniture, an octagonal Oak Table, the upper part of deal, brought £12 10s.; and the Fonthill Chairs four guineas each. The Florentine Mosaic Table (416) is, indeed, a superb article: "the centre is formed of a large oval slab of beautiful Oriental alabaster, and the exquisitely designed borders and devices are composed of lapis lazuli, hero antico, and other costly marbles: it is supported by boldly carved standards and trusses, with gilt mouldings and enrichments; dimensions, 6 feet 5, by 4 feet 9½ inches. The weight of this table was stated to be nearly 1 cwt. According to Mr. English's statement, his Grace the Duke of Hamilton would not have parted with it but for the circumstance that he had several others of the same description. On once suggesting a sale of some articles that might be dispensed with, this table was named, and Mr. Beckford expressed a determination not to take less than £1,000 for it. The original cost of it, said Mr. English, was only £150 less than that sold at Fonthill for £1,800. It was knocked down at 370 guineas. The fancy cabinets of various descriptions sold to-day were exquisitely designed and carved, and in every respect specimens of the most admirable skill in workmanship. They were disposed of in pairs at 30 and 36 guineas a pair."—Bath Chronicle.

Next, we have engraved (396) an exquisitely carved Ivory Vase and Cover, of Eastern workmanship, representing the metamorphoses of the Goddess Buddha; the inside lined with silver gilt.

We now come to the Etruscan Vases, of which we spoke but incidentally last week. The first (417) is 17½ inches high, very perfect, and of exquisite form, enriched with figures emblematic of the Eleusinian Mysteries. This is engraved in the centre of the group at page 344, it sold for 39 guineas. The next (418) three lobe-lipped, is of rarer variety, and bears a griffin and three finely-drawn figures engaged in sacrifice; the leaves of the laurel worn by the victorious rider of the griffin being of pure gold: this fine specimen of antique art realised 60 guineas. Then came the Etruscan Vase presumed to be unique (419), a black-bearded Bacchus, riding on a dromedary, is surrounded by minstrels and dancing figures: the zones of Bacchus and his attendants are enriched with beaten gold; and the graceful form of this precious vase has been much commended: after an intense competition, it was knocked down at 210 guineas! We have engraved the two vases last described. With respect to the large Etruscan Vase engraved last week, it may be remarked that it is common to ascribe representations on Etruscan Vases somewhat promiscuously, as emblematic of the Eleusinian Mysteries; but, in this case, the presentation of eggs, and the presence of other appropriate devices, are held to be sufficient for authenticity. Another peculiarity in this vase is the presence of a second pigment: the figures are of the colour of the clay (red), upon a black ground; and there is some appearance of white in the bracelets, anklets, &c., worn by the figures. The principal purchases of this day were for the Marchioness of Hastings, Lord W. Powlett, Marquis of Douglas, J. Morrison, Esq., of Fonthill, J. H. S. Pigott, Esq., — Hope, Esq., M.P., Mr. Robinson, and the British Museum.

Thursday (the Seventh Day) consisted of the remainder of the contents of the Crimson Drawing-room; and the rarities from the Scarlet Room, engraved last week: they comprised china; cabinets, coffers, and tables, agate vases, &c. The china birds on stumps of trees (one engraved last week) were bought by Mr. Nathan, for fourteen guineas and a half; 477.—A Japan cabinet basin, mounted in silver-gilt, brought the high price of £8 18s. A pair of pollard and Riga oak pedestal cabinets, with black marble plinths, and Italian porphyry slabs (in the Scarlet Room), were also knocked down to Mr. Nathan, for 74 guineas. The oak Fonthill pattern chairs produced £5 14s. per chair; bought by the same; as was also 500, a beautiful Oak Tripod, with a circular top of rare Lumachello marble from the Himalaya mountains; 37 guineas.

Next, we have engraved a group of Crystal, Agate, and Jasper Vases, &c.; chiefly from this Day's Sale. First, however, numerically, in the centre of the group, is a tall Crystal Vase and Cover, with silver-gilt mountings (379); and above it is a two-handled Jad Cup (421). To the right of the Crystal Vase, is (505), a Cup of beautiful ribbon Jasper, with gilt mountings, bought by Mr. Raven, for 8 guineas. Still further right is (514), a Tazza of botryioidal chalcedony, mounted on six chimeras, with coral pendant, and cover of precious agate, exhibiting an entire fortification, with rim of chased and engraved gold; the border dight with animals and arabesques, and the cover surmounted by a finely-sculptured Hercules in coral: this was knocked down to Mr. Raven, at 74 guineas. To the left of the centre Crystal Vase is (504), an Agate Vase, with elaborate silver-gilt mountings, and figures of Neptune and a dolphin; bought by Mr. Raven, for 20 guineas; and still further left, is (503), a dark, polished egg-shaped Agate, on a filagree gold stand, and surmounted by a group of flowers in gold, of antique workmanship; bought by the purchaser of the lot last named, for 10½ guineas.

We have still to mention another Engraving—that attached to the initial at the commencement of this paper (512), a delicate Indian china Vase and cover, bearing scrolls and tablets, and Chinese poems.

The classic item in the opposite column, page 365, is one of a pair of Alabaster Tazzas, (lot 594,) 17½ inches in diameter, with marked heads boldly carved in relief, the under part fluted; they are on bronzed tripod stands, 3 feet 9 inches high; the pair brought £14 3s. 6d.

Among the more costly lots of this day, were two green Crackle Jars, 20 and 22 guineas; very high prices. The pair of China Storks (one engraved last week) was bought by Mr. English, for £17 6s. 6d. The bamboo-pattern Chinese Coffee-pots (one engraved last week) brought the large sum of 10 guineas. A pair of Riga and pollard oak coffers (520) was bought at 115 guineas, for the Marquis of Exeter: and an Egyptian-granite table was knocked down to Mr. Nathan at 34 guineas. Altogether, the China brought unprecedentedly high prices: in one instance, a pair of dishes, not worth 15s., produced £5. A single Agate cup and saucer, too, brought 23 guineas.

Friday, (the Eighth Day,) comprised the contents of the Belvedere, or Lantern; the two Libraries; the Sanctuary, and the Vestibule. These consisted of Cabinets and Console Tables; Etruscan Vases, old China, &c. There is little noticeable among the lots of furniture; the prices of the Etruscan Vases ranged from £5 to £24; Rossi's marble Statue of St. Anthony of Padua, and the Infant Saviour, (engraved last week,) brought £34 2s. 6d.; and the Peterhead granite Colossal Vase, (engraved in our No. for Nov. 22,) was sold for £94 10s. The very fine pair of Roman seats (Riga and pollard oak,) in the Vestibule, brought £27 6s.; and another pair to match, £28 7s. Among the old China were several extraordinary prices: as, a pair of Sevres Goblets, 10 guineas; four octagonal plates, 13 guineas; a pair of very fine plates, of Raffaelle ware—Abraham's Sacrifice, and Jacob's Dream—rich in colour, £16 5s. 6d.; an enamelled dessert dish, £6 10s.; and an Indian figure China bowl, £9 19s. 6d. An onyx Snuff-box, cut in the form of a tortoise, with ruby eyes, crystallized agate top, &c., realised £32 12s.

We have still to describe one of the apartments—the Etruscan Library. The ceiling and book-cases are of oak, of elegant design, relieved with scarlet, purple and gold; on the frieze of the book-cases are emblazoned heraldic devices. The carpet is crimson, quatrefoil pattern; and the window has the usual gilt trellis-work, or grille. The colours of this exquisite apartment are brought into perfect harmony; and it is altogether calculated for the enjoyment of "calm contemplation and poetic ease."

THE ETRUSCAN LIBRARY.

EXQUISITELY CARVED EASTERN IVORY VASE AND COVER.

Thus terminated the Sale of the Beckford Collection of Rarities in Art; or, rather, a portion of them, for we understand that all the treasured objects Mr. Beckford especially cared for, have been removed from the Tower to the mansion in Lansdown Crescent. There are, for instance, according to the well-considered report in the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette, "the Babylonish cup, formed of some vitreous substance, with figures brilliant in colour, and covered with figures so fused and blended with the material that it seems hopeless to conjecture what means have been employed to produce the effect. The candlesticks of standard gold, from designs by Holbein; or those still more rare, which, when the peerless Alhambra was in all its glory, formed a portion of its regal luxury. The mighty vase, sculptured from a single gem — the precious opal, polished throughout. Rubens made drawings of this wonderful vase, and separate drawings of the various details. The originals are, we believe, in the collection of his Grace the Duke of Devonshire; etchings from them, and also the engravings, are in the British Museum. Pine-cones and vines, and various fruits sacred to Bacchus, are introduced on the exterior: yet the form suggests a sepulchral destination. We could enumerate hundreds of the finest works of the purest Greek, the Florentine, and the Italian art, some of which have occasionally been seen in Lansdown Tower; others, which have always been kept in the cabinets built for their display in the apartments furnished purposely to receive them. Of Limoges enamel there were in the Tower dishes large as a warrior's shield; the border gorgeous arabesque, and the field displaying classical subjects, many of them designed by Julio Clovio; ivory, which revealed the very thoughts of that most eccentric, daring prince of artists, Benvenuto Cellini."

We should add, that the sale was ably conducted by the Auctioneer, whose intelligence and piquancy were displayed in many well-timed anecdotes of the valuables and their possessors.

The following additional "jottings" from the Bath Chronicle, may be interesting:—

Since the memorable sale at Strawberry Hill, perhaps the auctioneer's hammer has not been invested with a trust of greater magnitude, or one which has proved more attractive to wealthy purchasers. That the dispersion of these rich possessions, amassed, as they were, by a gentleman of such consummate discrimination and refined taste, as a collector of rare productions of art and nature, should excite more than ordinary attention, and hold out a powerful temptation to men of his own class, was not to be wondered at. Connoisseurs, far and wide, knew of his vast collections, and contemplated their transfer into different hands as a momentous matter. Commissioned agents, of known reputation as experienced judges of articles of vertu, were deputed by opulent collectors, residing in different parts of the kingdom, to attend the sale, with almost ad libitum credentials for competition. Curators of various public museums, we are told, had also their agents at this important sale.

Among the conditions was one that no advance less than a shilling was to be taken on any bidding under £5, and above that sum, five shillings, and so on in proportion; but the competition was generally too spirited to require any monitory reference to the rule. The bidders would often leave the minimum boundary far behind, as if determined to steal a march on each other by leaps and strides, in order to secure the prize in view.

Among the notabilia of the First Day, we may mention ten cups and saucers (described as mazarine and gold and finely pencilled) knocked down at seven guineas; a set of 14 dessert enamelled dishes, at nine guineas; 11 enamelled plates at £5; and a pair of fine enamelled eggshell cups and saucers at £3 6s. But the lot which excited the warmest competition, and which was considered the greatest marvel as regards the sum for which it was knocked down, was that of four cups and saucers with rare yellow ground, which were bought at the price of twelve guineas and a-half! They were started at two guineas, and from that advanced at first but slowly, when a hint from the auctioneer respecting the value put upon them by the late possessor gave a sudden impulse to the biddings, and in a few moments they reached ten guineas, and thence, by two or three bounds, to the large sum for which they were sold. It is needless to say that expressions of astonishment passed round the room at such an enterprise in competitive bidding. The purchaser of these brittle gems, as if calculating on the possibility of an accident producing a great depreciation in their value, would not suffer them to be afterwards placed out of his view; and, taking them into his possession, he deposited them in a cabinet close by his side. The purchase in question has given rise to much surprise, as if the buyer had done an act which evinced a defective knowledge of the legitimate use of money. That his bargain is a dear one there is no doubt; but it is to be recollected that though the sum given for the articles far exceeded their intrinsic worth, their extreme rarity is such as to render their relative value, in a collection of curiosities, very high. It is probable that they cannot be matched; and this fact may be the true secret of the ardour with which they were competed for by the rival bidders. It is also to be remembered that a bidder, determined to have an article or articles at any price, being, perhaps, a purchaser otherwise to a large extent, has the opportunity of balancing against his excess in one instance several other purchases which prove to be good bargains.

In the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette, it is noted:—"We have watched the progress of the sale; and never did we witness such competition for what nine-tenths of the world would regard as trifles. China plates, for example, sold at 36 guineas the dozen, similar to what, upon ordinary occasions, might be purchased at five shillings each. Cups and saucers, perfectly useless from their delicacy, brought three and four guineas each. In this way, for china, which we fancy could be matched for fifty pounds, there has been realised five hundred and ninety guineas! We have observed artists employed in sketching the general forms of the beautiful Etruscan Vases, and making careful studies of the exquisite figures which embellish them. To the most uneducated eye, Mr. Beckford's selection of those precious works of remote antiquity conveys a feeling of admiration and wonder. Some of the figures are buoyant with life—the action spirited—and the flowing draperies waving in undulating lines of the most graceful combinations. We have contemplated with astonishment many of those wonderful groups, engaged evidently in some mystic rites. There is a solemnity and grandeur of manner in the artistical arrangement, totally unlike anything that we had ever previously seen. It is really astonishing that mere outlines can be rendered so full of expression. We have been told that some of the figures, of animals especially, are not well drawn, the action being exaggerated; but this very extravagance is poetical, and adds to the charm. Severe study and careful investigation are needful to the understanding of such occult groups. But, apart from all that does not speak of heathen mythology, there is much that is deeply interesting in such admirably-perfect—we are told unique—specimens of that unquestionable evidence which antiquaries claim for the people who have ceased to live now upwards of two thousand years."

MUSIC.

MR. H. PHILLIPS AND THE OPERA OF MARITANA.

We have received the following letter, which we willingly insert, premising that the Italics are those of the writer:—

21 December, 35, Hart-street, Bloomsbury.

SIR,—I value so highly the admirable notices which at various times appear in your most interesting journal, relative to my profession, that I am induced to correct a little error—I think—in judgment where you speak of me in "Maritana."

You say "I have vitiated my taste, and ruined my lower notes, by singing in America tenor songs."

I assure you, Sir, this is unfounded. I never do, or did sing tenor songs; and the lower part of my voice was at least twice the power I even boasted before, obtained by an accession of health in the pure and clear climate of America.

Again, I avoided the possibility of vitiating my taste, by never singing any but classical songs, and those in the concert-room; for in the American theatres I did not appear.

My voice is naturally high, approaching within a semitone of a tenor; consequently, the lower part of my voice was never powerful.

The music of "Maritana," charming and masterly as it is, is not suited, unfortunately, to me, the melodies lying in the middle of my voice, where I have least power to express in tone or declamation. This has arisen from two causes; first, that the composer, when those songs were written, had never heard me sing; and, secondly, that they are ill-placed, situations having been created after the opera was finished.

I trust these remarks may rid you of the impression that I have in any way neglected my study or practice, which is never likely I should, having arrived at that fortunate period when I am just wise enough to know that I am ignorant.

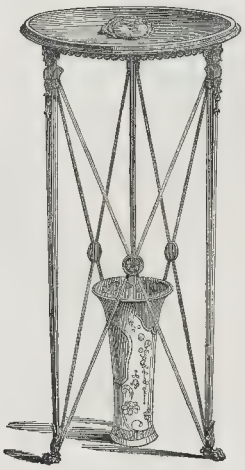
I am, Sir, your obliged servant,
HENRY PHILLIPS.

We might leave the above communication without a note, inasmuch as Mr. Mr. Phillips candidly avows that the music is not suited to him; but the question arises whether we are to regard that eminent vocalist as a basso, a baritone, or a tenor. We have a distinct recollection—and a most pleasurable one—of having heard Mr. Phillips sing the bass parts in the operas of "Der Freyschutz," the "Oracle," the "Freebooters" the "Vampire," &c., at the English Opera House under Mr. Arnold's management. We presume that the music of Hela in the "Mountain Sylph," his original character, is for a bass; and it will not be denied, perhaps, that Mr. Phillips in the "Messiah," "Creation," &c. has fulfilled the task allotted to the primo basso.

But if we come to another order of music, which Mr. Phillips, if he pleases, may call "classical," but which, according to the ordinary acceptation of that term, means something widely different, we would ask in what clef Mr. Phillips sings Charles Dibdin's tenor songs of "Poor Meridian," "Jolly Dick the Lamplighter," and other popular ballads? We will, however, refer to the ballad in Mr. Wallace's opera, "In Happy Moments," which is strictly within the range of the tenor clef, and if Mr. Phillips's voice be still a pure basso, why did he not descend the scale on Saturday night in the cadence, instead of taking the higher F in his natural voice. The cavatina, "This Heart by Woe Overtaken," is again within the tenor range, save the opening movement, certainly better adapted for a bass voice, but which Mr. Phillips sees, curiously enough, omits. We quite agree with him, that the songs are ill-placed, and that his forte is in tone and declamation. Mr. Phillips takes his rank in the last-mentioned style with the veteran Braham, and we have no doubt that if the opportunity be afforded our great baritone, for such we must designate him, will take his revenge for the "misfit" in "Maritana."

THE MUSICAL SEASON OF 1846.

From the accounts that reach us from France, Italy, and Germany, the forthcoming season is likely to be extremely interesting. Letters from Vienna announce that Parish Alvars, the harpist and composer, is about to return to this country, having given his farewell concert on the 16th of November, after a residence of ten years on the Continent. On this occasion he produced a Symphony and a Pianoforte Concerto, both of which elaborate works obtained the approbation of the critics and amateurs. The band of the Imperial Theatre executed these compositions admirably; and Czerny, the celebrated writer, expressed his warm appreciation of Mr. Alvars's genius to Mr. Ella, of "The Musical Union," who was present. Mr Alvars is destined to have a rival in London in Mr. Reeves, an Irishman by birth, who has been also making a continental tour advantageously to his fame. Mr. Reeves is a first-rate harp performer, and in some respects an innovator. He is an excellent musician, and has extraordinarily executive faculty combined with profound feeling and consummate taste. There is a rumour that Ole Bull, the violinist, after a brilliant career in the United States, will revisit England.



ALABASTER TAZZA.

Mendelssohn is expected for the Birmingham Festival. Meyerbeer may be looked for with Jenny Lind in the spring, although it is problematical whether the latter will sing in English. Molique, the violinist, projects a visit here. Lindpainter threatens to accompany Pischek in his next advent amongst us. Standigl will be late in the season. Mrs. H. R. Bishop, after great triumphs in Italy, will be one of our fixed stars for the future. Miss Hayes, a young Irish lady of great beauty, who has been making a sensation in France and Italy, will make her début in London. Miss Birch, who has found the air of the Scala too hot for a British prima donna, will be welcomed back to the locality that she ought never to have quitted, namely, the concert-room. Miss Bassano will follow her studies for the present in Florence. Travers, a cousin of Miss Romer, is favourably spoken of as a tenore robusto in Northern Italy. Mr. Jones, the basso, clings to the sunny climate, and eschews London fogs. A lady violoncello player will be amongst the novelties.

Mr. Benedict's new opera, the libretto by M. St. Georges, and adapted by Mr. Bunn, will be produced at Drury Lane Theatre, after the run of "Maritana," which is, however, likely to draw until the middle of January. Signor Costa's appointment as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, will give a fresh impetus to that invaluable institution.

As regards her Majesty's Theatre, it is reported that engagements have been made with Grisi and Castellan, the Lablaches, Mario, and Formasari; and negotiations talked of with Rubini and others

Lear's Cantata, produced with such success at the Beethoven Festival, is in course of preparation in Paris, Jules Janin having translated Professor Wolff's words. Mr. Balfe's opera of "Estrella" was to be the first novelty at the Académie Royale.

Duprez is now in Italy. Dreyschock, the pianist, will be with us in 1846. Sir George Smart has been appointed conductor of the Manchester Choral Concerts

WHAT HAS JULLIEN DONE FOR ART?

The immense audiences congregated nightly at Covent Garden Theatre, suggests the above question; and, despite of the unbounded charlatanism of the lucky speculator, the answer must be, that if Jullien achieves nothing for art, he accomplishes a great deal for artists, and something for the public as well, inasmuch as the knowledge of instruments is promoted by his motley concerts. M Jullien, certes, is not of the classic school like Bach, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn—he has no pretension, likewise, to the romanticism and mysticism of the modern German school. He is, also, neither an originator nor an inventor, for Strauss, Musard, Valentino, Fessy, &c., anticipated the Jullien potage, in the shape of promenade concerts, with the odd admixture of the profane with the sacred styles Nor was M. Jullien of the Paris Bals Masqués the Jullien of the meridian of Green-wich. Extravagant he always was, as a conductor, but he was not outré as he is now.

ETRUSCAN VASE, PRESUMED TO BE UNIQUE.

Then, as a conductor of symphonies and overtures, M. Jullien's powers are mere mo-mishne. Such instrumentalists as Barret, Baumann, Lazarus, Platt, Jarrett. Howell, Casalar, Thirlwall, Tolbecque, Nadaud, &c., require no gyrations of the bâton, for the musical mania. They will execute themselves—perfectly spontaneity: if they followed Jullien they would be lost-men. No! no! let this acclimated mass of Gallic origin have full swing in his Quadrilles, Polkas, and Waltzes—let his body undulate with the rhythmical melody, and his stick quiver with a spasmodic beat—let him be a living illustration of his Turnaticles,—but spare us the St. Vitus's dance in the Pastorale. The power of sound, but not Sooth'e—is Jullien's element. He is supreme in brass: he is potent in parliament: Prospero and Chipp are his attendant demons—they are his familiars M. Jullien has not even the rudiments of an idea in his nature. He is essentially a burlesque and pantomimic. He is the Polichinello of combination, and the very embodiment of extravaganza as a composer.

Yet, Jullien, here an eye-sore, is popular valuable copyrights. Caution the good public against "spurious imitations" of your profound inspirations. Fall foul of the unhappy wight who seeks to counterfeit your "British Navy." Into Chancery with the daring villians who purloin your bright thoughts The man who makes music of a forge, and of the yells of a large crew, ought to be fostered and protected. There are critics who pretend that of all arts, the imitative one in music is the lowest: but M. Jullien writes music not for fame, but for the shillings. He is learned in gigantic posters—he knows the secret value of the universal puffing. He makes a fortune, and as for poor Art, why let the classics starve in their garrets. M. Jullien is a practical musician, and has proved how clever is his vocation When we glance at the distinguished talents around him, we cannot but regret their position. We do not blame them, however, for such engagements are, unfortunately, a necessity. We blame them the less, that they were not used as instruments for vulgar and degrading display.

HOMAGE TO SCHUBERT.—On the 19th of November, in Vienna, a performance of vocal music took place in the musical ground where the remains of Schubert, the celebrated song writer, are deposited. He died on the 19th of November, 1828, at the early age of 31. Three pieces were sung by a choir of male voices. "The opening dirge," writes a correspondent, "led by the soft and exquisitetones of the tenor voices, in soft and protracted notes, followed in solemn progressions of imitative parts, swelling gradually into full harmony with the entire choir, produced the deepest emotion in the spectators." The young poets, painters, and musicians forming the singing party, assembled outside the cemetery, the Catholic priests forbidding music within a burial ground PROVINCIAL CONCERTS.—Great success has attended the tour of Madame Dulcken, the pianiste; Mdlle. Schloss, the vocalist; Mr. John Parry, &c., in the northern and midland counties.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—On Friday next, Handel's "Messiah" will be given, at Exeter Hall. The fifth Concert of the British Musicians, at Erat's Saloon, is on Monday next.

THE THEATRES.

The approach of Christmas brings with it a lull in the dramatic world—at least as far as the public are concerned, for all behind the curtain is in more than usual bustle. The theatrical critic sulpys, at this time, a short holiday, to prepare himself for heavy work, on and after "boxing night," when not being engaged with the power of becoming ubiquitous at will, he is compelled to pass many evenings successively in playhouses, witnessing the novelties brought out for the holiday folks, until his visions are of nothing else but clowns insulting elderly ladies and intelligent tradesmen- harlequins jumping through clock-faces—and fairies dancing in the gaze of the pit. This has been but little novelty since our last notices: the bills of nearly all the houses have remained unchanged.

AT DRURY-LANE, Mdlle. Flora Fabbri has made a great hit, as we predicted she would do. We cannot call another instance to mind of a dancer so rapidly taking a position as a public favourite. Wallack's new drama, "Ellen Wareham," followed by the ballet, fills the house every night, and is likely to do so up till Christmas.

M. Jullien has nothing to complain of at COVENT GARDEN, where his promenades are in greater vogue than ever. Besides being the Colossus of concerts, he is the first of posting-bills. Jullien has now monopolized the entire west wing of the theatre with an enormous placard proclaiming the triumph achieved by the navy quadrilles. As a mere specimen of typography this placard monstre is worth going to see; and it is certainly one of the most ambitious exhibitions.

The most praseworthy activity still characterizes the management of the HAYMARKET. Close upon the success of "The Miseries of Human Life," Mr. Webster has produced "Paul Pry Married"—an admirable sequel to the old piece by Coyne, which was received on Saturday evening with uproarious applause. The principal character, Mr. Gorman Hudson, a harum-scarum irishman, is played to the life by Mr. Hudson, and the situations and dialogue are so thoroughly characteristic of the author, that we should almost mistaken for the real "Railway King," in which capacity he is pounced upon by two projectors to help their schemes. It was entirely an apropos piece; but kept the audience in convulsions of laughter from beginning to end, and was announced by Mr. Hudson for repetition every evening amidst general cheering.

AT the FRENCH PLAYS, Mademoiselle Martelleur has been playing in the comedietta "Un Mariage sous l'Empire" with great success. She has been previously seen here with great success. During the two past seasons, Madame Albert and Mademoiselle Nathalie each played the principal character. Mademoiselle Martelleur is by no means fearful of being thrown into the shade by her rivals. She is entirely free from stage trickeries or forced effects; indeed, she divests our minds of the idea that we are witnessing a theatrical display, so natural is her performance. Her manners are also natural. Her dress and the other characters are decidedly her best; but these trifling pieces do not give her the opportunity of exhibiting them to the best advantage. Talent had a good part, and played effectively, as well as the "Grace" of Mdlle. Nathalie. The broad-acting of Perlet was brought out by Mr. Planché under the name of "The Captain of the Guard," and afterwards by Mr. Wigan, as "Watch and Ward." On Monday the comedy of "Le Mere au Bal et la Fille à la Messe" was produced. The moral of this play is pointed at vain and worldly mothers, who seek those compliments and attentions in society which are due to their daughters, and in whose light they always stand. The comic scenes of the rivalry between the daughter depicted dissobedience and disrust follow, where there should be the greatest ingenuousness and candour. Mademoiselle St. Marc and Lafont, as usual, played the principal parts.

AT SADLER'S WELLS, the "Winter's Tale" has been brought out in a manner which calls for the highest commendation; both with respect to the admirable style in which every part was played—and especially by Messrs Phelps and Graham as Leontes and Camillo, and the great care and intelligence shown in the general getting up of the play. The statue-scene in the fifth act was a most artistic and exquisite piece of stage arrangement, and elicited the loudest applause. There is a level excellence in the productions of Sadler's Wells which is exceedingly gratifying to witness. Every piece, even to the most humble, was well played: and the "Winter's Tale" achieved the same success that has followed upon all the revivals of this praiseworthy management.

At the other houses, the pieces now in the bills will carry on the business very well until Christmas. At the STRAND Theatre, on Tuesday, an indifferent, whining performance of Hamlet created such a memorable riot two or three years ago at Covent Garden, ensued without public appearance in Sigliori. We were not present, but understand the theatre was the scene of most disgraceful tumult, reflecting but little credit upon any of the parties concerned in it.

WILL OF EARL SPENCER.—The will of the late Right Honourable John Charles, Earl Spencer, has been proved by his brother, the present Earl, the sole executor; the personal estate within the province of Canterbury was sworn under £160,000. His lordship has devised and appointed all his manors, &c., freehold, copyhold, or hereditaments, in the Counties of Nottingham, Lincoln, and York, to his brother, the present Earl (heretofore the Hon. Frederick Spencer), subject and chargeable with the payment of the legacies and annuities, and in exercise of any mortgages or other incumbrances. He has left to the Reverend Christopher Nevil, and to his brother George Nevil, Esq., £10,000 each. To Dr. Loudon, of Leamington, an annuity of £100. To his bailiff, John Hall, a legacy of £1,000, and all the short-horned cattle on the farm in Nottinghamshire, or £2,000, should the present Earl think proper to the breed and to retain the same, and to John Elliott, his bailiff on his Northamptonshire farm, he has left a legacy of £2,000. Liberal annuities to his principal servants, his huntsman, gamekeeper, gardener, butler, and annuities and legacies to other of his servants, male and female. The residue of his real estate he leaves to his brother, the present Right Honourable Frederick Earl Spencer. His Lordship's will, with a codicil, were made in the year 1840. He latterly resided on his estate at Althorp, Northamptonshire, and died on the 1st of October last, aged 68.

THE MANUSCRIPT OF GRAY'S ELEGY.—A great poetical curiosity was sold on Saturday, by Messrs. Evans, at their rooms, in New Bond-street, in the course of a sale in which were numerous books, with manuscript notes by the poet Gray, and various letters, &c., from him to various friends. As may be easily imagined, the sale excited very great interest. The great curiosity, however, was a copy of "Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard," in his own handwriting. It was written on small pieces of paper, and many variations and emendations appear in the printed copy from the early sketch. Thus, for instance, the names of Milton and Cromwell are judiciously substituted for Tully and Cæsar. Various improvements are also made in the diction, which is often altered thereby. The five stanzas are contained in this manuscript that are omitted in all the editions of his poems, but are quoted by Mathias in his notes, where he observes, "I cannot help hinting to the reader, that I think the third of these rejected stanzas equal to any in the whole Elegy." The original title given in the manuscript to the poet is, "Stanzas wrote in a Country Churchyard." This interesting relic of the bard was sold, after great competition, for £100! On Monday the sale was resumed and concluded. It realized upwards of £1200. Among the lots sold on Monday were Gray's Odes, with numerous manuscript notes by Gray, containing the author's avowal of the sources from whence he borrowed his ideas.

THE MARKETS

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday) — The arrivals of English wheat for our market this week have been on a very limited scale, hence the show of samples that grain here to-day was small. Owing, however to the good condition of most samples offered last and attention in the corn-lanes is favorable, the demand for all descriptions was unusually heavy, and prices rully maintained. As compared with last week, however, lower rates must have been submitted to. The Foreign wheat—free as well as in bond—scarcely altered in value. Of all other kinds of grain the receipts this week have been small, yet owing to the above mentioned cause, the sale for them was exceedingly depressed, at next to

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market, on Monday, opened with considerable firmness, and a growing confidence in the stability of the Foreign Exchanges generally. Consols quoted 94⅝ to ¾, for Money, and 95⅛ for Time This improved feeling continued until Thursday, when the semi-official announcement that Parliament would be called together in January, to consider the question of the Corn-Laws, for the moment damped the spirit of improvement. But the slight depression that occurred must not be attributed to the consideration of this question, as it is well known that the Ministry, and the Anti-Corn Legislature would not be proposed did not great scarcity exist. The Government organs have industriously asserted that, if a scarcity was probable, prompt measures would be taken to prevent the export of grain. The ordinary channels" of exchange, immediately depressed that barometer of the Money Market—Exchequer Bills. The last quotation is at the large reduction of 11 to 14 pm, for the present series, even when brought at a time when nightly rallied, closing at 94⅜ to 94⅝ for Account, and 94⅜ for Money. Bank Stock 203, Reduced Three per Cents. 93⅞, New Three and a Half per Cents. 95⅛, India Stock 260, and Consols for Account 94⅝.

There has been but little business transacted in the Foreign Market, although some few fluctuations have occurred. Mexican, which closed on Monday at 30⅜, gradually declined to 29⅞ on Friday, but has since receded to the closing price of 30⅜. Spanish, at the commencement of the week, quoted for the Actives 27 to 27⅜, and Three per Cents. 20⅞. A marked improvement has since occurred, and we now quote for the former 27⅝ to 28, and the latter, 27⅜ to 28. Belgian is good at 95⅝ Portuguese quotes widely, but is about 38⅝. Dutch is 93 to 93⅜ for the Four per Cent. Certificates, and 99⅛ for the Two and-a-Half per Cents; and the Brazilian closes at 81.

A decided improvement in the tone of the Share Market, both here and in the provinces, may be confidently relied on. The last setting passed off with much facility; and considerable improvement, many from good purchases, is to be noted in both London and Birmingham, and Eastern Counties Stock. Some large purchases have also been made in Midland Stock London and York have also advanced; and several other Scraps have been dealt in. The French lines, however, do not find much favour, as it is well ascertained that none of the amalgamations have proved profitable to purchasers in the different companies, even when brought at a low quotation. With regard to the numberless plans deposited at the Board of Trade, it is generally understood that many of the later projected companies cannot make the required deposit on the assent-General, and will, therefore, only exist until February. Shareholders will do well to ascertain this fact at once where any suspicion may exist, and demand repayment. The market was languid, and without transaction, on account of the latter circumstance, caused by some sales, for a moment rendered it a trifle flatter. The purchases of shares last dealt in are for Birmingham and Gloucester, 129; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 89; Bristol and Exeter, 80; Ditto New, 79; Eastern Counties, 13; Caledonian, 13¾ x n; Ditto Extension, 2¾; Cheltenham and Great Western, 19; Ditto Half Shares, 18¾; Chester and Holyhead, 14¾; Cheltenham and Oxford, 9¾; Eastern Counties, 19; Ditto Half Shares, 18¾; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 63¾; Edinburgh and Perth, 83; Essex and Suffolk, 6¾; Gloucester, Berkeley and Central of Wales, 14¾; Great Eastern and Western, 14¾; Great North of England, 87; Ditto New, 87; Great Northern, 1; Ditto Half Shares, 85; Ditto Quarter Shares, 14¾; Ditto Fifths, 2¾; Hull and Selby, 109; Ditto Half Shares, 18; Lancaster and Carlisle, 26¾ x n; Leicester and Hitchford, 2¾; Leicester and Swannington, 90; Newcastle Junction, 1; London and Birmingham, 2¾; Ditto Thirds, —; Ditto Quarter Shares, 2¾; Ditto Fifths, 2¾; Ditto Extension, —; London and Brighton, 19¾; London and Croydon, 2¾; London and Greenwich, 4¾; Manchester and Hereford, —; London, Hounslow, and Western, —; London and North Western, 99¾; Ditto Half Shares, 99¾; Manchester and Birmingham, 39¾; Ditto Quarter Shares, 19¾; Manchester and Leeds, 87¾; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 2¾; Manchester and Sheffield, 1; Midland, 74¾; Ditto New, 74¾; Midland Great Western, 2¾; Newcastle and Darlington, 2¾; Ditto New, 2¾; Ditto Extension, 2¾; Newcastle, Lesh, 2¾; Ditto New, 2¾; Ditto Extension, 2¾; Northern and Eastern, 2¾; Norwich and Brandon, 2¾; North Devon, 1¾; North Kent and Direct Dover, 4¾; North Staffordshire, 2¾; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 64; Northampton, Banbury, and Cheltenham, 2¾; Nottingham and Boston, 1¾; Oxford and Worcester, 14¾; Portsmouth Direct, 3¾; Richmond, 2¾; Rugby and Hunt ingdon, 1¾; Scottish Central, 2¾; Scottish Midland, 1¾; Shrewsbury, Worverhampton, Dudley, and Birmingham, 3¾; South Midland, 2¾; South Eastern and Dover, 3¾; Ditto, Number 2, 3¾; Ditto, Number 4, 3¾; Staines, Wokingham, and Reading, 2¾; Trent Valley, 10¾; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 3¾; York and North Midland Half Shares, 50; Ditto Scarborough Branch, 50, Ditto Extension, 2¾; Boulogne and Amiens, 8¾; Dendermonde Valley, 2¾; East Indian, 1¾; Great Northern of France Constituted, 12¾; Louvain and Jemappes, 1¾; Rouen and Liege, 22¾; Orleans and Vierzon, 15; Orleans and Bordeaux, 10; Paris and Lyons (Lafitte's), 1¾; Paris and Lyons (Calon's), 2; Paris and Lyons (Sud Est.), 1¾.

SATURDAY MORNING.—There was a very limited amount of business in all the Markets yesterday. Consols closed at the reduced quotation of 94⅜ for Money. The Share Market has scarcely varied.

NEW EXERCISES for the PIANOFORTE. Grand Exercises sur les Octaves agreables et amusants ditto, sur les Tierces, or thirds, ditto sur les Gammes, or Scales; ditto, sur les Gammes, or Scales, ditto, to strengthen the 3rd and 4th Fingers. Composed by J. A. G. RUCH. These Exercises are arranged on quite a new plan, each having a pretty air for the fingers, so that the most tiresome studies are comparatively rendered amusing.—Published in separate Numbers, at 1s. each by ADDISON and HODSON, 210, Regent-street; and T. SWAIN, 81, Upper Baker street, Regent's-park.

MARITANA.—The New Grand Opera, composed by VINCENT WALLACE, and now being performed, with the utmost success, at Drury Lane Theatre, is published by CRAMER, BEALE, and Co., 201, Regent-street.—All the ballads of the Opera are popular and rich favourites, and require to be so; for example, 'In happy moments,' a song which any one may sing, and enjoy; and which, with Mr Pallisp's smooth vocalisation, gains an unfailing encore; 'There is a flower,' given to Mr. Harrison, quite as pretty, and quite as successful; and, above all, Miss Rainer's airy 'Scenes that are brightest'—the very best and most genuine specimen of ballad music we have heard in any modern opera.—Adieu, Nov. 20.

THE WATERLOO HEROES.—The Subscribers and the Public are respectfully informed that the splendid Engraving of the WATERLOO HEROES is now completed. This most interesting and Grand Historical Record of Waterloo, painted by C. R. KNIGHT, Esq., R.A., has been engraved by the eminent engraver Mr. CHARLES G. LEWIS, for nearly three years, and is now brought to a most successful termination. The Engraving represents a "Field Marshal's Review" on the 18th of June, 1815, receiving his Illustrious Guests at Apsley House, on the anniversary of the glorious Eighteenth of June. The Heads included in the plate number 81, by a well known list of "Soldiers of the Age," in which the nation owed its crowning victory at Waterloo.—HENRY GRAVES and Co., Publishers in Ordinary to her Majesty and H. R. H. Prince Albert, 6, Pall-mall.

THE QUEEN OF DENMARK; an Historical Novel. Edited by MRS. GORE. 3 vols.

HENRY COLBURN, Publisher, 13, Great Marlborough-street.

THE TENANT FARMERS' ADVOCATE.—It is abundantly manifest that the position of the Agricultural Interest as a class is undergoing, and must undergo, a great change. In such change the relative position of "LANDLORD AND TENANT" will be the most important feature, and the establishment of a second "Magna Charta" of "Tenant's Rights" will be a cardinal point for "Tenant Farmers." For fourteen years THE MARK LANE EXPRESS AND AGRICULTURAL JOURNAL has been the most able and uncompromising advocate of the TENANT'S RIGHTS, and with the conviction that the interests of the Tenantry are closely connected with the prosperity of the country at large, it will continuously devote to its discussion and elucidation. Published every Monday in time for post. May be had, price 6d., of all Booksellers and Newsmen. Office, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand, London.—Price 8d. if by mail.

THE CORN AND PROVISION TRADES.—The deficiency of the Harvest, the failure of the Potato Crop, and the consequent serious effects upon consumption, and monetary affairs entail a responsibility under such circumstances, correct information as to the produce of the harvest, the extent of the failure of the potato crop, the state of the markets, the stock of grain on hand, the employment of Europe, and in the United States, is of the highest importance. No trouble or expense is spared to furnish such information, which is brought down to the latest moment of going to press in the MARK LANE EXPRESS, which has been for many years the authority in the Corn and Provision Trades in England and in foreign countries. Published every Monday in time for post, and may be had by order of all Booksellers, Newsmen, &c. Office, 24, Norfolk-street, Strand. Price 4d. or 5d. by mail.

THE FARMER'S MAGAZINE AND JOURNAL OF THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST, for DECEMBER, 1845, is embellished with Splendid STEEL ENGRAVINGS of PORTRAIT OF HUGH WATSON, ESQ., OF KEILLOR, FORFAR, SCOTLAND, Engraved by J. B. HYDE, from a Photography, by — BRAND; and "KEP REACTION." The Number for DEC. 1, 1845.—Price 2s. 6d.

SELLING OFF CARPETS.—LUCK, KENT, & CUMMING, beg to inform the Nobility and Gentry, as well as their Friends and the Public, that they have REMOVED their BUSINESS from Carpenter's Hall, London Wall, to their long established Warehouses, 4, Regent-street, Waterloo-place, opposite Howell and James's, and to 36, Hatton Garden, Holborn, where they trust that patronage will be continued which they have enjoyed for upwards of a century. A considerable portion of their large Stock of Brussels, Kidderminster, and other Carpeting is to be sold off, great reduction. In addition to Carpeting, they have at their West-end Establishment a large stock of Chintzes, Damasks, Tabourets, &c. &c., well worthy of attention. A Splendid Carpet, of British Manufacture, 36 by 18, with a Centre and Border, at less than cost price.

REPLATING.—PLATED ARTICLES, which have been worn through, REPLATED on the NEW PRINCIPLE by PURSELOVE'S PATENT, Manufactory, No. 4, Leicester-square.

LANSDOWN CRESCENT, BATH.—One of the best Houses, commanding the finest view in this healthy and most favoured locality, lately completely fitted up, to be LET unfurnished, with coach-house, Stables, &c., for a term of Years. For Particulars, inquire at Messrs. SCRIPPS and SON, Newspaper Office, 13, South Molton-street, Bond-street, London.

COTTAGE ORNÉE.—This splendid PIANO-FORTE is submitted to the public, and to rivallists in particular, as obviating the objections formerly urged against Cabinet by a powerful improvement in the form, the most recent and chaste ornament, and a touch and tone unequalled. N. B.—It has been decided to introduce these now limited manufactures at a moderate and unexpensive terms. J. GREEN, 33, Soho-square

LANSDOWN CRESCENT, BATH.—One of the best Houses, commanding the finest view in this healthy and most favoured locality, lately completely fitted up, to be LET unfurnished, with coach-house, Stables, &c., for a term of Years. For Particulars, inquire at Messrs. SCRIPPS and SON, Newspaper Office, 13, South Molton-street, Bond-street, London.

COTTAGE ORNÉE.—This splendid PIANO-FORTE is submitted to the public, and to rivallists in particular, as obviating the objections formerly urged against Cabinet by a powerful improvement in the form, the most recent and chaste ornament, and a touch and tone unequalled. N. B.—It has been decided to introduce these now limited manufactures at a moderate and unexpensive terms. J. GREEN, 33, Soho-square

FAMILY LINENS of the highest character, and at the lowest prices, for immediate payment, only, are sold by JOHN CAPPER and SON, Linen-drapers to the Queen, at their Fair by Linen Warehouse, 26, Regent-street, two doors below Glasshouse-street. John Capper and Son's general Linendrapery business in Gracechurch street, established for nearly Seventy Years, is continued without change

NICKELS'S NEW SYSTEM OF RAILWAY LOCOMOTION.

Messrs. Keene and Nickels have just patented a novel system of Railway Locomotion, which is founded on principles stated not to have been hitherto applied to the communication of mechanical motion. The patentees have constructed a working model of their invention in York road, Waterloo-road, which has been already inspected by several persons of scientific eminence.

The proprietors term their system a new Atmospheric Method of Propulsion; but this name is unphilosophically incorrect. Atmospheric Air is, certainly, the propulsive agent; but its elasticity is the property made available in this invention; so that all gaseous bodies might be made serviceable for the above purpose. In short, as observed in the Railway Record, "the system is founded on the expansive force of a compressed aeriform fluid, and might, with propriety, be designated, Propulsion by the Expansion of Condensed Air or Gas." It differs, too, from the Atmospheric Railway in this respect: without travelling piston, as in Clegg and Samuda's, and without racks and pinions, as in Pilbrow's invention, the carriage is propelled by the pressure of air with great velocity, and a tractive power is attained superior to that of the working models, on the same scale, of either of the Atmospheric Railways.

The following are the main details. There is laid, under ground, an air-tight chamber, or cast-iron pipe, which contains the moving power—air condensed by forcing pumps to about three atmospheres; that is, the air in this chamber is compressed into one-third of its volume under ordinary atmospheric pressure. Midway between the rails are laid longitudinally at certain intervals, standing above the surface, squared beams of wood or iron, say from twenty to thirty feet in length. The two vertical sides of the beam are a little hollowed; and along these superficial channels, on each side, are placed tubes of an elastic air-tight material, susceptible of easy expansion and collapse. These expansible tubes communicate by intermediate pipes, furnished with stop-cocks, with the reservoir of compressed air. Such are the fixtures of the apparatus. Then, on the under side of the carriage to be moved are two solid drums, fixed on vertical spindles, which run in supporting collars: and these drums are so placed, that, when the carriage, moving on its independent wheels upon the rails, passes over the horizontal beams, they embrace the two vertical sides, and closely compress the lateral elastic tubes, so as to leave no air passage beyond the point of contact. Now, imagine the carriage thus equipped to be stationary over that which we will call the anterior extremity of one of the beams, from which point motion is to begin. A stop-cock in the connecting tube is opened; and, instantaneously, a portion of the compressed air from the reservoir rushes by its expansive force into the two lateral flexible tubes, and meeting resistance on the line of compression of the two drums, it drives them, and consequently the carriage, forward following them with the same propulsive energy to the other extremity of the beam. By this action, the carriage has acquired such a momentum as to carry it with the velocity required onwards to the next beam, where the impulse is renewed, and thus repeated through the whole length of the line. This is a brief description of the modus agendi of the system, which will enable the general reader to comprehend in what manner compressed air, with an acting pressure of forty pounds to the square inch, admitted through a pipe not more than ¼ inch in diameter, propels a carriage holding four persons with great velocity.

The Gutta percha above-mentioned, is a gum lately introduced from Singapore: it possesses properties which render it superior to caoutchouc. It is unjured by heat or acids, is elastic, but possesses more tenacity; and at 212° Fahrenheit, can be moulded into any form, or two pieces can be kneaded together with the fingers, and the joint made as strong as the original substance.

The mechanical success of the new system is certain; and taking the fact as established, that loaded carriages can be propelled with adequate velocity on ordinary Railways, by this method, the following are some of the advantages to be gained. There is a perfect command of speed, and greater facility of arresting motion. There is less oscillation, and less vibration. There is no long train, for, on the Compressed Air System, it is not necessary to link even two carriages together; each may take its own impulse from the continuous reservoir, independently, and they may follow on the same line at any intervals of distance. Again, steeper gradients are overcome than by other systems; there is no leakage or loss of power beyond the actual amount required for working; the real quantum of power expended in the propulsion of a determinate load remains to be determined by actual trial; the rest being in favour of the superior economy of this New System.

To Correspondents.—"R. M."—Checkmate, we find, can be given with the marked Pawn, aided by King and Queen, even though the Pawn is on a Bishop's file, as the following termination will show. White. King at his 7th, Q at K R 6th, and P at K B 6th. Black: King at his K1 square. This position is not difficult to obtain: and, having got it, you have only to checkmate with the Pawn next move.

"J. W. N."—The problem you imperfectly describe is a very difficult one. Place the men thus:—White: K at Q 6th, B at Q 4th, Kt at Q B 8th. Pawns at Q B 4th and Q R 3rd. Black: K at Q R 3rd, P at Q R 5th. White plays first, and gives mate in four moves.

"R. L. L."—A feeble imitation of the well-known Indian problem, and only suited to very young players.

"J. R. A."—There are situations, when the Chess-board is comparatively clear, in which a great player may calculate twelve moves forward correctly, but it is very unusual to look so far in advance

"J. G." and "P. H."—See the note to the solution of M. Klug's problem, 96, in our last.

"A. B.," Middlesex.—The solution sent is wrong; Black, for his second move, would play R to Q 2nd, and then R to Q 3rd, &c. Your letters should be addressed to the Editor.

"J. E. G.," Gosnell-street.—What is meant by the extraordinary diagram with multitudes of Kings, Queens, and other pieces, which you have forwarded? It is to us incomprehensible. If a plain diagram, with the position of the pieces in the problem you allude to, is sent, a solution shall be returned. The Pawn must not go "to Queen" in a marked Pawn game.

"Isenac."—Better never attempt the solution of Chess problems at all than solve them by moving the men. If you addict yourself to the practice of touching the pieces while examining a problem, you will long to do the same in actual play, and your mind will become impatient under the difficulty of a complicated problem the result of which will be, that, instead of thoroughly looking through it, you will jump at a conclusion, and, in nine cases out of ten, lose the game.

"H. W."—The rule which admits of either player having more than one Queen on the board at a time is not universally acknowledged throughout the Chess world.

"Iota."—We agree with you that ingenious mates given in actual play are always instructive and entertaining for young players. The two following, which recently occurred, are not very complex. In the first, which was the end of a game between Mr. Staunton and Capt. Evans, the men stand thus:—White: King at his R sq., Q at her B 2nd, R at Q B sq., B at K 3rd, Kt at Q R 5th, Pawns at K R 2nd, Q B 4th, and Q Kt 2nd. Black: K at his Kt sq, Q at her B 3rd, R at K B sq., B at K Kt 5th, Kt at K B 6th, Pawns at K R 2nd, K Kt 2nd, and Q R 3rd. Black having to play mates by force in five moves. The second arose in a game played by Mr. E F., of Plymouth, against another amateur. Place the men thus: White: K at his R sq, R at Q Kt 7th, B at Q B 6th, Kt at Q R 7th, Pawn at Q Kt's 6th. Black: K at Q R sq, Q at K Kt 4th, R at K R sq., Kt at K R 5th, Pawns at K R 2nd and K Kt 2nd. White had to play, and mated in five moves.

The London Chess Club.—A general and very fully attended meeting of the members of this celebrated Chess Society was held on Saturday, when it was proposed, and unanimously agreed to, that Mr. Staunton be elected an honorary member thereof. This resolution, so flattering to the individual, can hardly fail to benefit the club, and is likely to give rise to many novel and important chess encounters during the present season.

Powerful Agent for Maritime Warfare.—Lord Dundonald has published a letter, in which he deprecates the proposed expenditure for harbours of refuge, and intimates that he has invented a secret plan, by means of which whatever hostile force might be assembled in the Channel, could be destroyed within the first twenty-four hours favourable for effective operations, in defiance of forts and batteries, mounted with the most powerful ordnance now in use. His lordship urges the Government "to consider in all its bearings, and in all its consequences, the contemplated system of stationary maritime defence, subject, as that system may become, to the overwhelming influence of the secret plan which I placed in their hands, similar to that which I presented, in 1812, to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, who (as stated last year in my memorial to the House of Lords) referred its consideration confidentially to Lord Keith, Lord Exmouth, and the two Congreves, professional and scientific men, by whom it was pronounced to be infallible, under the circumstances detailed in my explanatory statement."

THE FALL OF THE MINISTRY

The Ministry of Sir Robert Peel is at an end: the Cabinet has collectively resigned the seals of office, and that resignation has been accepted by Her Majesty. Thus have ended all the doubts and divisions indicated by frequent councils without fixed resolves; a majority of Sir Robert Peel's colleagues could not bring themselves to forget that they were elected by the country, and placed in office, to maintain the protective system. The Leader might see, in the exigencies of the time, a sufficient cause for forgetting past opinions and reversing former declarations; but, more sensitive to the charge of inconsistency, or less clearly seeing the difficulties of the hour, his followers waver, doubt, desert, and, finally, oppose him. After practically existing as a Conservative Ministry governing upon Opposition principles, and passing Whig and more than Whig measures, they at last think it time to stop. Mere expediency and the pressure of circumstances for once come into conflict with principles, a host of pledges, volumes of by-gone speeches, and old promises—the price of popular support on the hustings, and principle and the pledges prevail; the Protective Ministry of 1841 fall in 1845, round the flag under which they carried the intrenchments of office. The many tamperings with the integrity of that standard are at an end; the alteration of the scale, the removal of prohibitive duties, the revision of the tariff, shook the faith of the bulk of the party, but it may now be reassured: the Leader, willing to complete the work he had begun, is paralysed by the open desertion of his supporters, and gives up his command; the secession of the Chief dissolves the body, and it now remains to be seen what new combinations of men and parties will succeed it.

For the sake of seeing principles fairly tried and tested, we are not sorry to find the crisis produced. We have a respect and admiration of consistency, and can perceive the advantage of having our Governments framed on some certain and distinct foundation. But every year since the accession of the present Ministry has witnessed some violation of the compact between the constituency of England and the majority of their representatives in Parliament. All that the Government has done it may have been necessary to do; its measures may have been wise, or rather, as the better word, expedient. But if we count principles as anything—if we accept pledges as binding—if we are to take the past conduct of individuals as an index or their policy in the future—the Conservative Ministry did not consist of the men who ought to have sanctioned, still less originated, the changes they effected. If the policy of their opponents was right, if no other was possible, they should not have obstructed it; if it was wrong, they ought never to have adopted and made it their own,—in some points even exceeding the example. This, however, has been done; and we have had the curious spectacle of a Ministry proposing measures which might all have issued from their political foes—a Minister addressing himself for support, not to his friends, but his opponents, eliciting the cheers of the hostile host in front, his own chosen band looking on in blank silence behind him. This was an anomalous state of things; and, like all departures from the ordinary and natural conditions, whether in political or physical life, was unhealthy. The crisis comes when the opposing force takes up a position of its own; and, unable to drag his own party with him, equally unable to catch the support of the adversary, the Leader who has engaged in this clever, and, for a time, successful cross-play of parties, falls

SMITHFIELD CLUB PRIZE CATTLE.

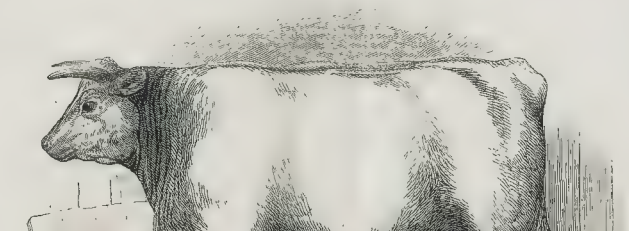
Mr R. M. Layton's 4 yrs. 8 mo. old Hereford ox.—1st. prize, £20.—First class.—and silver medal and gold medal.

Mr. T. W. Fouracre's 3 yrs. 11 mo. old Devon steer.—1st. prize, class.—and silver medal.

On Wednesday commenced the annual exhibition of this society. Within the last few years the Smithfield Club has certainly acquired a standing which it had at no former period of its existence; the cattle shows have, indeed, attracted sufficient attention, and commanded animals from individuals celebrated for their breeding and feeding talents, to rank it with many of longer standing in the country. Last year's show was certainly the finest, both in point of number and quality of animals exhibited, and it is no blame to the managers of the club that the exhibition this year is inferior in both respects.

Numerically, the show of oxen, cows, and heifers, is somewhat less than last year, while that of sheep and pigs is decidedly larger. We think, also, that, on the whole, there is little or no improvement in the former, while the latter, especially the pigs, are somewhat better.

A single glance at symmetry told the most unpractised eye that mere bulk was not the only criterion in the opinion of the judges—whose impartiality may be presumed from the fact, that His Royal Highness Prince Albert has been unsuccessful with his pigs this year, the contrary having been the case on the previous occasion. The justice of this award could not be questioned when the comparison was made. On one side nestled the Prince's pigs, magnificent specimens both of fat and of cleanliness, but absolutely gasping for breath; while opposite lay the successful first prizemen, "Berkshire and Yorkshire pigs," who have been fed on "buckwheat, barley, peameal, and milk," and both in their breathing and their movements indicated that they were at once healthier and handsomer.



His Royal Highness, though he has failed in his pigs, has proved successful, for the first time, in his cattle. He exhibits a beautiful short horned ox, three years and ten months old, which has been fed on cake, turnips, tares, hay, meal, and potatoes. This has obtained the second prize of £10 in the first class. The first prize and the gold and silver medals were obtained by a splendid four years and eight months Hereford ox, whose symmetrical shape will be made familiar to the United Kingdom, by means as of our Journal, long after its carcase has disappeared from the butcher's shop. On the whole, the contrasts in the breeds are strikingly brought out; short horns and long horns repose tranquilly side by side; the dun red of the Hereford tints, the jet black of the Highland; the long back, the rotund body, the majestic neck, the restless eye, and the occasional toss of the head, all indicate at once different natures and temperaments, and a perfect consciousness on the part of the most impatient that they feel themselves in any position but their natural one.

There are certainly some very fine animals, well shaped and well fed, which cannot but strike any agriculturist, and there are some which we think might have fairly been classed amongst the extra stock which are here placed along with the prizes. The Sheep are numerous as last year, and in appearance very fine. The Southdowns are numerous and good, equally so the Leicester and cross breeds.

though commanding an absolute majority. It is a lesson of political retribution.

If it were clearly understood that the Government was to be one of expediency only, free to adapt itself to the difficulties of the day, and frame measures exactly according as they might seem required to meet them, then the course taken by Sir Robert Peel was the right one. Without any predilections, free from all ties of the past, he could survey the present, as a general looks over the field of battle, and orders the movements as the moment requires. But this is the Government of a Despot, and our Rulers have to act according to a Constitution; our measures are the result of the conflict of great parties, actuated by great principles; only as far as public men adhere to those principles is their position as Leaders recognised. If they gain power as the champions of one set of opinions, and use that power to promote measures founded on opinions exactly opposite, it is a political immorality; sure, sooner or later, to be fully expiated,—as it is now.

If the great Conservative, Protective, and Protestant Party of England had placed Sir Robert Peel at their head, with freedom of action to do individually as he pleased, giving an unconditional support to whatever he might do, repaid by seeing him the dispenser of all office and patronage, then they could not have complained, if he did lessen protection, endow the Romish Church, and show himself altogether more of an innovator than a Conservative. But the party did not do this; they made him their chief, to govern on their principles. If those principles are found impossible to apply to the age and the people, he is right to give them up; but then, for him, government becomes impossible. Certain measures may be proper, but they are not proper for him; he was called to a quite different work; was trusted to do that work, and no other; and, by attempting to force, or persuade, his supporters to do what they must have felt is a violation of conscience to do, he first weakened his hold on them, and has now lost it altogether. We know that the late Premier has always claimed for himself perfect liberty of action in proposing such measures "as he believed to be conducive to the public weal;" he would never, he said, hold office to carry other men's opinions into effect. But there was a previous compact, which he did not allude to—he was not at liberty to propose measures diametrically opposed to his avowed principles. This was the limit to his freedom of action; and, besides, he did carry other men's opinions into effect, with the aggravated circumstance, that they were the opinions of his opponents, instead of those of his own party. The policy of expediency, and measures and men, has now had a fair trial, and breaks down of itself, from the impossibility of a large and influential party long continuing to violate is political conscience; the alternative is a return to principles, as the basis of Government; and the question now is—how can it be effected?

With the present Parliament a Whig Ministry is impossible The Government then must be reconstructed from the majority of the Cabinet from which Peel secedes, and the Conservative party in both houses of Parliament. The effect of the reconstruction will probably be to give the Cabinet a more decided and Tory cast; this, from the position assumed by the Whig leaders, denoted by the recent declarations of Russell, Morpeth, and Macaulay, will place parties in a more distinct and decided opposition—for of late they have seemed approaching. But this is the natural effect of a stand made upon principle; men know where they are and what they are doing, and parties must stand or fall by their real strength instead of being blended together by strange and unwonted combinations. It may be asked if a Tory Cabinet can be constructed? If it cannot, it is a fatal sign for the party. If the greatest minds have left it, it is a sign that other principles than theirs must henceforth be the rule of Empire. It is in this respect that the prospects of the Tory party are the most unsatisfactory. It is impossible to say what men occasion and opportunity may not bring forth, but at present there is neither an equal nor a successor to Peel; another of his fathom they have not,

To lead their business.

Stanley would seem the proximate leader; but he is wanting in temper, and is besides in the Upper House, while the Premier now is almost necessarily in the Commons. Graham would not do, for he has been both a Whig and a Corn-law repealer. Gladstone is beyond all question the most able man in the ranks of the party, but is implicated in the Tariff, and committed to commercial liberality, as deeply as Peel. Indeed the dearth of great legislative and senatorial talent on the Conservative side, with two or three exceptions, is remarkable; yet if rank can compensate for talent, if wealth may make up for application and official knowledge, the greater part of the House of Peers, and an overwhelming majority in the House of Commons, may surely furnish the means of constructing a Tory Ministry. But, taking the many qualifications that Sir Robert Peel possesses, combined with his position and influence, the man does not exist who can supply his place completely.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The London Gazette of Tuesday, contains the following notice upon the subject of the Slave Trade. It is important as it shows that France and England are acting in concert for the suppression of this horrible traffic.

JOINT DECLARATION

MADE ON THE PART OF GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE, IN PURSUANCE OF THE SEVENTH ARTICLE OF THE CONVENTION OF MAY 29, 1845, FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE

Whereas his Majesty the King of the French has caused notification to be made to her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, that the French squadron to be sent to the coast of Africa, in pursuance of the convention between their said Majesties, signed at London on the 29th of May, 1845, will be ready to commence operations on that coast by the 15th of the present month of December

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the Chargé d'Affaires of his Majesty the King of the French at the Court of London, being furnished with the necessary powers, do, in conformity with the provisions of the 7th Article of the said convention, by this joint declaration make known, that the measures to be adopted in virtue of the said convention are about to be carried into execution at the time mentioned in the said notification; and that, in consequence thereof, on the 6th day of March, 1846, being three months from the date of this joint declaration, the warrants that have been issued in pursuance of the Conventions of 1831 and 1833, to the cruisers of the two nations, for the mutual exercise of the right of search, are to be respectively delivered up.

In witness whereof, the undersigned have signed the present joint declaration, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done in duplicate, at London, the [illegible] day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five.

(Signed) ABERDEEN. (L. S.
JARNAC. (L. S.)

CABINET COUNCIL.—On Monday an Cabinet Council was held, at the Foreign office [illegible] o'clock, at which all the Ministers were present, covered from his recent illness to attend the meeting. The other Ministers present were—Sir Robert Peel, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Harlington, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Granville Somerset, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. The Council sat an hour.

THE LATE FIRE IN CRIPPLEGATE.—On Wednesday, Wm. Payne, Esq., coroner, and a jury of 18 parishioners, assembled at the Fountain Tavern, Red Cross-street, "to inquire, on behalf of her Majesty the Queen, touching the death of [illegible] by what means, certain houses in the parish of [illegible] were lately burnt." The [illegible] buildings, Beechstreet, Barbican. Mr. [illegible], on whose premises the fire was first seen, and Mr. [illegible] adjoining premises adjoining, were in attendance, and so was Mr. Braidwood, the superintendent of the London Fire Brigade. The jury having viewed the premises, a long investigation took place. The Coroner summed up, and stated that if the jury found Mr. Ford guilty of wilfully setting his premises on fire, he should not immediately commit him, but send him for further examination before a justice of the peace. The jury deliberated for about 20 minutes, and returned the following verdict:—"We find George John Ford guilty of arson."

THE NEW MINISTRY.

In the present state of things it would, of course, be premature to announce any arrangement as to the persons and places in the new Government. The following list is, however, pretty generally credited in political circles —

First Lord of the Treasury.—Lord John Russell
Lord Chancellor.—Lord Cottenham.
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.—Lord Palmerston.
Secretary of State for the Home Department.—Lord Morpeth.
Secretary of State for the Colonies.—Lord Grey.
Under Secretary for the Colonies.—Mr. Charles Buller.
Chancellor of the Exchequer.—Mr. Baring.
Attorney General.—Sir T. Wilde
Solicitor General.—Mr. Dundas.
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.—The Marquis of Normanby.
President of the Council.—The Marquis of Lansdowne.
Ambassador at Paris.—Lord Clarendon.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

PRIVY COUNCIL AT OSBORNE HOUSE.

The Queen held a Privy Council on Wednesday, at Osborne House, Isle of Wight.

The Council was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert; the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Privy Seal; the Duke of Wellington, Commander in Chief; Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury; Sir James Graham, Secretary of State for the Home Department; the Earl of Aberdeen, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Lord Stanley, Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Right Hon. H. Goulburn, Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Earl of Lincoln, Chief Commissioner of the Woods and Forests; and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, Secretary at War.

At the Council Parliament was ordered to be further prorogued from Tuesday, the 16th December, until Tuesday, the 30th December.

Mr. C Greville was the Clerk of the Council in Waiting.

At the Court the Right Rev. Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford, had an audience of her Majesty, and did homage upon his appointment to that see.

Sir James Graham, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the Bishop of Norwich, Clerk of the Closet, assisted at the ceremony.

The Earl of Warwick was the Lord in Waiting.

After the Council the Cabinet Ministers left Osborne House, together with the Bishop of Norwich, the Bishop of Oxford, and Mr. C. Greville, and were conveyed in the Fairy steam-yacht, to Southampton, where a special train was in readiness on the South Western Railway. The party proceeded to Basingstoke, where the Duke of Wellington alighted from the train, the other noblemen and gentlemen went to town; accomplishing the distance in one hour and fifty three minutes.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—From our own Correspondent.—The Court is expected to return to the Castle, from the Isle of Wight, on Saturday. As Saturday next is the last day of the Smithfield Club Cattle Show, his Royal Highness Prince Albert has signified his intention to proceed direct from Gosport to town, by the Southampton Railway, for the purpose of honoring the exhibition with his presence before its close. The Prince will arrive at Windsor Castle, should this arrangement be carried into effect, the same afternoon. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will arrive at Frogmore House to morrow afternoon from a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at Wiley Court. The infant Prince Alfred was taken out for an airing, this morning on his Shetland pony, in the Home Park. His Royal Highness was also taken for a carriage drive this afternoon, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttleton.

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—It is mentioned, on very good authority, that her Majesty's state of health is such as to promise an accession to the Royal family about April next. The Royal family continue at Osborne House. The Queen and Prince Albert took a drive in a pony phaeton on Tuesday afternoon. On Wednesday morning her Majesty and her Royal Consort took their usual early walk. The Royal children were taken in the pleasure grounds.

IRELAND.

THE POTATO CROP.—It seems to be now admitted that the extent of the disease among the potatoes has been much exaggerated. The Dublin Correspondent of the Times says: "The last reports from Cork, Galway, Londonderry, and some of the midland districts, continue favourable, and the harsh weather of the past week has not appeared seriously injurious influence on the crops, so far as those localities are concerned. The Cork Southern Reporter, in its corn circular of Saturday's date, reiterates its opinion, 'that no little exaggeration existed upon the subject' of the potato panic. From Kerry, however, the accounts are not so satisfactory." The Carlow Sentinel has the following:—"Our experience of the past week justifies the opinion we formed about a fortnight since, that the 'famine' cry was raised for the vilest of all purposes—to promote the political views of the Whig faction, and to damage the character of the Government.

What is the fact? From nearly every part of the country we have received the most gratifying assurances of the average crop of potatoes, and that the disease is not spreading to any extent such as to warrant apprehension One respectable farmer from the neighbourhood of Graiguenamanagh, in this county, informed us that but one seventh of the potato crop was lost, while there was considerably more than an average crop throughout his district! from other districts we learn that only one fifth or one-fourth were gone; consequently, with more than an average crop in every part of the country, it follows that if only one-fifth, or even one third of the crop be lost, there is no danger of a famine. Independently of the fact, to our own knowledge, by practical experience, that the potato disease is rapidly disappearing, and we say this from our actual knowledge of the fact"

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE BARON DE BODE v. THE QUEEN.—In the BAIL COURT on Thursday, Lord Denman gave judgment in this long litigated suit. His Lordship entered into the details of it. He was alleged that the money which the supplicant claimed had been paid into the Bank of England, and that it was virtually received by the Crown in trust for him, for the purpose of paying him compensation for the property he had lost at the French revolution. The Court thought it right to express doubts upon some points of the case, but in respect to this point, their Lordships had no doubt whatever They were, therefore, of opinion that there was no money received by the Sovereign, and further, that it had not been received to the use of the Sovereign.

POLICE.

A YOUNG GIRL COMMITTED ON A CHARGE OF MURDER.

Last week we stated that a young girl named Martha Browning had been examined at QUEEN SQUARE police office, on suspicion of having murdered Elizabeth Mundell, an aged female, with whom she resided, in Rochester row, Westminster, by strangulation. The prisoner was re-examined on the charge last Monday and Tuesday, and the daughter of the deceased, charged with the death of her mother, and that a cord had been found round her mother's neck —It is necessary to repeat, however, that the Coroner's jury summoned to investigate the circumstances of the death of the old woman, returned a verdict to the effect that she had committed suicide, while in a state of insanity. The chief circumstance which led to the apprehension of the prisoner, appears to have been the possession, by her, of a bank note of the "Bank of Elegance," which had belonged to the deceased. In reference to this point, the following evidence was given by the daughter of the deceased —

Mr Bond: Where did your mother keep these two notes on the bank of [illegible]nce, to which attention has been drawn?—Witness: One of them she [illegible]ly carried about with her, in her pocket. It was in a red morocco [illegible]

Mr. Bond: Where was the other note deposited?—Witness: It might have [illegible]n there, however, for the [illegible]

Mr. Bond: Can you say whether the one produced, marked with the two [illegible]s of grease, is that which used to be carried in her pocket?—Witness: [illegible]t is the one

Mr. Bond: Have you searched, since your mother's death, for the other? —Witness: I have, but have not discovered it.

Mr. Bond: Are you satisfied that the note on the bank of elegance produced, is the same note that you saw in the possession of the deceased?—Witness: I am quite satisfied that it is.

A woman, named Cheshire, who resided in the next room to the deceased, and who proved, on a previous examination, that she heard the deceased cry "Murder!" twice, and also heard her say, "What are you doing to me? What are you doing to me?" was then put into the witness-box, in order to finish her evidence.

Mr. Bond. When you went to the door of deceased's room, to inquire [illegible] was the matter, did you find it locked?—Witness: Yes, I tried the [illegible]dle, and could not open it Examined by Mr. Edwards (the Chief Clerk): After I had been to the room door, and inquired what was the matter, I returned to my own room, and went to bed again. In about a quarter of an hour after, I heard the [illegible]lioner unlock the door of deceased's room, and come out, and go to the [illegible]d in the passage, and then she knocked at my door, and came to my [illegible] some wood in her hand. She said that the old lady was very [illegible] had begged of her to go to her daughter's and fetch her. I said [illegible]ter do so as soon as she could. She stopped for a minute or [illegible] then she said that she thought she would. I begged of her again to fetch the old lady's daughter, and then she left my room Prisoner, after leaving my room, went into deceased's, and shortly afterwards came in to me again, with her bonnet on, and said that if I heard any noise in the room (deceased's) would I go in?

Edward Gage said—I am the husband of Ann Gage. On Monday night after the inquest, I was in the deceased's room, when they were also at lay her out. The female refused to lay her out until I fetched a doctor

Mr. Bond: Was the prisoner present?—Witness. She was, and shuddered, and ever since the inquest has been afraid of being left alone.

Witness continued: On Wednesday I went to deceased's room, accompanied by the prisoner, who actually kissed the corpse, and putting herself in an attitude of prayer, said, "God knows my arms." After this, whilst in the room, prisoner said she had a £5 note, and offered to lend me a sovereign. I then asked her to let me get it changed, as I knew the landlord, but she said she'd go herself. She then went to a public house close by, and immediately returned, saying the gentleman had played a trick on her, having given her a bank of elegance note instead of a Bank of England. I told her she had better go back immediately. She said she was to go with her, and I asked to look at the note. She hesitated, and at length gave it to me. The moment I saw it I knew by the grease it was the one I had frequently seen in my mother-in-law's hand. After this I suspected her of the murder, and insisted upon accompanying her to see where she had obtained the note. As she went along she said she wanted to see "Jem" (a comrade of his, with whom she is acquainted, which I opposed, and persuaded her to come along with me. On getting through the Horse Guards she fell back on my arm, and said she was so ill she could not go further that day. I told her I must get the assistance of a policeman if she could not go further.

Mr. Bond. Did you say anything to induce her to suppose that you suspected her of the murder?—Witness: I had my suspicions, but I did not tell her.

Witness continued "Good God," she said, "do not get a policeman, and I will try and go a little further." I assisted her across the road, and after she got round the pavement she fell back in my arms. She said, "I can't keep it any longer, I murdered the poor old woman, and deprived your wife of a good mother." She then caught hold of me, asked me to pray for her guilty soul, and to forgive her.

Mr. Bond: Had you said anything to induce her to confess?—Witness. No.

Mr. Bond: You had not said it would be better for her, or anything of that sort?—Witness: I had not.

Witness resumed: I then gave her in charge. The note produced is the same which the prisoner showed me, having had it in my hands frequently during deceased's life.

Mr. Bond. When did you see deceased last, and in what state of health was she?—Witness: I saw her on the Saturday previous to her death, and in good health.

Elizabeth Stevens, 5, Princes street, Commercial road, Lambeth, said that on Wednesday (last week), about four in the afternoon, I was passing by the Horse Guards, when I saw the prisoner fall into a soldier's arms, and she said, "Oh, I've done it! I've done it! for God's sake, pity my poor soul!"

Mr. John Charles Atkinson, of 16, Rodney-terrace, surgeon. I had known the deceased for two years, having attended her late husband, and I have had occasion to remark that she generally was in the possession of good health, and equally level, and at all times in good spirits, a circumstance which I observed from her spirits being neither depressed nor excited during the changes which occurred in her husband's illness. I was called upon at about twenty minutes past eight on Monday morning, and my assistant went, and, on his return, at a little before nine, in consequence of the communication he made to me, I went myself. On my entering the room, I found the body of the deceased on a box, about two feet six, the whole of the spine and head being deposited there. I examined the place, to ascertain whether her death had been occasioned by hanging or strangulation. Observing some pegs over her head, I examined them, to ascertain whether they would bear her weight. I found that they had no power, and were such pegs that a bonnet might be hung on. I then examined her neck, and I was satisfied that she had died from strangulation. There were two indentations in front of the neck, and only one at the back. There was also a vacuum at the back of the neck

Mr. Atkinson here illustrated the view he took of the matter with a piece of cord, by showing that the power used to tighten the rope must have been from behind, in a right line.

Mr. Bond: Could such appearances as you have described have been produced by any previous struggling themselves?—Mr. Atkinson: It is doubtful, certainly not probable. To have made such appearances as the neck presented, a person must, in my opinion, have fastened the rope from behind to a peg, or some other thing which would bear the weight, in a right line with the neck, and kept up the pressure on the front. On examining the room I found no place on which she could have been suspended.

Mr. F. Partridge, an inspector of the A division, said that, on the 3rd inst., at about half past one in the afternoon, the prisoner was brought to the station in Gardners lane, in a fainting condition. I entered the charge against her with the police sheet. "That she, on the path of Mrs. Mundell," and, having read it over to her, cautioned her that she was not bound to say anything. On hearing the charge, she observed, "All I can say is, that it is the devil; I am an unfortunate creature: you may do with me what you like;" and she then commenced tearing her hair. I had her thoroughly searched, but nothing was found. On the day after she had appeared in the court, I went with the soldier (Gage) to 1, Providence-place, where, on searching a box pointed out to me as belonging to the prisoner, I found some cord exactly corresponding with that round the deceased's neck, as also various articles of trifling articles pledged on the 6th and 8th of November last, the one for a shawl, for 1s. 6d., and the other for a gown, for 8s. (This evidence was produced to show that the prisoner, who had represented herself to be in possession of some money, which she had saved in service, and which she pretended to go to Bedford street for, was in distress.)—Adams, a police constable of the A division, proved that when the soldier called him he took the cord from her, she told him "not to expose her, she had done it."

On the case for the prosecution being completed,

Mr. Bond said, "Does the prisoner wish to say anything?"—Prisoner, in a calmer voice, said, "I have not done the murder."

The prisoner was committed to the Central Criminal Court for trial.

IMPROPER USE OF NAMES BY RAILWAY COMPANIES.—Mr. Charnock, the barrister, appeared bef re Alderman Gibbs, at the MANSION HOUSE, on Tuesday, for the purpose of applying for a summons calling upon the Secretaries to the Manx, Southend, and Norwood and Eastern Railway Company, to answer for having inserted the name of Mr. Richard Garde, a member of the bar, in the prospectus of the Company, as one of the Provisional Committee, without that gentleman's knowledge or consent.—Mr. Charnock said he apprized for the summons under the 7th and 8th Victoria, cap. 110. His client was a gentleman who happened never to have had anything to do with railway speculations, so that the proceedings he had to complain of naturally excited the utmost surprise and indignation. No authority had ever been given by him to use his name in any railway company; and the first intimation he received that he was a Provisional Committeeman, was the following document:—

THE THAMES, SOUTHEND, AND NORTHERN AND EASTERN JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY

SIR,—I am desired by the Committee of Management to inform you that 100 shares have been reserved, as I understand, by for each gentleman of the Provisional Committee You are, therefore, requested, to insert in the accompanying form the number of shares you wish to be allotted to you, and forward it to me, on or before the 1st day of December next, at the Managing Committee have fixed Saturday, the 8th of November next, as the last day upon which the deposits on any shares you may require can be received. I remain, sir, your very obedient servant, ANDREW ELLISON.—Company's Temporary Offices, 53, Cornhill, London.—Dated the 30th October, 1845.

The letter enclosed the following printed form:—

TO THE MANAGING COMMITTEE OF THE THAMES, SOUTHEND, AND NORTHERN AND EASTERN JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY

Gentlemen, I request that you will allot me shares in the above undertaking, and I hereby undertake to accept the same, and to pay the deposits thereon, and to sign the necessary deeds when called upon to do so.

—Member of the Provisional Committee.

I agree that there was a secretary to the Company, which had thus adopted him as one of their provisional committee, Mr. Garde determined to call as soon as possible at the offices in Cornhill, to rectify the error, by a personal explanation. To his astonishment and knowledge of the Company. Upon calling at No. 53, Cornhill, he found that a remarkable bustle was stirred up, and a great ostentation of business seemed to move the establishment. He mentioned that the object of speaking to the secretary was to be addressed by one of the clerks, to whom he stated the nature of his business. He requested that the secretary would take his name out of the prospectus, as he had nothing whatever to do with the Company, and positively denied the use of his name as a member of the provisional committee. His request was complied with by the clerk with whom he communicated, in his presence; and he left the house in the belief that there would be no repetition of the circumstance, and, of course, that nobody would consider him to be in a position to which he had never laid any claim. He was mistaken. On the 6th November he received the following letter by post:—

THE THAMES, SOUTHEND, AND NORTHERN AND EASTERN JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

53, Cornhill, Nov. 8, 1845.

SIR,—Your attendance is requested at a meeting to be held at the Company's office, on Monday next, the 10th inst., at twelve o'clock precisely, to take into consideration the proceedings of the Company.

I am, your obedient servant,
A. SNOW (for Mr. RUSSELL).

Mr. Garde supposed that some gentleman of his name must be connected with these speculations, in which he had never had the ambition to be involved, and was of opinion that the error would in all probability correct itself. The matter, however, was followed up most industriously, and on the 5th of December, he received the following agreeable communication:—

21, Lord-street, Bond-street, Dec. 5, 1845.

SIR,—Mr Russell, of Gray's-inn-square, solicitor to the Thames, Southend, &c. Northern and Eastern Junction Railway, having informed us that you are responsible as a member of the Committee for the expenses which have been incurred in bringing forward the above-named line of railway, having refused us to pay for the payment of our account for surveying, engraving, &c. &c. &c.

wards of £1,000!—Alderman Gibbs: What course did he then pursue?—Mr Charnock. He wrote the following letter, next day, to Messrs. Cope and Eales :—

10, Portland place, Clapham-road, Nine o'clock, Saturday, Dec. 6, 1845.

Gentlemen—In reply to your letter of the 5th of this month, and which I only received this evening I beg to inform you that neither Mr. Rassi I nor any other person had any authority from me to insert my name in the prospectus of the Sussex and Surrey Railway, &c. My name was inserted without my knowledge, and when I had discovered such unwarrantable liberty had been taken with my name, and such an imposition attempted to be practised on the public, I called at the office, and ordered my name to be taken out, and which one of the clerks did in my presence. As there is not any other Richard Charnock here of the Temple, but myself, it is quite evident from your letter as well as Mr Russell's, statement to you, that I am the person meant in the prospectus and not Mr Gard, of Stephen's-green, Dublin, who is the person meant as the director of the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. I, therefore, am of opinion with some of my friends that I am now in a position to order the parties to join me; and I shall therefore early on Monday next take the preliminary steps before the Lord Mayor against Mr. ——, &c

I have the honour to remain, gentlemen, your obedient humble servant,

Messrs. Cope and Eales. RICHARD GARDE.

The name of Mr. Garde had been introduced in the prospectus, with the high sounding epithet of "one of the directors of the Manchester and Birmingham Railway." In such a case as had been represented, it was presumed that it was the province of the Chief Magistrate, or his representative to interpose, and the learned counsel confidently expected that a summons should be issued.—Alderman Gibbs said that no paper had been exhibited to him from which it appeared that the name of Mr. Garde had been used. Had Mr. Charnock a prospectus of the Company, in which precipecus the name was inserted under the head of the "Provisional Committee ?"—Mr. Charnock said he had no document of the kind, but he had no doubt that he should be able to procure one. He submitted that upon the mere statement he had made a magistrate would be sanctioned in granting a summons to the secretary.—Alderman Gibbs said he considered it to be necessary that Mr. Charnock should produce the document to which he had referred, before a magistrate could be justified in issuing a summons under the act of Victoria.—Mr. Charnock: We shall endeavour to procure what you think necessary. Mr. Garde is determined to do all in his power to obtain satisfaction for so extraordinary an outrage, and he believes this course to be the most likely to accomplish that object, as well as to do public justice.—Mr. Garde. I feel greatly annoyed at the whole business. I am not a man of fortune or property, and it would appear from the advertisement as if I connived at passing myself off as a person of wealth and means. I am anxious, amongst other things, that it should appear that I have not endeavoured to favour an imposition. On Wednesday Mr. Swift, of the Chancery bar, appeared before the Lord Mayor for the purpose of examining Mr. Ellison, the gentleman stated to be connected with the Thames, Southend, and Eastern and Northern Railway Junction Company, from any participation in the concern. He said it was true that he had been from the Company before a provisional committee had been appointed, and, in fact, before any act had been performed from which it could be inferred that he had anything to do with the Company. The correspondence which had been read on the previous day and in reference to other matters, and Mr Ellison was ready to come forward at any time to state all he knew about the Company from which he had withdrawn the moment he found that it had the quackery of the bubbles which were every day bursting. The learned counsel did not, by thus coming forward in behalf of Mr. Ellison, whom he knew to be wholly incapable of joining in any scheme of a discreditable character, mean to cast any imputation upon Mr. Garde, who naturally felt indignation and disgust at having been lugged in as a debtor to the amount of upwards of £1000 to the surveyors of the projected line.—Tee Lord Mayor said that Alderman Gibbs had been applied to on the occasion of the complaint, and the subject might be brought before that magistrate on a future occasion.—Mr. Swift stated that Mr. Ellison would certainly be in attendance on the day appointed for the hearing of the complaint of Mr. Garde.

THE ALLEGED MURDER ON BOARD THE "TORY."—ANOTHER POSTPONEMENT OF THE CASE.—The prisoner Johnstone, who stood remanded from the Thames police office till Monday last, on the charges of murder on board the Tory, has been in an exceedingly weak state since his last examination, and on Monday morning Mr. Lavies, the surgeon of the Westminster Bridewell, wrote a certificate stating that the prisoner was labouring under an attack of erysipelas of the leg, and would not be in a fit state to be removed from the prison and undergo the examination. The certificate was forwarded to Mr. Bruderip, the magistrate. The magistrate sent for Inspector Evans, jun., of the Thames Police, and directed him to give notice to the witnesses that their presence would not be required on the following day, 16th inst., until which day the case stands remanded. The next sessions of the Central Criminal Court will take place on Monday next, and if the investigation should terminate before Tuesday, it is not expected that the trial will take place till the January sessions

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SERIOUS RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—An accident of a very frightful character occurred on Friday evening (last week), on the works of the Shrewsbury, Oswestry, and Chester Junction Railway, between Gresford and Shrewsbury, by the overturning of a train while at a steep embankment, by which one man was killed on the spot, and several others were seriously injured. The workmen and stone masons employed on the works at Gresford, it appears, were in the practice, on leaving their work in the evening, of having carried to the earth waggons, and being propelled up the line to Wrexham. On the evening in question about forty of them had taken their seats in the trucks, and were proceeding at a rapid rate, when, arriving opposite the new station, near Wrexham, the foreman's waggon got off the line, and ran down the embankment, dragging with it the remainder. One man, Peter Edwards, was found among the lower trucks, frightfully mutilated and quite dead. Another labourer was discovered with his left leg severed completely. A third poor creature had his left leg broken in three places, while seven or eight others were more less injured. As soon as possible the injured were placed in a truck and conveyed on to Wrexham, where they were received into the Hope public house, and met with every medical and other assistance. On Saturday the inquest was held at the above house on the body of P. Edwards, in the course of which, it was shown that the accident arose by the rails sinking into the earth below the level of the road, the rail not being properly laid on the sleepers. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of £5 on the carriage.

SUICIDE OF MR. FISHE, OF THE FINSBURY BANK.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest in the drawing-room of the Finsbury Bank for Deposits and Current Accounts, upon the body of Mr. William Croft Fishe, aged 55, proprietor of the bank, and senior churchwarden of the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell. Constable James Thompson, 199 G, deposed that he was called into the bank by a servant shortly after five o'clock, last Sunday morning, who told him that Mrs. Fishe having missed her husband was alarmed for his safety; and wished him to examine the house for him He did so, and found the deceased in another apartment He was quite dead, and besides his dressing gown only had on his shoes, shirt, and flannel waistcoat. There was a chair by his dressing gown, upon raising which it was ascertained that he had shot himself through the right side, and that the ball (a musket one, passed out of the opposite side and fell inside his dressing gown. Upon removing from a large double barrelled pistol which witness, with the ball, produced) was discovered concealed beneath the dressing gown The right barrel was discharged, and the other was loaded, having the cap on the nipple, and the trigger cocked. Mr. Croft, chief clerk in the bank, examined —He knew deceased 25 years. About four years ago he opened the bank upon his own account. Saturday night he was exceedingly depressed, and complained of his head, which he said was "ready to burst." By the Coroner.—There was a run upon the bank. Other evidence having been adduced, the Jury, without a moment's deliberation, returned a verdict of "Temporary Insanity."

A MAN BRISADED ON A RAILWAY.—An accident occurred on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, on Saturday, by which a man named Nicholson had his head severed from his body, and was otherwise dreadfully mangled. It appears, the deceased was a dyer, at Carlisle, and has been at the works, which are about two miles from the city, the preceding evening, at a merry making, and was walking home along the railway in the morning, when it is supposed he had either fallen or lain down, and gone to sleep across the rails. The six o'clock coal train from Malton coming up, passed over his legs and neck, cutting his head completely off. The attention of the engine-driver was attracted by the hat of deceased being thrown violently forward in the path of the engine, and, on stopping the train, the nature of the accident was discovered. The morning was very dark, and the accident arose entirely from the imprudence of the deceased, who was partly intoxicated when he set out to return home, and had taken the railway as the nearest route.

RATING OF PRINCE ALBERT'S FARM AT WINDSOR.—In consequence of a resolution, passed unanimously at a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of Windsor, held in September last, to the effect that the Prince Consort being justly liable to pay all rates and taxes due for Flemish Farm, the collector be instructed to make application to his Royal Highness for all arrears owing by the Prince, Mr. Darville, Solicitor, of Windsor, in accordance with instructions he received from the parish officers, has been, for some time past, in communication, on the subject of the claim of the parish, with Mr. C. E Anson, his Royal Highness's Private Secretary. We understand that Mr Anson, on the part of the Prince, has consented to pay the arrears (amounting to nearly £200), and also to contribute annually a certain sum as regards the relief of the poor, as an equivalent for the rate, but without admitting that the parish has any legal claim upon his Royal Highness for the payment of these rates. The parish officers have demurred to this proposition under the impression, strengthened by legal opinion, that the property in the occupation of the Prince has been fairly and justly rated. The negociation will be resumed upon the return of the Court to Windsor, from the Isle of Wight Unless the legality of the claim be admitted on behalf of his Royal Highness, the question will be again brought forward at a meeting of the inhabitants, the overseers not wishing to proceed further without the sanction and authority of the parishioners in vestry assembled. It is, however, fully expected that the payment of the poor's rates will be no longer resisted.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

At a season when no events of general interest present themselves for record or remark in this department of journalism, and standing as we do on the threshold of a new year which shall bring us hard upon the middle of the nineteenth century, it will not be out of time or place to inquire how our National Sports have kept pace with the great progress of science and art—the glorious march of civilization which has distinguished the present era beyond all others in the history of mankind. Woodcraft—the sober business of the savage—was retained among the pastimes of most, if not all, civilized nations England was the metropolis of its popularity; the national taste for manly exertion and enterprize having propagated from the original rout many varieties of lusty exercises and chivalrous competition.

These formed a stalwart catalogue, to which was given the title of National Sports : the bulk of the community bestowing upon them the privileges of naturalization. Many of them were for a long time exclusively practised in Great Britain : such as have been transplanted, it may be said, without offence, betray, wherever they are discovered, evidences of their native origin. Our affair, however, is with their position and policy at home. Sporting, as a system, is now in good odour, with a large majority of right-thinking, well-meaning people. That this conventional disapproval was the result of an honest principle—and that we may fairly look forward to a great change of opinion in those who have hitherto been its opponents—it is the object of this article to show.

In Strutt's "Sports and Pastimes of the People of England," it is stated that a manuscript of the fourteenth century, preserved in the Royal Library, contains an account of the baiting of horses by ferocious dogs ; and in "Stow's Survay,' we read, that one of the laws of the City prohibited the baiting a bull, a bear, or a horse in the open streets of London, under the penalty of twenty shillings.' That the baiting a bull in the open streets of one of the gravest cities of this island was of much more recent date, we can ourself bear witness.

It is not so very many years ago, that a certain denizen of the ancient city of Chester having fallen into unpopularity, it was resolved at an evening merry-making to afford him signal manifestation thereof. To this end, on the occasion of the annual bull bait there celebrated, on their way to the place where the solemnity was held, the chorus of holy-day folks tied the principal performer to the hinder part of the nervous animal, and the bull ran his way through the open streets with his hall door clattering at its heels. Bull-baiting and bear-baiting are pastimes of the people, within most man's memories : badger-baiting and dog-fighting are public amusements still spoken of by a few organs of public intelligence.

It is, perhaps, the most remarkable national anomaly that ever existed that such exhibitions should have acquired popularity in this country at any period of her history. We do not mean to imply that fierce passions and savage impulses have not, at all times, mingled largely with our characteristics, as a people. Probably they are the stuff of which come the courage which is the national idiosyncrasy; but British hardihood is an active not a passive, principle. We can imagine to ourselves a horror of violence, even of barbarity, of which a mob of Englishmen, surrendered wholly to the influence of their passions, might not be guilty in the fiery excitement of action; but that they should sit secure and satisfied, and look well pleased upon the laceration, the agony, the sanguinary torture and death of any living creature—from the meanest brute that crawls, even to their fellow man : that they ever were passive spectators of a scene such as this is a mystery which we were fain had never sat at defiance all the subtleties of your philosophy." Let them come to us as they may, with all the prestige of classic authority around them, it is unworthy of honour—it is unworthy of manhood to look on tyrants in the decrees and danger to which others are exposed. The gladiator might have been a necessary victim to the savage civilization of Greece and Rome : the combats of the Circus might have begat an indifference of blood among those it was politic to familiarise with carnage. To understand the effect of such spectacles in the present time, it is only necessary to turn to the moral and social condition of those who constitute the modern prize ring. It is well. then, that the middle of the nineteenth century should dawn upon the promise of better things. From its catalogue of popular pastimes, of this country at least, shall be blotted out that vast benefactor its reproach. The Ring will not have left a wreck behind in a year or two more the bailing of animals at the stake has already ceased ; dog-fighting—cock-fighting—the whole list of sanguinary pastimes will become animals of pain or morbid excitement, must soon disappear before the finger of scorn, any shame—if no honourable influence must turn those who effect them from the evil of their ways.

For this reason we anticipate present forbearance in those who now discountenance our National Sports ; and we reckon it no very remote day upon their good offices. Put away from among them all that is base or mean ; let them be boon and gentle, not only in the letter, but the spirit, and our word for it, they will find a friend mowery English heart, whether it be under a drab coat or a "pink." We would not shake one jot of Barry Cornwall's instructive list their characteristics be difficulty, distress, danger ; but let them be of such a nature, that he who adopts the pursuit may say, not only "quoque ipse eah," but also

"Et quorum pars magna fui."

Make this the principle of every pastime of a civilised people, and the popular pastimes will become—as they will deserve to be—NATIONAL SPORTS.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The "firmness" that appears to be the characteristic of the shareMarket, does not appear to have reached the "Corner;" on the contrary, a slackness seems to have existed that the services of the policeman who for so long a period did duty at the "grand entrance,' have been dispensed with, and the transaction continue so exactly keeping with the calmness that will ensue. THE RECENT CONFLICT AT NEW ZEALAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY A CORRESPONDENT.

THE RECENT AFFRAY IN NEW ZEALAND.

By aid of an obliging Correspondent, we are this week enabled to present to our readers a view of the precise locality of the recent affray between the British troops in New Zealand and the natives: showing, distinctly, the Pah of Heki, the leader of the insurgents in the colony; the attack; and the reserve. The details of the conflict were fully given in our Journal of the 29th ult. We append a sketch of Heki's from an article on New Zealand, in the Journal des Débats.

"It appears that Heki is not inferior to his position, and that he is a man really remarkable, considering the degree of civilization to which he has attained. He was formerly converted and baptised by a Methodist, which does not prevent him from treating the Protestant missionaries with great contempt. He has distinct ideas of natural law, and he does not therefore contest the right of the English to cultivate the land which they really purchased from the natives, but he will not recognise their sovereignty, and denies their right to hoist their flag. He will not acknowledge the treaty of cession formerly concluded between some chiefs and the British Governor, because he asserts that it was extorted by fear or corruption from persons who were absolutely ignorant of the bearing of their acts. Heki, it is said, practises the precepts of Christianity as taught him. What is most curious, is the use which he makes against the English of the Bible which they taught him. He combats them with their own weapons. He uses the Scriptures as a two-edged sword, and when they argue with him he replies with Scriptural texts. He often repeats that the English are like Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and that the Zealanders are the oppressed Israelites. Heki is possessed of a noble and chivalrous disposition, and the English have admitted that on many occasions he spared his prisoners."

FRANCE.

A trifling disturbance took place on Saturday last, in that excitable portion of the capital known as the Quartier Latin, in consequence of the police resisting a demonstration of the students of the Ecoles de Droit et de Medecine. The object of the demonstration was M Edgar Quinet. M Quinet, after contributing to the Revue des Deux Mondes and various other periodicals, was appointed one of the Professors at the College de France, and last year his public lectures attracted considerable notice. His advertised programme was "the languages and literature of the South," but, in reality, his lectures consisted of a history of the Christian religion and of the French Revolution, in which the former was treated with anything but reverence, and the latter, including the infamous National Convention, received many a tribute of admiration. The clergy remonstrated, every respectable class of the community also condemned M Quinet's lessons, and on the renewal this year of the "College de France" lectures, M Quinet was again entreated, and subsequently desired, to avoid propagating his notions of Christianity, the Revolution, and Socialism, but he wrathfully resigned his chair, and it was on this determination that the aforesaid students congratulated him on Saturday morning. They mustered to the number of about two thousand, and walked in procession to the professor's residence, being joined on their way by many other turbulent persons. One of them addressed M. Quinet in terms of sympathy, in the name of the rest. M Quinet thanked them, and wisely advised them to retire in peace, and disperse as promptly as possible. They marched back to their quarter, but, on passing the private residence of M de Salvandy, the Minister of Public Instruction, shouted "Vive Quinet!" "A bas les Jesuites!" "A bas Salvandy!" On reaching the Place Saint Sulpice, they again cried, "A bas les Jesuites!" in front of the Ecclesiastical Seminary. One of them made an address to the schools. The police, who had all along watched them, pounced upon the orator, and severely beat him. His comrades then rushed to his assistance, when strong detachments of municipal guards and line made their appearance, and a charge of cavalry closely followed. The students were routed. No killed or wounded are men ioned but between twenty and thirty of Professor Quinet's admirers were captured, and conveyed to the Prefecture de Police. The uproar was soon at an end, and created very little "sensation" in Paris.

We are happy to find that Lord Cowley is recovering from the effects of his accident.

The National gives a frightful picture of Marshal Bugeaud's doings in Africa. According to the accounts published by this paper, 30 prisoners were one day shot in cold blood -13 villages burned—the Dahra massacre acted over again, for it appears that a portion of a tribe having hid themselves in a cave, the same means were resorted to exactly as those employed by Colonel Pelissier, and all smoked and baked to death. The Marshal, himself is the author of all these horrors—his last triumph was a monster razzia —he has ordered the most strict secrecy as to his barbarous proceedings, and the writer of the accounts calls him a second Attila, for he puts all to the sword and fire, sparing only women and infants.

The Moniteur contains three official despatches from Algeria, the dates of which do not extend beyond the 30th ultimo. Abd el Kader is stated to have returned to the west, passing to the south of Goudjila, by the same road he had taken to arrive at Taguine and Sougnt-el Amer. General d'Arbouville, in a report dated Oued Boulier Badou, the 24th, details the treacherous reception given to his column by the Beni Djaads, a Kabyle tribe of the Hamza circle, and the chastisement he has inflicted on them. Above three hundred houses, and all the property in them, have been destroyed by fire, and all who defended them put to death. General d'Arbouville adds that the Beni Djaads, to the number of 3,000, attacked him next day with the utmost spirit and bravery, and he likewise pretty clearly avows that, after three hours of firing, and repeated bayonet charges, he was glad to escape their further pursuit. The third despatch refers to a rising in the hitherto quiet province of Constantina. This insurrection is stated to have been checked, but, in dread of its reviving more seriously still, an additional French column had been ordered to approach and watch the country about Constantina.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Paris papers take a great degree of interest in the recent report of the Times about the repeal of the Corn laws, and they discuss the probability of its truth or falsehood with unusual energy.

BRUNI, OR BORNEO PROPER.—FROM A SKETCH BY A CORRESPONDENT.

BORNEO.

The recent affrays of the British with the pirates of Borneo have, naturally, directed attention to the general character and resources of that island—the largest in the Indian Archipelago, and the largest on the globe, if we except the continent of Australia.

Accordingly, we have received from a Correspondent the annexed view of Borneo, the capital of the kingdom of Borneo Proper, or Brunai, lying on the north-west coast of the Island of Borneo, on the banks of the river, about ten miles from the sea. The mouth of the river is narrow, with a bar in front of it, on which there are scarcely seventeen feet of water at high tides. Further up, the river has a considerable depth, and here the shipping lies, particularly the Chinese junks, which are moored head and stern. The town, which is on low ground, contains a considerable number of houses, built on posts, four or five feet high, which, at the rise of the tide, allow the water to pass freely under them. The streets are formed by canals, either natural or artificial, which facilitate communication; and they are always covered with boats, which are managed by women with great dexterity.

Borneo is a place of considerable trade. Its commerce was principally limited to its intercourse with China, the Philippines and the Sooloo Islands, the countries on the peninsula of Malacca not being much frequented by the Borneo navigators. But, since the foundation of Singapore, the Bugis merchants of Borneo often visit that port. The exports are rice, black pepper, camphor, cinnamon, bees-wax, sea-slugs, turtle-shell, pearls, and mother-of-pearl, with tea, wrought and raw silk, and nankeen, the three last articles being imported from China.

Borneo is rarely visited by European vessels, but many come from Amoy and Ningpo. The Chinese find it advantageous to build their junks here, for, though the island has no teak, it produces other kinds of good ship-timber, among which is the camphor-tree.

SKETCHES IN SPAIN

COSTUMES OF THE PRADO.

THE PRADO AND THE PALACE AT MADRID.

The refined traveller from Spain,
A man in all the world's new fashions planted!

Of the Costumes of the Prado—the mirror of Madrid—we have already taken a few glimpses. (See p. 184.) In the scene now before us we see the mantilla, in all its national varieties. Then, we have the military uniform, and the cloak; and, in the costumes of the children, the passion of the people for being well-dressed is incipiently illustrated. Of the other male dresses—now almost the ordinary costume of Europe,—we need say not a word. The prevalence of dark colours is remarkable; black having always been the favourite, the national colour of Spain.

On the general character of Spain Costumes, we borrow the following lively page from Mr. Ford's admirable "Handbook of Spain":—

"The variety of costumes which appears on the Spanish public alamedas renders the scene far gayer than that of our dull uniform walks, but the loss of the parti-coloured monks will be long felt to the artist. The gentlemen in their capas mingle with the ladies in their mantillas, the white-kilted Valencian contrasts with the velveteen glittering Andalucian; the sable-clad priest with the soldier; the peasant with the muleteer: all meet on perfect equality, as in church, and all conduct themselves with equal decorum, good breeding, and propriety. Few Spaniards ever walk arm in arm, and still less do a Spanish lady and gentleman—scarcely even those whom the holy church has made one. There is no denial to which all classes and sexes of Spaniards will not cheerfully submit in order to preserve a respectable external appearance. This formed one of the most marked characteristics of the Iberians, who, in order to display magnificence on their backs, pinched their bellies. The ancient Deipnosophists, who preferred lining their ribs with good capons, rather than their coats with ermine, could not comprehend this habit (Athen. ii. 6.); and the shifts and starvation endured by poor gentlemen, in order to gratify their boato, or love for external personal ostentation, by strutting about in rich clothes, form one of the leading subjects of wit in all their picaresque novels, for "silks and satins put out the kitchen fire," says Poor Richard. Spaniards, even the wealthy, only really dress when they go out; when they come home, they return to a déshabillé which amounts to dowdiness. Those who are less affluent carefully put by their out-of-door costume, which, consequently, as in the East, lasts for many years, and forms one reason, among many others, why mere fashions change so little: another reason why all Spaniards in public are so well dressed is, that, unless they can appear as they think they ought, they do not go out at all. In the present universal and inconceivable wreck of private fortunes, many families remain at home during the whole day, thus retiring and presenting the smallest mark for evil fortune to peck at. They scarcely stir out for weeks and months; adversity produces a keener impatience of dishonour than was felt in better days, a more morbid susceptibility, an increased anxiety to withdraw from those places and that society where a former equality can no longer be maintained. The recluses steal out at early dawn to the misa de Madrugada, the daybreak mass, which is expressly celebrated for the consolation of all who must labour for their bread, all who get up early and lie down late, and that palest and leanest form of poverty, which is ready to work but findeth none to employ. When the sad congregation have offered up their petition for relief, they return to cheerless homes, to brood in concealment over their fallen fortunes. At dusky nightfall they again creep, bat-like, out to breathe the air of heaven, and to meditate on new schemes for hiding the morrow's distress."

Our second Illustration shows the enormous Royal Palace, or, rather, a portion of it, as seen through the noble archway of the Armeria; at the same time, affording a glance at the street architecture of Madrid. La Armeria real is one of the finest armouries in the world: the noble gallery, which fronts the south side of the Palace, is 227 feet long, by 36 wide: it was built in 1565, by Gaspar de La Vega, for Philip II., when he removed the Royal armoury from Valladolid. This, as it really contains weapons of all kinds, is a double curiosity, being the best provided arsenal in the land; although, as in other matters, the implements are somewhat behind those used by more advanced nations. The first entrance is very striking, and worthy of this land of chivalry, the Cid, and Don Quixote. All down the middle of the saloon are drawn up equestrian figures; while armed Knights stand against the walls, surrrunded in every direction with implements of war and tournament. Above, hang banners taken from the enemy, while the walls are lined with coats of armour. The collection of swords is, however the most interesting; for this weapon, Spain has always been celebrated.

OF THE

PRINCIPAL CITIES OF EUROPE.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

In the second week of December—and, as it were, on the threshold of another prosperous year—we are again enabled to make one of those joyous announcements to our readers, which are ever sources of pleasure to ourselves in the proportion in which their fulfilment tends to the profit and enjoyment of the Public, "for whom we live"—or, at least, of that portion of it with whom we are in weekly and friendly communion.

The perfect honesty of principle and purpose with which this Journal has continued its career, has maintained for it the undeviating confidence of those who placed reliance upon its early promise, and have had no reason to regret their trust. This is our boast; and it will be seen that we uphold our right to it.

It was in this spirit that—destined little to profit, but much to please—we prepared those magnificent commemorations of our early patronage, and afterwards confirmed prosperity—the GRAND VIEW OF LONDON—and superb PANORAMA OF THE THAMES—presented, at fitting intervals, to our readers.

It is in the same spirit that now—towards the close of our Seventh Volume, and another year—with foot firm in the stirrup—gratitude inspiring, and confidence insured—we announce our intention to present our readers with Noble Presents, in appropriate form, and with the best genius and illustration that modern art can afford, and without a thought of expense,

MAGNIFICENT PICTURES

OF THE

PRINCIPAL CITIES OF EUROPE.

It is not more our determination that their production shall surprise all who receive them, than that the faithful Illustrations themselves shall become so many records and monuments of what the good-will and hearty friendship of the public enabled the first Illustrated Newspaper in the Nineteenth Century to achieve. Edinburgh and Dublin put forth their sister claims with London; and we may well aspire to reflect on a grand scale, the Chiefest Cities of Europe, when not Europe, nor any territory short of the whole known world, is able to affix a limit to our circulation.

The minute details of our plan, in presenting these Magnificent Pictures to our Subscribers, will be immediately placed at their disposal. For the present, we are glad to believe that there is not one of them who will not feel confidence and pleasure in its plain ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Number of our Journal, with the Presentation Print, price 6d. No extra charge will be made. The first Print, a VIEW OF THE CITY OF DUBLIN, will be presented early in the ensuing year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"J. M."—Czerny's Exercises are unquestionably the best; any practitioner assiduously studying them must become a first-rate pianist. He is the founder of the modern mechanism of Liszt, Thalberg, Chopin, &c.

"Pashon."—The most easy instrument to learn without a master is the Jew's-harp.

"T. N. E. Z."—The "Chiragymnast" is the best instrument for finger exercise. The price may be ascertained of Messrs. Martin, the patentees, in Piccadilly.

"Y. Z." Jersey, in a way.

"Curious."—It is pronounced Ogh-cleide.

"W. R. W.," Bamborough.—Every cathedral is under the superintendence of the Dean and Chapter of its Canons; they are indeed, the Bishop's council. (See the article, "Bishop, Canon, and Cathedral," in the "Penny Cyclopædia.")

"A Reader," Gower-street.—The s in Adela is short.

"Un Lecteur," Liverpool.—The Berwick smacks sail from the Leith and Berwick and Miller's Wharfs, London.

"H. S. S." Plymouth.—Apply to the Directors.

"J. O'N." Warrington.—Address a letter to Mr. Palmer, the patentee, Shoe-lane.

"X. Y. Z.," Tintern.—We do not think there is an engraved portrait of the late Captain Basil Hall. The last published portrait, in plain dress, is the best likeness of the Duke of Wellington. A cheap and good camera obscura may be purchased of Watkins and Hill, Charing cross.

"A Constant Reader," Guildford.—We will endeavour to ascertain the historical fact our Correspondent requires.

"A Young Subscriber."—Lord Wriothesley Russell is married to Elizabeth, daughter of Lord William Russell, by Charlotte Anne his wife, sister of George, present Earl of Jersey. Lady Wriothesley Russell is thus first cousin to Lady Adela Ibbetson.

"Tobias."—The regulation price of an Ensign's commission in the Line is £450; and of a Cornetcy, £340. In the Foot Guards, an Ensign's commission, giving the rank of Lieutenant, costs £1900; and in the Life Guards, the Ensigncy is fixed at £1250.

"Stephen."—The difference between the "Queen Mother" and the "Mother of the Queen" is this: the former is both a Queen and the Mother of a Queen; the latter is only the Mother of a Queen. The Queen Dowager of Spain is the Queen Mother; the Duchess of Kent is Mother of the Queen.

"C. S. W.," Hackney.—The Christian name of the Princess Esterhazy is Sarah Frederica Caroline. The Duchess of Angoulême was born on the 19th of December, 1778.

"A. B. C."—The Unicorn, as a supporter of the Royal arms, was introduced by King James the First on his accession to the English throne. The standard of the Unicorn had been long borne by the Scots Monarchs, and King James added it to the English shield, as an emblem of his native country.

"T. C. T.," Glasgow.—The Inner and Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn, are three distinct Inns.

"Amicus Certus" is thanked for his suggestion; but the affair is scarcely of sufficient interest.

"R. J.," Romsey, can demand of the Publisher an account of the receipts and disbursements.

"A Young Builder of Ipswich" must be very young in his craft. When he say "one brick thick" we mean that the walls are as thick as one brick placed lengthwise. We are, however, much obliged to him for giving us the opportunity of correcting two misprints in the account of the Burning of the Theatre at Glasgow, for "16" read "14 inches;" and for "the whole edifice seemed for six sides quite insecure," read "for its size quite insecure."

"College of the Deaf and Dumb, Rugby."—We have received a small volume of Essays by the Pupils at this well conducted Establishment, which provides with the comforts of a domestic circle, a sound and liberal education to those persons of the higher classes, of both sexes, who, being deaf and dumb or having impediments of speech, are thus incapacitated for receiving instruction by the usual channels. The Essays are various pleasant and intelligent: they are short themes, written off hand by pupils not exceeding fifteen years of age, in the presence of the parties who proposed the subjects, and they are printed without the slightest alteration.

"Rumahoon Rörgue"—Apply to the Clerical Life Assurance Society, 78, Great Russell street, Bloomsbury.

"A Constant Reader," Turvin.—Heathen.

"Mona" will, perhaps, send a specimen or two; but the subjects named are not very promising.

"P. H.," Torquay.—The Illustrations will appear shortly.

"Scrip."—Five shillings.

"D. H.," Scarborough.—Address a note to Mr. Colburn, 13, Great Marlborough street.

"Peter" should read Mr. Leigh Hunt's "Imagination and Fancy."

"A B, Strand"—The copyright of Dramatic pieces is paid for by managers at a fixed sum, or at a certain sum per night, according to the number of performances. Twenty pounds is not an unusual payment for a clever adaptation of a farce from the French; but we have heard of 15s. 9d. being paid for such a labour!

"Anxytor."—The investigation will require some little time, but we have every hope of being able to afford the information in a week or two.

"Wadeschkenals."—The question of the early Arms of the English Sovereigns is involved in some obscurity. An heraldic writer of repute asserts that the Leopards, the chosen emblems of the Normans, were introduced into England by the Conqueror, and continued to be the Royal ensigns of his successors until the accession of James I. who, considering the Norman descent as derogatory, superseded them by three golden Lions passant guardant. Occasionally, the Royal Shield exhibited two Leopards only: the third was added by Henry II., on his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine. Another authority maintains that the Ensigns of England were always Lions, and strengthens his assertion by a quotation from an early writer, John, the Monk of Evesham, in Towain; who relates that when Henry I. selected Geoffrey Plantagenet to be his son-in law, "Clypeus Leoncelus aureus imaginarios habens colla ejus expendituv."

"A. H. P."—Dr. Wolff is married to Lady Georgiana Mary Walpole, daughter of Horatio, late Earl of Orford.

"T."—The original large paper edition of "Burke's Commoners" is, we believe, out of print. The publishing price of the four volumes was six guineas. A copy may possibly be obtained at Mr. H. Bohn's, York street, Covent Garden.

"A Subscriber."—By the laws of Heraldry, no female is entitled to a crest. It would therefore be evidently incorrect for your Correspondent to have "her seal engraved with her husband's crest and her own initials underneath."

"H. S. F."—The Chevalier John Sobieski Stuart is clearly not a direct descendant of the Young Chevalier Cardinal York was unquestionably the last legitimate male descendant of the Royal House of Stuart.

"A Young Beginner."—To practise as a Conveyancer it is not necessary to be called to the Bar. Attorneys practise as Conveyancers, but "Conveyancers," technically so called, are Barristers. If a member of the Universities (i.e., Oxford, Cambridge, or Dublin), you can be called to the Bar after keeping three years' terms, if of M A standing: otherwise, five are required. The expense of being called, and keeping terms, amounts to about £130. Besides this, the stamp and fees on entrance amount to about £35 The fee paid to Pleader, Conveyancer, or Barrister, for the run of Chamber work, and so called instruction, is £10 per annum Read Stephens's Commentary on the Laws of England, and then refer a Conveyancer's Chambers. Or, read Preston on Real Property; with Jarman on Wills, and Saunders on Uses and Trusts; and use some practical work containing forms, such as Martin and Bythewood's Conveyancing. But nothing can supersede actual work in Chambers.

"Inquisitor."—It is customary for a "Freshman" at Cambridge to commit all sorts of foolish acts of extravagance—giving breakfasts, &c., included. But it is by no means necessary to do so, to win either the reputation of a "gentleman," or the better title of "a good fellow."

"Alfred"—The important examination of pupils at St. John's takes place in May, as at the other Colleges. There may be a preliminary Classical Examination about Christmas, and we have an imfluitmet impression of such a thing; but ourselves, we cannot state positively.

"Netopitus."—We think "Pope."

"A. B."—The following were the Winners:—

1845.	Merry Monarch	Refraction	The Baron	The Emperor

"An Occasional Reader."—We do not know the address of the railway surveyor alluded to. It is most probable that there will be a further demand for railway land surveying.

"An Old Subscriber" Brighton. The artist's error.

"J. T.," Streatham Hill.—The omission was accidental.

"Tenor."—We have been promised the information from an accredited source.

"Oberon."—Washing the hair will darken its colour.

"Inquisitor."—Clerestory is of three syllables. The Great Bell at Rangoon is described in Turner's work on Ava.

"A. T. R.," Banbury.—It is a matter of literary courtesy to maintain the incognito of editorship, where such is sought to be preserved.

"G. B." is recommended to consult the article "Greece," in the "Penny Cyclopædia;" it is very copious in authorities for the History and Antiquities A new History of Greece is announced by Mr. Grote.

"M. L. B. B." should apply to a surgeon.

"Puddy." Belfast.—Next week.

"Max"—The Lines shall appear.

"F. C. C."—Certainly, in Mid-lent.

"Dingle's Road Sweeping Machine."—The note arrived too late.

"Peter Puzzlewig" should address a note to the Secretary of the Zoological Society.

"M N O. P."—We believe it to be possible for a very passable horse to leap nine yards.

"T. H," Ilford, suggests that four statues should be placed on the massive recent pedestals at London Bridge. This has been often proposed, but never attempted.

"Nemo."—The g in Physognomy and Designe is soft.

"T. F. R."—The expense of our half-yearly volumes is 5s.

"Impartial," Bristol, is thanked for his obliging offer.

"G. L. P."—Sir Humphry Davy's "Vision" in the Colosseum, can only be purchased in his volume, "Consolations in Travel," or in one of the volumes of his collected works.

"G. P. R."—Apply to Dr. Ramadge, Kig-place.

"A Subscriber," Rye. The price of "Frank's First Trip to the Continent" is 5s.

"A Parishioner."—The sketch of Welton Church, restored, did not reach us in time.

"W. B.," Kilfield.—Eugene Aram was a classical usher at Knaresbrough and Lynn.

"Stratton."—Chambers's Miscellany is published weekly. An Illustrated London Almanack for 1845 may still be had.

"Clonmel."—General Tom Thumb has just arrived in London.

"F. E. G.," Lewes.—Address Mr. Landells, Engraver, 6, Bride-court, Blackfriars.

"D. C." Dumbarton.—Certainly.

"Chares." A stamp is necessary.

"Alban" is thanked for his obliging offer, but the subject is scarcely of sufficient interest.

"W. J."—The French Chambers usually meet on January.

"Fleam."—The term Quakeress is not to be found in Dictionaries; though custom has, to some extent, adopted it.

"T. F. B." Oxford.—The subscription to our Journal is 6s. 6d. per quarter.

"W. D.," Stonesford.—We are not in possession of the address.

"A. C. G."—In or soon after the year 1834, an Exhibition of National Manufactures, Machines, &c., was opened in the King's Mews, Charing Cross.

"A Tradesman," Lyme Regis, should appeal to the Income Tax Commissioners.

"W. M. F." We think not.

"Cornelius Agrippa" may be right; but, it would be fishing in troubled waters.

"W. J. G." Thanks.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1845.

RESIGNATION OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.

We are enabled to confirm the truth of a rumour which was in circulation at the Clubs in the early part of the week. Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues have resigned. They tendered their resignations to her Majesty on Wednesday, and they were accepted. Our contemporaries assign various reasons for this step. From all that we have heard, we think there is no reason to doubt that the immediate cause of Sir Robert Peel's resignation was disagreement in opinion with the Duke of Wellington upon the subject of the Corn-laws. The Noble Duke is stated to be entirely opposed to their Repeal. A Cabinet Council was held on Monday last, and there is little doubt that it was upon this occasion that the determination of Sir Robert was taken. Indeed, the resignation of the Ministers was openly talked of at the Clubs on Tuesday night.

The public are naturally very anxious to learn the name of the Statesman who will be entrusted with the selection of a new Cabinet. We are enabled to state that the task has been entrusted to Lord John Russell, who has already had an interview with her Majesty upon the subject, and has received her Majesty's commands to form a new Ministry. In some quarters it is believed that Lord Stanley will again join his former colleagues, the Whigs. Various other rumours are in circulation, but we forbear from noticing them, as we shall probably be enabled to communicate some authentic information on the subject in a later impression.

WITHOUT mingling here in the great controversy which for these ten days past has been carried on between the leading journals, it may not be out of place shortly to consider the mode in which it has been conducted. Earnestness and warmth of feeling are to be expected from all advocates of any cause if they are sincere, and the language which fairly expresses those feelings cannot be objected to; but in the present case we are sorry to see that the limits of controversy and argument have been, on one side at least, far exceeded. The subject in dispute—the Laws regulating the importation of Corn into the United Kingdom—is one so purely commercial, that it might be thought capable above all others of the most temperate treatment. It does not involve any distinct party or political principle; it can awake none of those religious animosities which we have witnessed in former years. The statement by one journal, that these laws were about to be repealed, was one not difficult to meet by a fair contradiction, if wholly unfounded; a very short time would have disproved it, to the destruction of the credit of the, in that case, rash assertor; and, in the mean time, the question itself might have been argued with that degree of judgment and temper we look for from all who take a prominent part in public affairs.

The mischief of reckless and unsupported statements in an organ to which the public has been accustomed to trust in matters of fact, can no ther be overrated nor too strongly condemned, though the practice would soon work its own cure; no journal could long survive the general want of confidence in an indulgence in such temerity of statement would produce. This is the position of the Times: it has committed itself to an assertion that a certain course of policy is contemplated by the present Government. The Herald denies the fact with equal confidence, if not with all that intimate and perfect knowledge of official movements which the ostensible organ of the Government ought to possess. The public are at liberty to form its opinion between the two opponents, with such help as it can derive from the former acts of the same men in similar, if not in exactly identical circumstances. But this arrival at a decision is not aided, if the denier of the premises advanced adopts an angry tone; plunges into mere abuse of its opponent; indirectly, at least, speaks of a possibility of Lynch law being applied to the establishment and personnel of its r val, and directly charges a large and influential body of men, which includes many of the first merchants of the kingdom, with the horrible crime of murder! The Times has drawn a parallel between the necessity that now exists for a repeal of the Corn Law and the exigencies that compelled the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, in 1829, to carry the Catholic Emancipation Bill. The effect of the parallel would, of course, depend on the degree of force with which it was established; with the same men in power, and a general difficulty apprehended, it was almost inevitably suggested. But, is the impression that a crisis is at hand, demanding all the energies of our rulers, removed by language like this, held by the Herald of Wednesday?

> What signs do we see of the state bordering on civil war? What murders are there? We know of but one League murder, that of the late lamented Mr. Drummond; alas! sacrificed in vain if the subborners of his murderer are to triumph; and, by the way, Mr. Drummond's murderer was not an Englishman or even a Scotch Saxon—he was a Celt—and, as we have been assured, a son or grandson of one of the ready-blooded Irish homicides of 1798.

A Jury of Englishmen found that the wretched slayer of Mr. Drummond was a maniac, not morally responsible for his actions. If any one "knew" him to have been the instrument of others, what guilt have they not incurred by withholding the evidence that would have proved it! If the "suborners of the murderer" can be so distinctly denounced, why was it not done before? But all this is absurd; to subst tute it for argument is almost as insane as the miserable deed itself Then what has the race or nation of the unhappy man to do with the question at all? The curse of madness falls upon men in all countries, and mania often takes the form of hatred to some prominent and public person, without any cause whatever. To connect the League with the deed of a monomaniac, is simply to charge men like Lord Morpeth with abetting assassination; and any reasonable man will see at once how heavily this will recoil on those who make it. It is not the way to conduct an argument on a great national question. Nor is the next passage much better.

> The same paper, supposing—what has not yet happened—that its rival will recommend a resort to popular violence, as a means of obtaining a repeal of the Corn-laws, says, "If it did so, either the people would disregard it, or end by throwing the inanimate part of the establishment into the Thames—depositing the living creatures on the softest couch afforded by the alluvies of Puddle Dock."

What is this but a suggestion of the exercise of that brutal system of mob law, which Englishmen have so often denounced when put in force in America. But a short time has elapsed since the establishment of a newspaper that advocated the abolition of slavery, rather too near the borders of a slave state, was broken up, and the editor all but deposited in the "softest couch afforded by the alluvies" of the Mississippi, in consequence of the same sort of incitement. Every journal in England reproved the outrage; are we to see the same spirit rising among ourselves, and let it pass unrebuked? We do not pretend to decide which party has the greatest claim to credit, and one of them, at least, is very well able to defend itself. But it is due to the character of the whole press not to see the fair bounds of argument in any case exceeded.

THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS.—The Sun of Thursday evening says:—"Immediately upon the refusal of the Duke of Wellington, on Friday last, to carry out what he had agreed to do—namely, to propose a repeal of the Corn laws in the House of Lords if he could succeed in that resignation of office by Sir Robert Peel must follow. Lord John Russell was recommended to be sent for, and a messenger was dispatched, on Saturday last, to communicate his attendance at Osborne House. His arrival there was expected yesterday, and Sir Robert Peel expected to have met him. Sir Robert, however, returned last night, without having seen Lord John. This morning, Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel had an interview of an hour's duration, after which, Lord John Russell left town for Cowes. He had an audience of her Majesty, and has returned to town this evening, having had full powers given him to form a Government. He has sent for Lord Palmerston, and is taking, it is believed, all the necessary steps to form an Administration."

POSTSCRIPT

DISSOLUTION OF THE PEEL MINISTRY.

We give elsewhere a list of the supposed composition of the new Ministry, but it is right to inform our readers that, as far as we can learn from official sources, no final arrangement has yet been concluded. Lord John Russell returned to this country (Friday), after a long interview at Osborne with her Majesty, by whom the Noble Lord was very graciously received; and he has been in communication with many of the Members of the former Whig Administration (and rumour says with some of the Conservatives), but it is obvious that some little time must elapse before the entire list of the new Ministry can be given in an authentic shape. Considerable activity was manifested about the Government offices throughout the whole of yesterday, and Sir James Graham had an interview with Sir Robert Peel in the course of the morning. Her Majesty will be in town in the course of to-day (Saturday); as, in consequence of the present position of affairs, it is necessary that as little delay as possible should be interposed between official communications with the Crown. A dissolution of Parliament is talked of, but we have reason to believe that the new Premier will first test his power to prevail upon the existing one to repeal the Corn laws first. The meeting of Parliament will probably take place about the usual period. Because, although, of course, all the new Ministers must vacate their seats, there will be time enough for their re-election by February, and the urgency of public business is such, that it is important not to protract the period for the commencement of the Session.

The Times says:—"Last week Sir Robert Peel had gained over to a total repeal of the Corn laws all his colleagues except three or four, with whose co operation, if report speaks true, he might very well have dispensed. He had just won the reluctant assent of the Duke of Wellington, and his promise to propose the measure in the Lords. It had also been settled to summon Parliament early in January for this purpose. Our readers then possessed an exact and literal transcript of the Ministerial state and intentions. We had not even confined to notice the 'incumbrance and doubtful' exceptions to the general unanimity. Unless, indeed, it had been possible to tell, not only what was in men's minds, but also what might possibly enter into them, we are convinced that even the Cabinet itself could have given a truer account of the state of affairs. Subsequently, however, to the date of our announcement, the Duke withdrew his assent, and joined the minority. The Premier then felt that it was not his place, or perhaps in his power, to carry the measure. On Saturday, accordingly, Sir R. Peel informed the Queen of the difficulties in which he found himself, and tendered his resignation. Her Majesty is said very pleased to express a great desire to retain his services, if it could possibly be so arranged. Sir Robert Peel could suggest no alternative, and the Queen summoned Lord John Russell to her councils. On Wednesday, the whole Ministry resigned, and is now only holding office till Lord John Russell has selected a Government to supply its place."

The Globe says:—"The rumour of a speedy, if not an immediate dissolution of Parliament, was very prevalent at all the West end Club houses on Thursday, and the conference which took place between Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel rendered it probable that the original force of the report which we gave a week ago, that a coalition Ministry, with the two Whig and Tory chiefs at the head, would be formed. Indeed, it is currently reported in the City that this event has already taken place, and that on a dissolution of Parliament, to solicit Sir Robert Peel to stand as a candidate for the City of London, by the side of the Noble Lord, the present member for the City, upon the broad principles of Free Trade and Repeal of the Corn laws."

From the Sun:—"The following noblemen are sure to be included in the new arrangement likely to be made:—Lord Lansdowne, Lord Morpeth, and Lord Campbell. Lord Auckland will not improbably superintend the Board of Control, and Lord Fortescue the Post-office. Mr. Charles Wood is spoken of as most likely to be Secretary for Ireland. Mr. George Grey, Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Shell, and Mr. Tuffnell, are also certain to be members of the new Government. Mr Tuffnell will probably be the whipper in Secretary to the Treasury; and Mr. Hawes is spoken of as likely to be the Financial Secretary. We hope, for the sake of the Government itself, as well as of the country, that such men as Lord Fitzwilliam, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. T. Duncombe, who carry with them great popular confidence, may be included in the Government, her Majesty's arrangements. The Marquis of Anglesey is spoken of for command in the army. Lord John Russell was on his way from Edinburgh to London on Tuesday, in obedience to the Queen's summons, and met at Normanton Station Mr. Cobden and Mr Bright, who were just taking their leave for a few minutes. This accidental circumstance, the coming together of the men of the people, is, we hope, the omen of a still closer alliance."

DINNER OF THE SMITHFIELD CATTLE CLUB.

Yesterday evening, the Annual Dinner of the above Club took place at the Freemasons' Tavern.

About 150 sat down to dinner, his Grace the Duke of Richmond presiding. Amongst the company we noticed P. Pusey, Esq., M.P.; Col. Wood, M.P.; Col Sibthorp, M.P., Sir Charles Clark, Sir H. Verney, Capt Shaw, Messrs. Milward, Stokes, Gibbs, &c.

On the removal of the cloth, the Noble Chairman proposed "The Health of her Majesty," which was drunk with three times three.

The next toast was "The Prince Consort." Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family," which was drunk with three times three.

The Chairman, after sending in high terms of praise of the late President, the late Earl Spencer, requested the company to drink to his memory, which they did in solemn silence.

The next toast was "Future Prosperity to the Smithfield Cattle Club," which was drunk with three times three

The Chairman then read the list of prizes, and delivered them to those present.

The next toast was "The Successful Competitors." Drank with three times three

P. Pusey, Esq., M.P., in proposing the health of the Chairman, observed that, although he was a new President, he was no stranger. (Hear.) He not only belonged to the highest rank in the country, but he was endeared by all who approached him. In addition to this pension, he trusted that many of the nobles of the land would follow his example. The toast was drunk in the most enthusiastic manner.

The Noble Chairman, in returning thanks, said nothing gave him greater pleasure than being surrounded by farmers, he felt highly honoured by being called upon to act as their President. He was decidedly of opinion the land lords and farmers ought to be closely connected together; in fact, in his opinion, unless the tenants were backed up by the landlords, they could not prosper.

The healths of Mr. Pusey and the Vice-Presidents, the Secretary, Mr. Gibbs, &c., &c. followed, after which the Noble Duke vacated his chair.

ANOTHER MURDER IN IRELAND.—A frightful murder was committed near Horrisbrockagh on Thursday last. The victim was a man named Darby Hogan, (Johnny), one in humble rank and station. It was a cool and pre-determined act, not arising out of a quarrel, or faction fight—but a cold, a wicked, and a barbarous murder. At nine o'clock at night, as he was coming out of his own residence, a man walked up and fired a pistol at his head, which literally carried away the roof, for he fell dead on the spot. This poor man was a witness in the case of the prosecution of Doctor and Mrs. Hobbs, of Horrisokane, against two men, named John Hogan (Shra), and John Hogan (Ballinderry). He swore only to the fact of seeing one of them in the neighbourhood of the place where Dr. and Mrs. Hobbs were attacked. The two Hogans were found guilty, and sentenced to transportation—one of them to transportation after a month's imprisonment the other after being twelve months in confinement. Since then, Darby Hogan (Johnny), the present victim, had been denounced from the altar, and three months have scarcely elapsed since the thunders of the altar were issued against him as an informer, a perjurer, and a convicting of horrescent men. Some short time after Darby Hogan was thus denounced an attempt was made to get up an ingenious sort of alibi for Hogan (Shra) and Hogan (Ballinderry). Three fellows came forward and stated that the two Hogans were not guilty, and about to suffer innocently, inasmuch as that they (those three fellows) were the guilty parties. An invest gation was ordered by Government, but the trick failed, they broke down in their swearing, and one of the Hogans is now on his way to a penal settlement—the other remains in the county gaol, waiting to finish his 12 months before he follows his namesake.

THE SMITHFIELD CATTLE CLUB.

Mr. T. Harris (for beasts and long-woolled sheep); and Mr. Tanner, Mr. R. Boys, and Mr. W. Stace (for short-woolled sheep and pigs), were engaged in deciding the relative merits of the animals submitted to their view. The result will be found below

The nobility among the exhibitors had a fair sprinkling of prizes—among the first, the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Radnor, and the Duke of Richmond. The best prizes were, however, obtained by farmers and commoners Messrs. Layton, Adams, Fouracre, Withers, Trinder, Bland, and Palmer, and others, whose names will be found below, all obtained medals or prizes of more or less value and amount.

A very elegant iron roof, of remarkable span, has been thrown over the beasts' yard, to protect them from the heat during the day, and replaces the somewhat clumsy tarpaulin under which the monstrous productions of stock breeding care in former years reclined while under the inspection of the curious. The construction of the roof reflects great credit on Mr. Boulnois jun., the architect. Besides this new roof, additional room has also been given by the appropriation of what was formerly the Glacialarium; though, from the removal of the artificial ice, the sorrowful sheep and pigs, to whose use the space is devoted, are deprived of their only chance of healthful exercise.

The exhibition was opened to the public on Wednesday morning at eight o'clock. Previous to that hour the first day or two were very numerous, but on the day advanced increased numbers continued to pour in, and a glance into the yard at one period, before and after midday, would have been sufficient to satisfy the most sceptical that the "show" had lost none of its popularity, at any rate among the masses of the community

His Grace the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Warwick, Lord Portman, Lord Hatherton, Mr. Pusey, M.P. and Mr J. H. Childers, M.P., were among the earlier visitors during the morning, and Major General Wemyss, who it will be recollected has the honour to act in the capacity of "steward" to the Prince Consort, also paid a visit to the exhibition during the morning

The annual meeting of the members of the Club for the transaction of the usual routine business was held at one o'clock in the committee room, the Duke of Richmond, as senior vice president, occupying the chair

The Noble Duke was unanimously elected President, in the room of the late Earl Spencer

The Duke of Richmond then called the attention of the meeting to the vacancy in the list of vice presidents caused by his own election to the office of president, and proposed, as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Earl Spencer, that his brother, the present Earl, should be elected vice president.

The motion having been seconded, was unanimously agreed to.

The vacancy in the trusteeship caused by Earl Spencer's death was filled up by the election of Lord Portman to the office

Mr. W. Fisher Hobbs and Mr. Turner were next elected stewards in the place of Mr. Millward and Mr. J. S. Turner, retiring by rotation

The quantity of stock sold during Wednesday was unusually large, and the facilities of railway intercourse were taxed to the utmost to convey to the distant localities for which many of the arrivals were purchased Coventry, Southampton, Wolverhampton, Windsor, and many other places, each destined to receive a proportion of the fat beef prepared for the London market. The short horned ox bred by the late Lord Huntingfield, and fed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, to which a prize of £10 was awarded by the judges, was purchased early in the day by Mr. John Bannister, of Threadneedle-street, purveyor to Her Majesty, for the large sum of 80 guineas Mr John Bannister also bought the West Highland ox, fed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, which the judges commended, as-well as the following animals:—Mr. Tournire's Devon steer, which gained the first prize of £30, and a silver medal to the breeder; and the same gentleman's heifer, to which a prize of £10 and a silver medal were awarded.

The following were the other principal purchases made:—

Mr Collingwood, of Lamb's Conduit street, bought the Hereford ox, fed by Mr. R. M. Layton, Thorney Abbey, Cambridgeshire, to which a prize of £20, a silver medal to the breeder, and a gold medal as the best ox in the yard, had been awarded; Mr. Bannister, of Windsor, purveyor to the Court, purchased his Royal Highness Prince Albert's short horned steer (prize of £5); Mr. Comfort, of Islington, bought Mr. Dunber's North Devon steer (prize of £10 and silver medal); Mr. Ryder, of Southampton, the Earl Spencer's improved short-horned heifer (prize of £10); Mr. S. Morris, of Coventry, purchased Mr. Lythall's Durham cow (prize of £5); Mr. Lucking, of Walbrook, bought the Earl of Leicester's Devon steer (prize of £10 and silver medal); and Mr. Ryder, of Southampton, purchased the late Earl Spencer's short-horned ox, which, although not competing, was highly commended by the judges.

Very few purchases of sheep and pigs were made on Wednesday. Mr. Wall, of Jermyn street, bought a pen of Bedford and Suffolk pigs, fed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Among the more noticeable cattle were, the TWIN STEERS. The Society, however, haying no provision or class for Twins, and the rules of the Society allowing but one animal belonging to a competitor being shown in a class, the animals were not shown together They are the property of a gentleman of Taunton, and are 4 months old, of a beautiful roan colour, and weigh nearly 200 stone each; they were fatten by Nathaniel Bland, Esq., of Randalls Park, Letherhead. There was a very fine ox, of the red Devon breed, and an orderly man to attend it. The ox won the first prize at Taunton on the 28th of last month. It is the property of Mr. James Bailey, of Holm Farm, near Wellington, Somerset. The female is a very honest and industrious servant, and Peggy Norman, aged about 59, and has been in Mr Bailey's employment for many years She has the sole management of the fattening department, and rears the Queen of a very extensive range of Ox stalls. A very fine cow attracted great notice, as the enormous fat ox, (with a crumpled horn almost touching its right cheek), followed her through the streets, knowing well her own

On Thursday, the 2nd day of the exhibition, the attendance was much greater than on Wednesday, quite a succession of visitors continuing from the opening in the morning to seven in the evening

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge honoured the show with his presence.

The first pointed out to the notice of his Royal Highness, of course was the ox fed by Prince Albert.

The Roy l Duke expressed great regret on learning from Mr Gibbs that the Duke of Rutland's short-horned steer had been accidentally prevented from reaching the show in time to be included in the competition, and also that the best of the Earl of Warwick's beasts had fallen lame just previous to its transmission to London. Mr. Trinder's heifer (a mid white animal) is, perhaps, one of the most perfect beasts in the yard. Indeed, this fact is borne out by that of the Gold Medal having been conceded to it as the best cow or heifer. While the Royal Highness was pointing at the animal, the owner had the honour to submit for his inspection a very beautifully executed model of the same in white wax, executed for Lord Sherborne by a young artist named Weber.

After taking the circuit of the cattle yard, His Royal Highness walked towards the sheep and pig pens, and implement gallery, and having thanked the Duke of Richmond and the officers of the Club for their courtesy and attention, took his departure shortly before one o'clock.

We should say that the number of visitors during the day exceeded 10,000

The principal purchasers were from the country, as will be seen by the subjoined list:

Mr. Trinden's Heifer, prize of £20, and Gold Medal, as best heifer; was sold to Mr. Cooper of Abington in Berkshire, for 50 gs. nrs.

Mr Adam's Hereford ox to Mr. Barton, of Basingstoke Mr Chatfield's Devon steer to Mr. Knight, of Brighton; Mr Stewart's West High cow and steer to Mr Alder, of Bedford; Mr. Tuckey's Devon cow to Mr Church, of Reading, Mr. Adams's Hereford ox to Mr. Righton, of Reading; Mr. Senior's Hereford ox to Mr. Ryder, of Southampton; Sir William Hake's Hereford ox to Mr. Mann, of Croydon; the Earl of Aylesford's North Devon cow, to Mrs. Hancock, purveyor to her Majesty; Mr. Bennett's short-horned heifer (prize £10), to Mr. Ryder, of Southampton; Mr. Hayward's short horned cow (prize £5), to the Duke of Leeds; the Earl of Radnor's Hereford cow prize £20, and Silver Medal), to Mr. Righton, of Reading; the late Earl Spencer's short-horned cow, to Mr. Lawrence, of Rugby.

Mr. Hollies, of Oxford-street, bought Prince Albert's only remaining unsold animal.

street, Baker-street, 195 feet long, by 80 feet wide, ormerly only temporarily covered in with canvass, was, this year, surmounted by a light and elegant iron tension trussed roof, well lighted by a ridge lantern extending the whole length. On the west side, a spacious gallery, 40 feet wide, has been thrown open to the arena, thus affording ample room for the display of roots, plants, seeds, implements, &c. The whole of these improvements were designed by, and executed under the direction of, Mr. Boulnois, jun., architect. The general arrangements for the Show were, throughout, most excellent and complete, and reflect the highest credit upon those gentlemen to whom the management was entrusted; and we acknowledge, with pleasure, the courtesy shown by the indefatigable Hon. Sec., Mr. Braidreth, to the artists of our establishment.

PORTRAIT OF REMBRANDT.

PAINTED BY HIMSELF.

(The Original in the Louvre.)

Where the Grand Louvre, in its lap of art,
  Hoards half the genius-treasure of a world—
Of wondrous mind portrays th' immortal part,
  And holds the banner of the soul unfurl'd!
Where the proud legacies of ages past,
  Stor'd by the lavish taste of fostering Kings,
Are grasp'd and gather'd, as in some fine Vast Which Glory sails on everlasting wings!

Where the tranc'd Wanderer strays from other lands,
  To check his travel with its finest pause—
Touch'd into Love by ART's magician wands,
  And fill'd with all the truth of Beauty's laws—
Beauty which beams with intellectual force—
  A sort of Godhead shining out of Man—
With all the heavenly influence of its source
  Fix'd by the Genius that hath giv'n it span!

Where Nations come, in brief, to worship Mind
  Letter'd on canvass, that doth out-last Time—
Dead Names: with Immortality behind,
  Commanding homage with a front sublime.
Ay! where the Painters of Creation throng—
  Their works the priceless jewels of the mart—
And range the triumphs of their lives along
  Those works that deify the realms of Art.

In the eternal LOUVRE! Even there!—
  Will flash some likeness of a Face divine,
As ancient Temples still revealed with care
  The God's fair image sculptur'd near his shrine.
So near the shrines of those immortal men
  (Their pictured glories which tranced eyes adore,)
Will gleam some fine life-portraiture—as'if then
  Unseen—but thence remembered ever-more!

Thus have we Rembrandt! he whose shadowy might Gave greater depth to darkness, and struck through Back grounds like tombs—the tingling spark of light
  That gave to faces freshness of the dew;—
Made them speak out with eyes and looks of mind
  Fidelity that fixed the searcher's gaze—
Evoking Truth, with Alchemy refined,
  That charm'd the spirit with its own amaze!

And he who painted other's portraits so,
  And to Creative Art gave depth more grand,
Here dasheth forth the glory and the glow
  Of his own features—by the same bright hand!
Rembrandt, by Rembrandt painted, shadoweth here
  Deep truthful reflex from the Louvre wall;
The living star shines out as full and clear
  As the Fame-radiance that hath warm'd us all!

DEPARTURE OF THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE FROM PLYMOUTH.

On Sunday last, his Imperial Majesty's ship Ingermanland, 74 guns, with the flag of Admiral Lutke, having the Grand Duke Constantine on board, got under way, followed by the Vaarrchafsky, a fine corvette of 30 guns.

Our Engraving, from a sketch by Mr. N. M. Condy, represents the Ingermanland passing the Queen, Sir John West's flag-ship, Albion, Vanguard, Rodney, Canopus, Superb, President, 50, Admiral Dacres, and Daring; all of which ships fired a Royal salute, and manned yards. It was one of the finest sights we ever remember having witnessed.

During his Imperial Highness' stay at Plymouth, he visited all the public buildings, the Dockyard, and Victualling-yard, and received the most marked attention from all the authorities. His Highness appeared to be much gratified with every thing he saw.

We cannot omit mentioning the delight his visit to Mount Edgcumbe afforded him. Although the noble owner could not be there to receive the Royal visitor, every arrangement was made for his seeing the grounds to the best advantage; horses and carriages being provided for this purpose, at Cremill Ferry. On his Highness landing, a royal salute was fired; and he was received by Deeble Boger, Esq., and J. H. Boger, Esq., who did the honours to the illustrious guest. After the cavalcade had visited the orangery, gardens, park, &c., they partook of a splendid déjeûner, and departed much pleased with their visit.

Interchanges of civilities have taken place between the Russian officers and the officers of the Queen. Nor were the sergeants of the gallant 55th backward; they gave a handsome and substantial dinner to the non-commissioned officers and petty officers of the Russian ships.

In May, his Imperial Highness' yacht will be ready, when he is expected to make a longer sojourn. She is a splendid schooner of 250 tons, and, no doubt, will be a credit to her constructor, Mr J. White, of Cowes. With such patronage as this, yachting will ever be in the ascendant. His Imperial Highness has honourably R.W.Y.C., by becoming a member

On Wednesday, the Ingermanland left Plymouth Sound, with her consort, the corvette Pantschafsky, at 11 o'clock, bound to Palermo. At one o'clock, with a light wind N.N.W., under top-gallant studding sails, the two ships were observed off the Ram Head, steadily pursuing their course down Channel.

MUSIC.

THE VETERAN BRAHAM.

"Braham est mort à Londres du choléra au mois d'août 1834." Do not be alarmed, readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS! It is only M. Fétis, of the Brussels Conservatory, who makes this astounding announcement in his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens." Braham, thus killed in 1834 by the great historian, who evidently never wrote to the celebrated tenor to inquire if he was very dead, he heard on Wednesday night at the St. James's Theatre sing the "Death of Nelson," and "Deeper and Deeper still," "dans lequel" (we mean the scena of Handel,), as M. Fétis observed with a closer approximation to truth, "Il arrachoit des larmes de tous les auditeurs." Yes! there on the stage of his unfortunate speculation, stood Braham, with the wig and curls that were worn in little Harry Bertram, in our youthful days, to charm susceptible hearts, moved by the eloquent sounds of a tender tenor. Of its débit, nothing can be known except by tradition. The precise day of his birth will always be a vexed question. It must have been, however, since the dekane, and that is sufficient What a career has Braham's been, since he sang at the Old Royalty Theatre in the east, to his appearance on Wednesday night with two sons, a tenor and a bass, at the St James's, in the west It is more than half a century since he sang under Ruzzini's auspices at Bath It was in 1795, we believe, that he made his début at the Italian Opera House in London. Paris, Florence, Milan, Genoa, Leghorn, Venice, Trieste, Hamburg, &c. were places of great triumph for him. He has been the contemporary of Catalani, Storace, Mrs Billington, Madame Fodor, Grassini, Miss Stephens, Miss Paton, Mrs. Salmon, &c. After a career of unprecedented success, Braham embarked in the Colosseum, St. James's Theatre, &c.; and the result has been his return to public life. The best qualities of a vocalist, dramatic expression, and fine declamation, he still retains His power and register are, of course, diminished; but in the "Bay of Biscay" he still manages to electrify audiences by his startling energy. Charles Braham, the tenor, is greatly improved in his style of singing His nasal defect is less apparent, and he phrases better. In Linley's serenade "Love art Thou Waking," he gained a deserved encore Hamilton Braham has a noble bass organ, but which wil. require much practice to acquire flexibility. He is calculated to make an effective stage singer The father and the sons concluded with Bishop's beautiful and ever-fresh glee of "The Winds Whistle Cold." The patriarch Lindley played one of his fantasias in his usually good-humoured manner, as if he were an still unrivalled as a violoncello executant Miss Hawes, the Misses Williams, Miss Hobbs, and Miss Cubitt, assisted in a very agreeable scheme, in the presence of a numerous and fashionable audience

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The fifth Chamber Concert, under the direction of Mr. B. Graves, on Monday night, displayed the gratifying novelty of two Madrigals being introduced in the scheme; the one, "All Creatures Now are Merry" by J. Benaud, bearing date 1598, and the other of the same year, "Flora Gave me Fairest Flowers," by J. Wilbye, the latter being encored Miss Lyon sang Linley's song, "Bid your Faithful Ariel Fly," too ambitiously. Mr. W. H Weiss gave a spirited MS. Bacchanalian Scena, by Mr. H. R. Richards, first introduced in public, in its present form, by Standish, most effectively. Mr. Weiss is improving in his style. Mr. Lockey gains ground considerably as a tenor. He sang a new composition by Mr Tutton, "Good Night," with such tact, as to secure its favourable reception. Mrs. W H Weiss (late Miss Barrett of the Royal Academy) warbled two MS. songs by Mr. W. Rea, advantageously for her fame. With her splendid soprano she may become, with study, a first-rate artiste The instrumental pieces were Beethoven's Krentzer Sonata in A, executed by Miss Binckes (piano) and Mr Thirlwall (violin). Spohr's Quartet in E major op. 43, by Messrs. Streather, Watson (violins), Weslake (tenor), and Mr. H. J Banister (violincello). E J Loder's Quartet No. 4, for the same instruments, and Sterndale Bennett's admirable Sestet op. 8, performed by himself at the piano, Gattie and Watson (violins). Weslake (tenor), H. J. Banister (violoncello), and C. Severn (double bass). Mr Lucas ably accompanied the vocal selection. The last concert is on December 22.

HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.

A Subscription Concert was given, on Tuesday night, at the Hanover-Square Rooms. The vocalists were—Miss Hawes, Miss Lucombe, Miss Rainforth, Messrs Harrison D. W. King, Phillips, and John Parry. Mr. J. B Richards was Conductor, and executed his fantasia on themes from Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," with great success The veteran Lindley drew down the accustomed plaudits in his violoncello solo The chief novelty in the scheme was a descriptive song, "the Bear Hunt," by Mr. H Phillips, who was encored; but the composition was not worthy of his high position; it is too common-place, and savours rather powerfully of the good "old style"—the vulgar. Such exhibitions are all very well for Mr. H Russell, who has the merit—if there be any—of introducing this class of works into concert-rooms. The encores were frequent; Miss Rainforth and Miss M. B Hawes, in the duet by the latter, "I would not, if I could, forget," Mr Harrison, in Wallace's "Memory of the Past;" and John Parry, in "Young England."

The Concert was arranged by a party of gentlemen, who directed a similar entertainment some months since, and their efforts certainly exhibited energy and taste

Independently of the above Concerts, Mr. H Russell gave his Entertainment, on Monday, at the Marylebone Institution; and, on Thursday, at the Western Institution, Leicester-square On the same days Mr. H. Smith had Nights at Crosby Hall and the National Hall. On Tuesday and Friday Mr. Fraser and his daughters had musical soirées. On Wednesday Miss Flower, at Crosby Hall, repeated her performance of Sacred Music On the same night there was the Anniversary Concert at the Mechanics' Institution; and that night the Sacred Harmonic Society met at Exeter Hall. Of these meetings we must take another occasion to report progress.

MR. WALLACE'S "MARITANA."—Drury-Lane Theatre has been crowded to excess through the week; and the opera gains nightly in popularity.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The vaudeville of "Zoé, ou Pamant prêté," has been revived at the St. James's Theatre. The plot and incidents of the piece are familiar to the play-going public from Mr. Planché's felicitous adaptation produced, during the Vestris' management at the Olympic, under the title of "The Lean of a Lover," which is still a favourite piece at our own theatres whenever it is represented. Mdlle. Eugenie Albert assumed the part of Zoé, the simple, though sincere-hearted village maiden, with much expression and truthfulness. M. Narcisse is an actor of no ordinary talent. His impersonation of the burly, honest rustic, was very effective: his comic powers, though very great; somewhat as we believe we have before observed—in the style of Arnal. M. Ulric, who played the amant prêté, availed himself of all the opportunities the part afforded to be entertaining, and contributed much to the good effect of the revival, which was unquestionably successful. On Monday evening, Picard's comedy of "La Petite Ville" was played. The piece is not likely to become a favourite one, being tedious and uninteresting The plot and situations are weak, and the scene is given to the actors to display their talents It is intended as a satire upon the provincial customs of France, exposing the system of scandal and mischief-making carried on in these places It was, to a certain extent, successful, but did not appear to create any particular impression upon the audience. The amusing vaudeville of "Le Capitaine Rhodomontade," which followed, was an agreeable relief; and Lafont soon banished all the coldness and drowsiness diffused about the house by "La Petite Ville." The theatre continues to be well filled.

THE WESTMINSTER PLAY.

The first of the annual "College Plays" was acted on Monday evening in the Dormitory of Westminster School. Only four, we believe, of the six plays of Terence are acted at Westminster: these are the "Andria," "Heautontimorumenos" "Adelphi," and "Phormio," and this year it was the turn of the "Andria" to be represented—a play in which, though there is certainly none of the breadth, either of character or situation, which distinguishes the "Phormio" and "Eunuchus," yet there is an abundance of quiet humour, and many an opportunity for showing a refinement and delicacy of delineation. The Westminster boys showed their usual taste, more especially Mr. Milman, who as Davus was a clever piece of acting, although increased confidence will probably enable him to mark too easy, supple adroitness of that arch-p otter yet more distinctly. The first performance is, however, generally considered little more than a dress rehearsal of the play. The great a tractions, also, upon which so much care is bestowed—the prologue and epilogue—are not delivered; and, although we may safely expect that the greater part of the audience remained in the house will go upon railways, with perchance, a word or two upon the potato crop, yet the jealous care of the School authorities will keep it from general eyes and ears at present. We, therefore, postpone a more particular notice of the performance until our next, when we shall be enabled to do full justice to everything and everybody.

There is a rumour in dramatic circles that COVENT GARDEN Theatre is actually to open, after all, at Christmas, for dramatic performances. Further particulars are not yet made public.

The pantomime at DRURY LANE, by Mr. J. M Morton, is founded upon "Gulliver's Travels"

It is probable that Miss MARY KEELEY—the eldest daughter of the popular comedian—will make her first appearance on the stage at the LYCEUM, in the version of Mr. Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth," about to be produced.

Ground Tom Thumb has returned to England, laden with honours and presents; and announces some farewell levees at his old quarters, in the Egyptian Hall. The little hero has become a perfect Frenchman in his absence, and is reported, if anything, to have diminished in size; at all events, he is not an inch taller, and has never had the least misposition.

A WEEK'S GOSSIP.

"He hath strange places cramm'd
With observation—the which he vents
In mingled famine" SHAKSPEARE.

Everything has a lull before Christmas. Just as the children are put upon spare diet, and a mild course of purgatives to prepare them for the heavy load of Christmas dainties, so the London public is gradually weaned of excitements, that during night may gain additional glory from the contrast with previous starvation

But the gossiper has no rest It is his rack to run to and fro, seeking themes and (often) finding none, through the highways and byways of society from the club to the drawing room from the street to the theatre—' from grave to gay—from lively to severe '—a literary chiffonier—a starving caterer, in search of matter for the motley meal he must serve up to his weekly gaots

But everything is so dull—for him, that is to say. The City has its excitements in railway speculators who won't pay their deposits, and railway directors who can't go to Parliament, and won't fork out what has been paid. The quidnuncs have their stimulus in the quarrels of Times and Standard, Silk Buckingham and Peach. Yet we cannot help thinking that all this falls deader—makes less stir and splash just now than it would have done at any other time of the year.

The Times still says the Corn-laws are to be repealed, or materially modified Of course the Standard and Herald pounce on this as equivalent to a withdrawal of the first triumphant announcement. Whether the Corn-laws be repealed or not matters little to the Times now that it has shot its bolt Newspapers, like public men, are used to eating their own words, and find them very nutritious diet. Lord Palmerston has fattened upon such feed. Ing. Lord John Russell lately invited the public to see him perform a rapid act of the same political deglutition; and Peel, who, for a carn, has used hardly any other nutriment, seems prepared for his last and greatest bolt in this way, by repealing the Corn-laws. Of course the agricultural societies are loud in their wail—

Oh, Robert Peel! Oh, Robert Peel!
How can you serve us so?
We've sown in hope a breeze before,
But never such a blow

While the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham may call on the protection societies for a chorus to their lamentable duty - -

Pray remember, pray remember,
Now the Parliament is high,
That the Corn laws of December,
Were the Corn laws of July.
Then you know Sir, then you know,
By the Sliding-scale you swore—
How the Times says they're to go, Sir,
And Protection throve before!

Once the leaguers, once the leaguers
Were as bad as bad could be,
You called them base intriguers—
Said that corn should not be free.
You were right, Sir, you were right, Sir,
But, if they were so then,
How comes it, now you fight, Sir,
Along side of such men?

We were merry, we were merry,
When the Tenant farmers came,
And o'er their Port or Sherry,
Talked of turnips, stock, and game.
Now we rue, Sir, now we rue, Sir,
That we put you in the chair,
But till now, we never knew, Sir,
What a slippery man you were.

Every one, whatever his political opinions, must pity the unfortunates who put their trust in Sir R. Peel. It is the blessing of the country, however, to find a man as changeful as circumstances, an embodiment of the law that bids men "change and progress" as imperatively as it bids them "increase and multiply"

Political and social changes might furnish excellent matter for the ingenious concoctors of tricks and transformations for the Christmas pantomimes. Punch has suggested the change of running street into the Anti Corn law League office In the same way we might have the Accountant General's room changed into the Bank of England, with all its notes and bullion transformed to railway deposits; the Central Agricultural Society's house in Bond street into the Museum of the Antiquarian Society, and the Stock Exchange into Bedlam; Cobden and Sir Robert Peel into the Siamese twins, an Derrymane Abbey into the quarters of the Mendicity Society, in Red Lion Square.

The Times Commissioner has been roused by O'Connell's vituperation into something like occasional eloquence, and shows a power of bullying that is not quite excused by the goodness of the cause that calls it forth. In handling the cabman's weapon, slang, few can boast Dan's mastery—

Trained at the bar his tongue to wield,
O'Connell's blade his scorn shield!
While, less foul mouthed but truer far,
Forster maintains unequal war.

The agricultural world has received, in the early part of the week, enlightenment from the Duke of Norfolk, in an after dinner harangue, at Steyning, in Sussex. The Duke has discovered that an excellent thing to make the labourer warm and comfortable, when nothing better is to be had, is "a pinch of curry powder and a quantity of hot water" The Duke intends distributing large quantities of curry powder among his labourers, should the winter bring scarcity with it, and anticipates the most extraordinary effects from this novel diet. We hope he will add to it the rice and rabbits which, somehow, he forgets while expatiating in language as hot as his pickle on the great fondness of the Indians for this condiment We shou'd like to see a labourer fed on curry powder and warm water instead of every cattle show alongside of the oxen fattened on oil cake and bran mash. As we are on the theme of cattle shows we must not forget the Annual Exhibition of the wonderful effects of overfeeding in Smithfield, which came off this week, when

Pigs that weighed forty stone now weigh ten more,
And oxen walked such as ne'er walked before.

Why have we not rural poets to immortalise their favourite stock? It appears, at first sight, a theme to draw out the poetry that walks abroad in the uncongenial garb of drab shorts and mahogany topped boots. Why should not some Milton, now mute and inglorious, thus burst forth in song on the points of a "short horn?"

Oh, give me but my short-horn breed,
No drum so round and tight;
His fatness may impair his speed,
And shorten his wind to sighs—
His legs, his body scarce can bear,
His wind's not over sound,
Including these, I should swear,
He weighs a thousand pound!
At least a thousand pound!
Oh! yes, at least a thousand pound!!!

Oh! with my short horn breed I'll go,
'Gainst e'en the Prince to try,
And for the prize, from show to show,
I'd challenge all the kind e
He can't live long, but still he craves
Of oil cake many a pound;
Show single like this, ye Free-trade knaves,
Except on British ground!
Except on British ground!!
Yes, yes, except on British ground!!'

Or this—

ON A COLESHILL PIG—BY A DISAPPOINTED BREEDER.

The Pig they've given another, they've broken every vow;
The prize they've given another, and my pig's acquished now.
Tt cy looked not at thy breeding, they regarded not thy ears,
They thought not how I tended thee, and fattened thee for years.
Oh! was it well to leave me, to pine in grief, to sob, and grieve thee,
And, after all, deceive thee, the pig I loved so well

The prize they've given another, yet thou liest on thy side,
Thou'rt too fat to get upon thy legs, though often thou hast tried.
A crowning thing 'twould aggravate, but thou art much too mild,
I ought to know thy temper, that loved thee like a child
The judges may be clever, but I must say that I never Knew a pig served (did you ever?) like the pig I loved so well.

A volume of elegies and sonnets upon as plaintive and as passionate as these might be written, but we will not trespass upon ground we would rather leave to that curious phenomenon called the agricultural mind, and we would suggest to directors of schools, for the training of the mind aforesaid, that prizes might be advantageously bestowed for poems on such subjects as the above, the best to be recited annually, at the Smithfield Cattle Show, the successful bard to be crowned with a wreath of turnip tops and mangold wurtzel, and to recite his composition from the back of the fattest ox in the Exhibition It would be a sort of Beotian Olympian festival, and should be followed by a solemn dance of country gentlemen, blowing cows' horns, or a komos of Smithfield carcass butchers, with the classical accompaniment of marrowbones and cleavers.

Some time ago, a suggestion was made for a show of landlords to come off at about the same time as the cattle-show. We should like to see this carried into effect; the prizes to be bestowed by labourers. The list of prizes might run thus—

First Class.—Noble Landlords. Prize. a Medal, inscribed with "rights and duties."

First Prize.—The Duke of ——. Pays his labourers 14 shillings a week, and goes the round of his estates four times a year. Labourers fed on good bread with meat once a day Came to the show 100 miles by railway; carried from the terminus on his labourers' shoulders

And so on for the rest: no landlord to be admitted for competition who was encumbered by mortgages of his own creating, or who employed an agent for every purpose but that of spending his rental. If this sort of thing was carried out it would tend to produce competition in the rearing and educating of that very useful class of stock—the stock of good landlords. Many whom we and the world know could even now enter on the trial, with prospects of a prize: and though the show would no doubt be limited in the number of specimens the first year or two, time and example would do much. Nor should we object to a companion exhibition of master manufacturers. These gentlemen have lately had the best side of the picture to themselves, and the brush in their own hands and have produced a rather exaggerated portraiture of their class; though we do not see how the acquisition of money by manufacturing should tend to make men less worldly, or more alive to the sufferings of their inferiors, than the possession of hereditary acres. Does it? Let the landed interest and the manufacturers fight out the decision of the question not by words but deeds—by a struggle which shall do the greatest good amongst those whose worldly destinies they have in a great degree the shaping of.

Since writing the above, all the quidnuncs have been thrown into consternation by the announcement of Peel's resignation; the Premier has found the sliding-scale a more slippery ground than even he imagined it, and has come down upon it himself. What will come of the change we will not venture to predict—less than most of the world expect, we can venture to assert, without being deep in the secrets of either Clubs or Cabinets. But we wait for the fun which must come of all such changes.

* It may be as well to state for the information of Chess players who might otherwise have been surprised at the second opening being adopted in a game by correspondence, how this match originated. In the Delhi Gazette of March 1st, appeared a game at this opening, played between Kieseritzki and M. Deschapelles. It was stated, at the time of this move, that the former gentleman had offered to play this game with any one in the world, a certain number of times, taking it up always as first player of this point. In accordance with this spirited offer, the above match was arranged, a challenge subsequently appeared in the Delhi Gazette from "Amateur," who offered to play out the game from this point, leaving his antagonist the choice. Tyro accepted the challenge, and chivalrously took up the cudgels of the second player, who, in the game referred to, had been defeated, and here is the result.

Had the second player placed his Bishop at Q 2, Amateur, by playing his Q Rook at Q R's 7th would have equally won a piece.

The King of Prussia has just conferred the decoration of the Order of the Red Eagle, third class on M François Ries, the oldest German composer, having attained his ninetieth year. He is the father of the celebrated Ferdinand Ries, and was formerly one of the most celebrated violinists of the day. On the occasion of the eightieth anniversary of his birthday, the musical men of Bonn, his native town, had a gold medal struck in commemoration of the event, and the University of Bonn at the same time conferred upon him the honorary diploma of Doctor of Music.

LITERATURE.

MELAIA: AND OTHER POEMS. By ELIZA COOK. Third Edition, Illustrated. Simpkin and Co

The fame of our gifted poetess, Eliza Cook, has already spread "from English firesides to American prairies." This is the best testimonial to the healthy sentiment of these "wood-notes wild," as the authoress modestly terms the contents of the volume before us. Their pure feeling, deep pathos, and homely, unaffected joy, gush forth from every line, charming the reader through some 150 compositions on scenes and subjects of familiar life, touched with new interest by the master-touches of true genius. The melody is simple and graceful; the descrip tions of natural scenery teem with true and beauty, the incidents have a tinge of domestic romance, and the poetess pays with the affections to a wise and gentle purpose, such as must be welcome to every well-regulated hearth and home.

This edition is embellished with a whole length portrait of Miss Cook, besides eleven vignette illustrations of the poems. It is, certainly, one of the most treasurable gift-books of the season

A BOOKE OF CHRISTMAS CAROLS. Cundall

Many years since, a worthy President of the Royal Society filled up his leisure hours with collating a volume of religious songs, or ballads, in celebration of Christmas, such as he might have heard sung upon his own estate, in Sussex, but which have long ceased to be heard in the metropolis. The pursuit was a holy recreation for our philosopher, released from the Chair at Somerset House; and the simplicity of the pious chansons is known to have proved a refreshing relief to his presidential labours.

The volume before us is, however, a more perfect reproduction than the President's volumes: for it not only gives us the ipsissima verba of the ancient Carols, but the very forms and hues of their antique illustration. First of the Carols, we have the "Christo Caremus Canticum Excelsis Gloria," from the Harleian MS.; then, "Be ruling in the Boar's Head," from Wynkyn de Worde;" "the Star Song," by Herrick; "the Shepherds' Song," by Edward Bolton; Herrick's Ode on the Birth of our Saviour; "Immoral Babe," by Bishop Hall; and some others; finishing with the popular ditty, "God rest you, merry gentlemen."

The Illustrations, or rather the Illuminations, include four superb Missal Pictures—the Annunciation—Angels appearing to the Shepherds—the Birth of Our Saviour, and the Adoration of the Magi: these are from the Hari MS; and the Borders are from the Harl. MS.; Royal MS. the De Croy MS.; and Henry VIII.'s Missals in the British Museum; and from a Book of Hours in the possession of the Publisher. Both Pictures and Borders are really fine specimens of illumination: the delicate expression of the former is truly surprising. Some few instances, the loveliness is very charming. The colours of the whole are exceedingly brilliant; and the gilding, though rich, is not over-laded with ornament. The bordures are especially characterised by appropriateness and graceful variety.

The labour of taste has been the work of several hands; and it is not a little curious that so exact a reproduction of ancient art should have been effected by means of the invention of yesterday. The Illustrations are drawn and lithographed by Brandard; printed in colours by Harbaur; the whole selected and arranged by the Publisher, and especially creditable to his judgment. To suit these days of revival, the old type has been copied. The binding is green velvet set gs upon haghly burnished gold. A more fitting "Books" for Christmas it would be difficult to produce even from the exhaustless stores of illumination preserved in our libraries

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

CAPTAIN THE HON. CHARLES LEONARD IRBY.

This gallant officer, who died at Torquay, in Devonshire, on the 3rd inst., served with distinction, for a lengthened period, in the active duties of his profession. In 1805, when Midshipman of the Naroissus, he was present at the capture of the Cape and Buenos Ayres; in 1806, when attached to the Ardent, he received a severe wound at the siege of Monte Video; in 1809, as Lieutenant of the Sirius, participated in the taking of St. Paul's, in the Isle of Bourbon; in 1814, commanded the Thames in the expedition to New Orleans, and, subsequently, in command of the Pelican, was actively employed in the Mediterranean and the Archipelago. His commission bore the following dates—that of Lieutenant, 13th October, 1808; of Commander, 7th June, 1814; and of Captain, 2nd July, 1827. Captain Irby was fifth son of the late Lord Boston, by Charlotte Augustina, his wife, only daughter of Paul Methuen, Esq., of Corsham, Wilts, and, consequently, brother of the present Lord Boston, and of the recently deceased Admiral the Hon. Frederick Paul Irby, C.B. At the period of his demise Captain Irby had completed his 56th year. He married 8th February, 1825, Frances, second daughter of John Mangles, Esq., of Harley, in Berkshire, and has left issue, one son and one daughter.

HAMBLETON THOMAS CUSTANCE, ESQ. OF WESTON HOUSE, COUNTY NORFOLK.

This highly respected country gentleman, for many years a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for Norfolk, died a few days since at his seat near Norwich. He was the eldest son and heir of the late John Custance, Esq., of Weston, Gentleman of the Privy Chamber, by Frances, his wife, second daughter of Sir William Beauchamp Proctor, Bart., of Langley Park, and great grandson of Alderman John Custance, an eminent merchant of London, who originally founded the fortune, and purchased the Weston estates in 1726. Mr. Hamblet Custance was born 12th February, 1779, and married, 11th February, 1809, Mary, only child of the late Miles Bower, Esq., by whom he has left two sons and one daughter.

SIR WILLIAM REID, BART., OF BARRA.

Sir William Reid, who only succeeded to the title last year, died in October on his passage from Ceylon to Mauritius. He was third son of Sir John Reid, Bart., by Barbara, his wife, daughter of Thomas Livingston, M.D., of Dawyn Hills, County of Aberdeen; and great grandson of Sir Alexander Reid of Barra, on whom the Nova Scotia Baronetcy was conferred in 1706.

COUNTRY NEWS.

REPRESENTATION OF HERTFORD.—Mr. Halsey has offered himself as a candidate for the County of Hertford, on the Conservative interest. A requisition is also in course of signature to the Honourable Spencer Cowper, the brother of Earl Cowper, and of the member for Hertford. Mr. Halsey pledges himself to support the present Corn laws, in opposition to the present Ministry or any other party.

FATAL ACCIDENT TO A YOUNG LADY IN SUFFOLK.—The following dreadful accident occurred at the village of Nayland about two o'clock on Friday (last week). As the two daughters of Mr. J. S. Mortimer, of the White Hart Inn, were returning from Colchester in a little pony gig, when passing a waggon laden with coals and drawn by four horses, belonging to Mr. Grimwade, of Postead, in the narrow way opposite the Post office, Nayland, on emerging into the broad way by the Vine Inn, the eldest Miss Mortimer urged the pony forward, by incautiously touching the reins. The animal started a little to the off side to clear the fore horses of the waggon, when she was thrown from her seat on to her head, directly under the traps of the wheel horse, the wheels passing over part of her dress, and though between the wheels they did not touch h r. Assistance was immediately at hand, but, on being taken up, she was dead, her neck being dislocated by the fall. The following day an inquest was held, when a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

THE WEATHER IN THE COUNTRY.—On Wednesday morning (last week), for the first time this season, the mountains in the neighbourhood of Usca (Wales) were partially covered with snow. A few miles further up, the whole country of Monmouth was covered with its winter garb, which is considered to be rather early.

THE BERKESWELL MURDER.—In the course of Wednesday police constable Hoimes, of the Coventry force, took a young looking fellow, of about twenty years of age, before the Mayor of Coventry, and other magistrates, on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of Thomas Parker, an old resident in the parish of Berkeswell, but who was killed by some person unknown on the 17th ult., as already stated in this paper. The prisoner gave his name as James Reed—the same name as the person who is supposed to have committed the murder, and who has likewise absconded, and the particulars of his apprehension are these: He is a shearer, out of employment, and came from Denham, in Buckinghamshire, twenty-three miles from Coventry. He was detained at the Aylesbury Police office, as applying there on Saturday night last for a bed, on his giving the name of James Reed. On that day, however, he was taken before the County Magistrate, Mr. Boultbee, it was distinctly proved that he was not the individual, of whom a hue and cry was making in all parts of the kingdom, and he was accordingly ordered to be immediately released from custody.

POST OFFICE ROBBERIES AT RUGBY.—The town of Rugby and neighbourhood have for some time suffered considerable inconvenience from the non delivery of letters and newspapers. The evil at length increased to such a extent, notwithstanding every attempt was made to trace it to its origin, that recourse was eventually had to the Postmaster General, who, upon being made acquainted with the particulars, thought the most advisable step would be to send down Mr. R. W. Peacock, the Solicitor to the Post-office. Mr. Peacock came to the conclusion that William Garratt, a young man employed to deliver the letters in Rugby, was the guilty party, and he was on Saturday charged before the magistrates, and evidence was adduced that implicated him in the robberies. He was remanded. It is supposed that upwards of 2000 have been abstracted from letters sent through the Rugby Post-office since the prisoner was employed there.

REMARKS

From 9 A.M. of the 25th to 9 A.M. of the 27th, there fell at Seathwaite, in Borrowdale, the enormous quantity of 6.62 inches, being the greatest amount of rain which has ever been measured in Great Britain in twenty-four hours. The fall on the 25th and 26th was nearly 10 inches. The quantity measured at Langdale Head on the 27th was 6.28 inches, and on the 26th and 27th nearly 9 inches. The consequence was, the heaviest flood which has ever been known in those portions of our Lake district for at least 50 years past. Winder mere Lake has not been so high for the last fifteen years: on the night of the 26th-27th, it rose 6 feet, the quays along the banks of the lakes were immersed in water, and much wood was carried away by the current, and lost. Keswick Lake has not been so high since November 30th, 1833. Except in the Lake districts, the fall of rain in the month of November has not been unusually great.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

Letters from Buenos Ayres to the 27th of September, state that the Danish Consul had protested against the blockade, and the time granted for neutral vessels to leave, and that the American Minister refused to acknowledge it at all. The British Consul would leave as soon as the last British vessel had left. Great alarm existed among the British residents at the apprehended violent measures of the English and French, as it was feared they might attempt to burn the Buenos Ayres Government.

Extract of a letter dated Florence, November 29.—"A sad accident befel Lady Drumlanrig a day or two since. She was riding in the Cascine, mounted on a race horse, belonging to Mr. Vansittart, when the animal ran away and threw her with great violence against a tree. For a while it was thought her Ladyship was killed, as she was lying senseless, her nose perfectly flattened, with several gaping wounds on the forehead. No bones were broken, and to day the faculty pronounced her out of danger, and it is hoped her face will not be long disfigured."

The Frankfort Journal has an extract of a letter from Rio, giving some curious details of the diamond mines recently discovered in Brazil.—"Hats full of the stones have been picked up and brought away. Two thirds of them are of a yellowish tinge and do not possess the usual hardness of the diamond; but many of them are very fine. The house of Bonfin and Reshesler, the largest diamond merchants at Rio Janeiro, at first threw doubts on the reality of this discovery of the mine, but notwithstanding this, every one who has diamonds on hand is endeavouring to sell them at the best price they can obtain, fearing a great reduction in the value."

A Vienna letter of the 29th ult., mentions a report that the Duke de Bordeaux is in treaty for the purchase of the state domain of Wiener-Neustadt, for which the Baron de Sina lately offered 1,800,000 florins (nearly four millions of francs).

The following is an extract from a letter written by Captain Withers, of the Cockchafer, at Aden, 9th November:—"During our passage down the Red Sea we were more fortunate than in going up, as we discovered three Islands with guano on. The quality is more like the South American than that from Ichaboe. The quantity, however, is small, say from 20 to 30 tons on each, and it is scattered on the summits of the islands, which are from 400 to 500 feet high, and, as the trouble of collecting would be so great, we left it. A small schooner was examining these islands. We examined from 200 to 300 islands in all."

The Frankfort Journal states that the differences between Russia and Rome have been settled. Russia will not even to coerce the Poles to conform to the Greek Church, while Rome engages to watch that Catholics shall not take part in politics, movements against the state This settlement is attributed to the energetic interference of Austria.

A letter from Dresden, dated Nov. 27, gives some interesting particulars, in regard to the religious movement in Saxony. Ronge, accompanied by his brother, arrived at Dresden on the 23rd, in the evening, and had scarcely reached the house of M. P., a merchant, where he was to lodge, when a commissary of police appeared and invited him to go immediately to the police-office, where a communication would be made to him. The elders of the German Catholics who were present remonstrated, but the stone from an enormous avalanche from Mont Mort, to the east of the hospital. It was the contemplation to trace out the road along the Combe, on the side of the valley, and Canon Carl, who was known to be bold, active, and the most intrepid among the brethren in braving storms, went to direct the operation, as several travellers were expected on that day; he and his taree companions were thus cut off, while in the performance of an act of hospitality and charity.

A Berlin letter of the 27th ultimo states that by a Royal Ordonnance, lately published, the decree of Napoleon, which obliged all Jews no having an hereditary family name to adopt one, and which decree is still in force in the Rhenish provinces, where the French laws have been preserved, is now extended to all the rest of the kingdom of Prussia. A delay of six months is given to those Jews who have not a family name to choose one, and which is to be submitted to the Minister of the Interior for his approval.

A Correspondent of the Chronicle, in a letter dated Damascus, Nov. 10, gives an account of some atrocious cruelties practised by the Turks in Syria. Men and women have been hung up by their hair, and left in that position till they would tell any secrets where arms were hid. They were then beaten to death—many have actually been carried from under the beating rod to the burying ground! The Turks suspecting that arms might be hid in parts of the mountains instead of their villages, they would go there and break them, and so the articles got lost. When the people have no barley to give the soldiers' horses they are made to give raisins. The Turks have boxes of iron, under the lids of which they place the women's breasts, and cut them. Most of those Christians, who are either unwilling to see those acts, or who can satisfy get away, have left their villages, and come to Beirut, where they would tell any countries where arms were hid, and so MONUMENT TO THE LATE DR. ALISON.

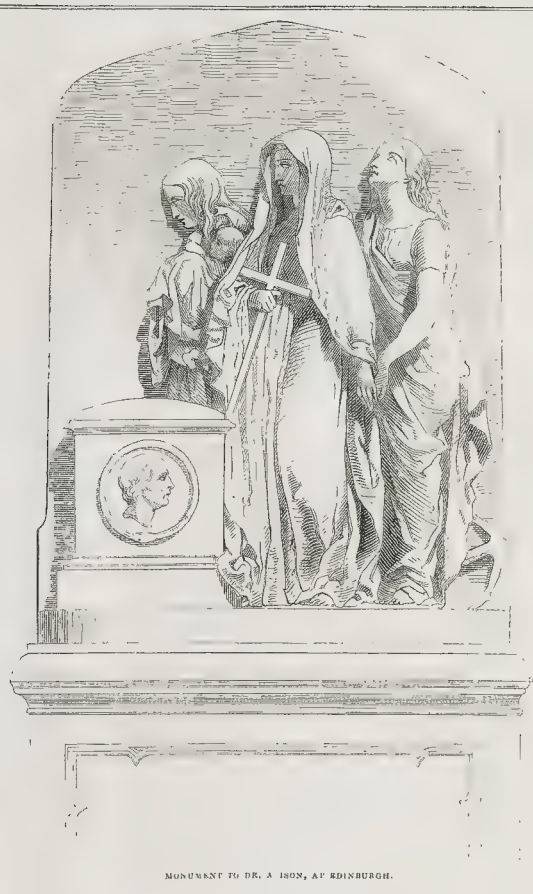
The chaste and classical mezzo-relievo to the memory of Dr. Alison the author of the "Essay on Taste," which has been recently erected in St. Paul's Chapel, Edinburgh, is from the chisel of Mr. Steil, who has already earned a high reputation as a sculptor, not only in his native Scotland, but throughout the country. The work in question is well calculated to increase his reputation, as much from its poetic design as from its beautiful execution. We have reason to know that the medallion on which the profile appears was pronounced by the relatives, at the inauguration of the work in the walls of the church, a complete reproduction of the features of the revered original.

Dr. Alison is chiefly known to the public as the author of his "Essay on Taste;" but, in Edinburgh, he was esteemed as a pious and earnest promoter and preacher of the doctrines of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. His ministry was chiefly carried out at the metropolitan chapel of the Episcopal branch of the Scottish Church—St. Paul's, York-place, which is now most efficiently served by the Very Reverend Dr. Terrot, Bishop of Edinburgh. Of his life, we have nothing to record: the quiet, unobtrusive existence of a clergyman who devotes his days to his ministry, to the cultivation of the higher branches of literature, and to works of modest charity, presents nothing which is startlingly interesting, nor which, indeed, considering all things, ought to be dragged forth to public view. That, however, his memory should not quite pass away, his friends and admirers have subscribed to erect this Monument. It does honour to them, as much for the immediate object in view as for the choice they made of the artist, who has produced a work quite worthy of recording the virtues and character of the author of the "Essay on Taste," of which the Monument is a very high specimen in all respects.



MONUMENT TO DR. ALISON, AT EDINBURGH.

THE LATE HARVEST.—At the meeting of the Agricultural Protection Society on Tuesday, an analysis was read of reports which had been sent in to the society from local societies in almost every part of England, respecting the result of this year's crop; the result of which was that in every district from which returns had been received there was stated to be a full average of wheat and other crops, in many of them considerably above an average; and that though in almost every district the potato crop was more or less diseased, still that disease had been in almost every instance greatly exaggerated, and that the labourers throughout the whole of the agricultural districts had full work, and at good wages.

OPINION OF THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE ON THE PANIC.—At the meeting of the Leicestershire Agricultural Society on Friday (last week), the Duke of Cambridge said he felt great pleasure in being able to attend the meeting on two accounts—first, because he had been prevented attending on previous occasions, as he had been desirous; and, secondly, that he understood there was a panic in the neighbourhood. He should not feel so convinced of what he was about to state, if he had not had means of examining into its correctness, and he thought from what he had the means of becoming acquainted with, that no class of persons in this country had cause of complaint. The state of things had certainly been made much worse by the reports of the potato disease, but he was glad to say that it was nothing like so bad as had been first represented—not even in Ireland, where so great complaints had been made. He really believed that the report of a panic was a false one; and he should be the last person to make such a statement if he had not a full opinion of its correctness. (Applause).

COLOSSAL STATUE OF LORD COLLINGWOOD, AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF LORD COLLINGWOOD.

This magnificent statue of the great Collingwood, the bosom friend of Nelson, has recently been completed by Mr. Lough, and is a fine specimen of the genius of that distinguished sculptor. The material is stone: height, 23 feet. It has been placed on a pedestal about 50 feet high, on a plot of ground belonging to the Duke of Northumberland, at Tynemouth, close to the place of Lord Collingwood's birth; and it is seen well from the sea.

The cost of this truly noble memorial of one of England's Naval Worthies has been defrayed by public subscription. It is, certainly, one of the most interesting tributes ever raised to British merit; for, apart from his brilliant naval services, it would be difficult to point out many names on the scroll of British fame of such untarnished reputation as that of the illustrious Collingwood. In command, he was firm, but mild—most considerate to the comfort and health of his men, averse to flogging, and all violent and brutal exercises of authority; the sailors called him their father. As a scientific seaman and naval tactician, he had few, if any, equals; and in action, his judgment was as cool as his courage was warm. His mind was enlightened to an astonishing degree, considering the circumstances of his life; he was liberal and kind-hearted, and all his private virtues were of the most amiable class. His letters to his wife, on the education of his daughters, are full good sense and feeling.

BY LEWIS FILMORE.

Far mid the Desert's arid sands
The Desert King, the Lion stands,
Brown as the dust his foot beneath,
Fierce as the burning Simoom's breath.

His flowing mane waves full and free,
Fit mantle of his royalty,
His lip and brow are rayed with hairs,
Those as his diadem he wears.

He roar'd in thunder to the blast
And on the wind the echoes pass'd;
The silence of the sands they break,
They roll o'er Meris' sluggish lake.

The Panther started in the dell,
Affrighted flew the slim Gazelle;
That voice beside the flowing Nile,
The Camel heard, and Crocodile.

Where wondrous piles their shadows fling
Roll'd thy stern voice thou Desert-King;
And woke the Royal Mummy hid
I' the centre of the Pyramid.

He rose within his narrow bed;
"For thy loud summons, thanks!" he said;
Three thousand years in sleep I've pass'd
Till waken'd by thy voice at last.

"Where are ye?—in my dreams alone,
My years of pomp and glory gone!
When conquest's banners round me flew,
When lions yoked, my chariot drew!"

My Car of Splendour onward roll'd,
All richly wrought, and all of gold!
The hundred gated city pour'd
Its people forth to hail their Lord!

This withered foot scarce touched the sod,
But on the necks of slaves it trod!
The Moor and Indian knelt to me,
The Arab bowed submissively!

This shrunken hand a sceptre sway'd,
That all the peopled world obey'd!
All in these graven symbols shown
That hand has done, this heart has known.

The giant walls that round me close—
At my command their vastness rose;
Enthroned, I watch'd my soldiers urge
The toiling slaves, with sword and scourge.

The Nile, my vassal, bore me then,
The King of it, as King of men!
The wave that kiss'd my galley's prow,
As then it roll'd, it rolleth now,

While I, its Lord"—he said no more—
Cess'd had the Desert-awakener's roar
And sank again the Monarch's head
Down—in the silence of the dead!

PRESENTS TO HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT.

ENAMELLED PEARL, GLASS, AND PAPIER MACHE SCREEN PRESENTED TO HER MAJESTY.

Two very elegant specimens of a novel manufacture have recently been presented to the Queen and her Royal Consort, and have been most graciously received.

They consist of a pair of Screens, and a Chess Table, manufactured by Mr. Thomas Lane, of Great Hampton-street, Birmingham, and King-street, Covent-garden, (late Clay's). The materials are Enamelled Pearl on Glass, and Papier-Mâché; their ingenious combination having been patented by Mr. Lane. The effect is splendid even to gorgeousness; and the brilliancy of the colours, heightened by the Pearl Enamel, is indescribably beautiful.

On the Screens are exquisitely painted the rose, shamrock, and thistle, on a ground of pure white. A pearl dove is descending with the olive branch, over which is the Imperial Crown. St. George and the Dragon are immediately beneath the emblems of the United Kingdom, surrounded by illuminated foliage, where all the tints of the choicest mother-of-pearl seem with prismatic hues to radiate their colours.

In the Chess-board, the squares are formed of quatrefoils, blazoned in the centre and on the principal lines with the lion and unicorn's heads, in pearl and gold alternately; the remaining squares have the lion and unicorn rampant, alternately picked out in pearl and gold. The intermediate spaces formed by the quatrefoils have the rose, shamrock, and thistle in mother-of-pearl painted on an azure ground. On the extreme boundaries of the squares, the Queen-bee (emblematical of industry) is represented in pearl on a scarlet ground, and the bed of the table terminates with a border of mother-of-pearl dolphins on a sea-green ground; the board is surrounded by a costly frame in papier mâché, elaborately and richly decorated in gold; the pillar of the table partakes of the same bold character as the rest, having at the four corners of its base shields, on which are vigorously painted lions' heads on azure ground.

Mr. Lane had the honour of an interview with his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on presenting these specimens of his elegant manufacture: they were minutely inspected by his Royal Highness, who made several inquiries into the new process. Within a few days from the interview, Mr. Lane received a letter from Mr. Anson, in the name of H.R.H. Prince Albert, accompanying copies of two valuable works—one on the Alhambra, by Mr. Owen Jones; the other on Gothic Ornaments, by Mr. Pugin.

We have great pleasure in recording this act of Royal condescension; as it evinces the desire of his Royal Highness to cultivate a purer taste in the manufactures of Birmingham. It is, however, but justice to add that the above is only one among many proofs of the interest taken by his Royal Highness in the cultivation of art, and the advancement of this great manufacturing nation.

We have inspected several specimens of the Patent Enamelled Pearl Glass, at the Show-rooms, in King-street, Covent Garden. We were especially struck with the applicability of the invention to interior decoration—as the panels of doors, window-shutters, cabinets, &c.; the subjects, picturesque landscapes, moonlight scenes, &c. The design for a painted window had a truly brilliant reality; although the material is opaque, the play of light gives it a transparent effect. In short, the invention is especially adapted for the embellishment of rooms wherever ornament can be advantageously introduced.

OSBORNE HOUSE.

Since her Majesty became the proprietor of the joint Estates of Osborne and Barton, in the Isle of Wight, various improvements and additions, on a very extensive scale, have been carried on with a rapidity almost exceeding belief.

It may hence be inferred, that the health of our Gracious Sovereign, when sojourning at Norris Castle during the seasons of 1831 and 1833, (then Princess Victoria), was so improved by the air of the Isle of Wight, as naturally to suggest to her in future years the choice of this healthful and quiet retreat from the cares and toils of State. The Mansion of Osborne, its Park, and the adjoining Estate of Barton, then the property of Lady Isabella Blachford, being for disposal, negociations were entered into, and her Majesty became the "Lessee for a year," subject to her will and pleasure, after the termination, to become the purchaser. On the 1st May last, the Queen became the proprietor; since which, several small farms and houses in the immediate vicinity, have likewise fallen into her Majesty's possession.

Osborne House, of itself, presents no architectural beauty, it being simply an extensive Mansion in the modern style: engravings of which we presented to our readers in Nos. 123 and 165. The views, however, from the Estate are picturesque and beautiful; but from the situation of the building, an eastern view could only be obtained, the Promontory of Norris, or Old Castle Point, excluding the scenery of the New Forest, Cowes Roads, and in fact all places to the westward of the Estate. To improve all this, was naturally the first thing to be looked to; and Mr. Thomas Cubitt, the eminent builder, received her Majesty's commands to prepare the necessary design for a commodious Mansion, as much as possible in unison with Osborne House.

Her Majesty having approved of the plan, on the 23rd June following, the foundation-stone of the new building was laid; the ceremony being performed by the Queen, in the presence of her Illustrious Consort and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal; the Earl of Aberdeen, Lady Portman (the Lady in Waiting), and several gentlemen of the Royal suite.

Such was the rapidity with which the works were conducted, that scarcely three months had elapsed before the walls were ready to receive the roof; and, in the short period of five months, the whole building has been covered in, and a gigantic tower erected; and, before the close of next summer, the building will be in a fit state for occupation.

Already, during the Royal sojourn at Osborne, the old mansion has been honoured with the presence of several of her illustrious visitors. The Kings of Holland and Belgium have domiciled under its roof; and, at one period, the Island became honoured with the presence of three Queens—our Most Gracious Majesty, her Majesty the Queen Dowager, and the Queen of the Belgians. The want of accommodation for their respective suites was, however, felt; there is little doubt that this, together with her Majesty's visit to the princely palaces on the Continent, led her to extend the building far beyond what was at first contemplated.

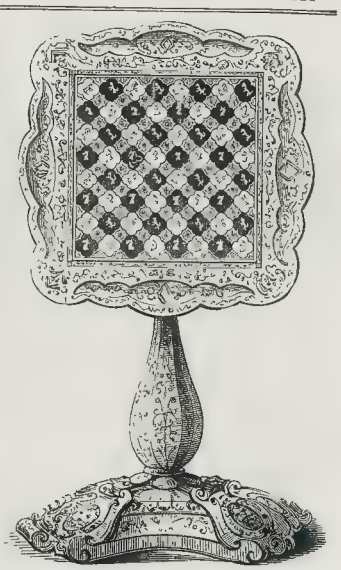
The last, and not the least event at Osborne was, the Cabinet Council held on Wednesday, followed by the resignation of her Majesty's Ministers.

New and extensive palace.

Her Majesty's taste for natural scenery is well known; and great care has been displayed, in setting out the building and grounds, so as to preserve

The new edifice is in the palazzo style: the south front forms nearly a right angle with the old mansion, and extends in a north-easterly direction about 100 feet towards the sea. The entire building forms nearly a square of between 70 and 80 feet, presenting also a similar frontage to the eastward. At the south-west corner a massive tower rises to the extent of 107 feet. The main building is about 60 feet high: it is entirely of brick and cement, and will be stuccoed so as to give it the appearance of a stone erection; the window cases and quoins of the ground floor will be rusticated. The windows on the first floor will be enriched with pediments, supported by Corinthian columns; and above, the windows will be dressed in proportion. Round the building there will be a massive cornice, supported by trusses, and a parapet above; the whole crowned with a balustrade. The grand entrance to the building will be at the west front, under a handsome portico. The eastern front commands a view of the Solent, and its large bay projecting window will, no doubt, be provided with a verandah.

The tower is erected over the foundation stone, and has reached its intended height for several miles round it forms a conspicuous object. From its summit, the panoramic view is indescribably beautiful: to the eastward, lies the whole anchorage of Spithead and the Motherbank, crowded with shipping; and, in a northerly direction, the eye reaches the Southampton water, with its Transatlantic, Peninsular and Oriental steamers. Then, the Cowes Roads are seen, studded with beautiful models of phantom ships, of every size and rig. To the westward, lie the whole of the Solent Sea, the New Forest, and the Needles Lighthouse; and, still farther to the southward, the whole of the Downs, from west to east; with the serpentine Medina, the town of Newport, Albany Barracks, Carisbrooke Castle, &c.



ENAMELLED PEARL, GLASS, AND PAPIER MACHE CHESS TABLE PRESENTED TO PRINCE ALBERT.

NEW LODGE, OSBORNE HOUSE.

If the new wing of the Palace will be connected with a corridor, or passage, from the S.W. corner to the N.E. of the former mansion. In the centre of the building is a well-staircase, lighted with a skylight from the roof; the latter will be flat, and paved with stone, and form an agreeable promenade. For this purpose, the chimneys have, with some difficulty, been all brought to the centre, round the staircase. Every room will be fire proof, and very little timber has been employed in the construction; the girders are of iron.

The whole of the Park has been enclosed, and several head of stock have been brought from Windsor. Carriage-drives and walks, will lead down to the beach, which is situate in a Bay called Mede Hole, and perfectly sheltered from all winds but the northward; a splendid and capacious landing-place has been constructed, so as to afford every facility to land at any time of tide.

We have engraved the splendid New Wing of the Palace, and a New Entrance-Lodge.

(For the former, see page 376.)

SARCOPHAGUS, IN WHICH THE PORTLAND VASE WAS DISCOVERED.

FINE ARTS.

THE PORTLAND VASE.

A NEW ELUCIDATION OF THE SUBJECTS ON THE CELEBRATED PORTLAND VASE, FORMERLY CALLED THE BARBERINI: AND THE SARCOPHAGUS IN WHICH IT WAS DISCOVERED. By THOMAS WINDUS, F.S.A. Published for the Author, by W. Pickering, Piccadilly, &c.

Some six months since, when, as Mr. Windus states, "an individual, morbid with the organ of destructiveness, smashed this splendid specimen of Greek art (the Portland Vase,) into innumerable fragments," we described and illustrated the lost treasure in our Journal, No. 146. Upon the above wanton act, Mr. Windus ironically quotes—

> "Heu miserande puer; si qua fata aspera rumpas, > Tu Marcellus eris."

Just at the moment of the occurrence, the work before us was ready for the press, its ingenious author having, for nearly a quarter of a century, devoted himself to the elucidation of the matter in question. In his Introduction, after, stating numerous aids and advantages in his attempts to develope allegorical and mystical subjects of earth, Mr. Windus relates that, about twenty-five years since he sedulously examined, like others, the celebrated Barberini, or Portland Vase and was "naturally astonished at the high perfection of the sculpture on so fragile a material, comprising an admirable circlet of classic allegorical characters." He adds, "After a few visits to this gem of art, it struck me the subject was the discovery of the love of Antiochus for his mother-in-law, Stratonice, which gave so much celebrity to Erasistratus, the physician of Cos; but, finding the sexes were reversed, I concluded I was in error. Afterwards, consulting the writings of many learned authorities, and, with their hypotheses totally different from mine, and at the same time that they were very little in accordance with each other and, lastly, terminating with a mutual confession, that they had not conclusively cleared the mystery—wearied with these contrarieties, I abandoned my pu zzle."

Nevertheless, in 1839, Mr. Windus returned to the study, and recommenced by taking up his original surmise; and, considering that the character of one of the male figures, (called by some Pluto, by others Neptune,) had a medical appearance similar to that of Esculapius, or Hippocrates, on the coin of Cos. Mr. Windus referred to the biography of Galen, when the whole allegory blazed on him at once, in unison with his favourite hypothesis—the sexes correct—and all the attributes, recording an event which occurred in the second century. Upon reference to Bartoli's engravings of the Sarcophagus which contained the Vase, Mr Windus found his opinion confirmed; though several persons have repudiated the idea of affinity between the characters of the Vase and Sarcophagus. Our zealous Antiquary trusts that he has proved to the contrary. By special favour at G permission, and at considerable expense, he obtained a facsimile of the tomb itself from the Museum of the Capitol at Rome This he presented to be a constant study in honour of Galen, the physician, who was esteemed above all others, while living, and was worshipped almost as a divinity after his decease. "The characters sculptured thereon are of different periods, and most if not the whole, in a transitive state." Although Galen's body was burned, he died at Pergamus, Mr. Windus infers that his ashes were brought to Rome in this Vase and placed in the Sarcophagus. The handles of the former, and of its serpents, he regards as the usual attributes of prayer; and the cameo sculpture "an event, or rare, on which Galen valued himself most, the cure of a noble lady who was said to be in a very dangerous state; whose attendants requested to be love, the object of which was an actor of the profession." "In the circlet of figures, he (Galen) is represented in a dignified attitude, contemplating the progress and effect of a remedy he has just produced, in the introduction of Pylades, (the actor or rope-dancer,) dancing with Bacchus, the wine, and cured of pollusion. It is introduced with the most perfect confidence, and satisfaction, as the Public is requested to observe that the Pommade does not soil by RUBS, REGALBANA, and RIGOL, Perfumers to the Queen, 35, New Bond street, corner of Maddox street. Price 3s. 6d., 6s. 6d., and 11s. per pot.

DEANE'S DOUBLY REGISTERED STILOS COFFEE POT The strictly scientific construction of this article involves two simple processes which, by their rapid and certain action, secure a cup of rich, boiling, and clear coffee, and that also, without trouble. When the interior of the pot is filled with boiling water, the latter drives out all the cold air from the body, into which the current instantly flows, and gives it a fitful but second rush, and a shock, through a meter, at the top of the pot, the last of which is small diameter is by a well-known law of pneumatics, instantly coupled into the pot below, and the coffee is at once ready to be drawn off. Sold by GEORGES and JOHN DEANE, Opening to the Monument, 46, King William street, London-bridge

MAUGHAM'S PATENTED CARRARA WATER.—At this season of the year the use of soda water Lar al most always been abandoned, in consequence of the coat ed coating in ure of its effects not being found to be the great objection, but to doubt the opinion of a most all gentleman of high authority, expressed in a let er to Mr. Maughan that "possesses the pure and delicate flavour of the spring, is the purest, and most agreeable, and wholesome beverage in use." Sold wholesale by Mr. A. Dunlop, 240, 78, Upper Thames-street, and retail, by all respectable Chemists and Mineral Water Dealers.

NIMROD DRIVING CAPE, Registered by Act 6 and 7 Vic., c. 65, Water proof.—These little distinguished Capes with the wide sleeves are making a great sensation, and must surely be what we all want the one garment for the day among our persons in these gracefu garments. They have already received the name of "real appropriate," "Anything Capes on the Road," &c. &c. Most flattering are the encomiums bestowed on this beautiful contrivance, the cloak and sleeves being formed in one piece, and the circular pieces, especially as a protection from rain. A perfect fit without close lined with fur, and invaluable as an Army cloak, or for the Sea, or as a Driving Cape, which can be put on and off without trouble. The following is one of the certificates received from people, as worn by Her Majesty and the Royal family, either lined with fur or not, and of all grades and ranks in society Unless May be had through any Draper in town who are supplied with pattern cards and books of price. DODDANCY Brothers, Great Coat Makers to H. R. H. Prince Albert, 17, Old Bond street, —Bellingham-arcade, and 57, Fleet-street.

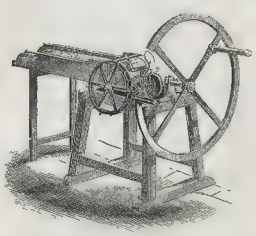
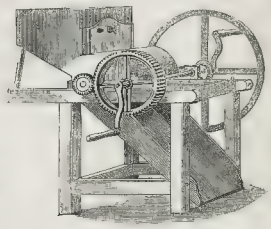
AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS AT THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

In the Implement Department of this year's show, the display was unusually large. The actual Novelties were not very numerous; but of well-approved and Prize Machines, there was a great variety. We have selected several of the most striking Implements for Illustration; and regret that our limits will not allow us to include a greater number of the ingenious, useful, and well-executed specimens.





Mr. Gardner.—Stand 26.

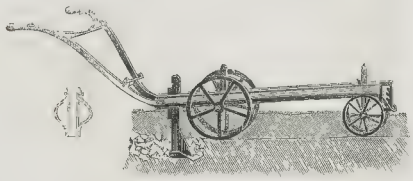
A New Patent Chaff Cutter, invented and manufactured by Mr. Gardner of Banbury, Oxon. The novel feature in this machine is that the knives are placed (as shown in the Engraving) in the centre of the mouth, and cut both up and down at the same time. Another peculiarity consists in the arrangements (also shown) for varying the length of cut.

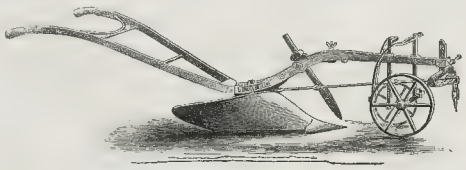
Mr. Wm. Crosskill.—Stand 30.

A Liquid Manure, or Watering Cart, constructed of Iron. It will hold 200 gallons. The outlet valve (acted upon by an iron lever rod) is opened or closed, and the supply regulated by the driver; the spreading apparatus behind is adjusted on the principle of a pendulum, and preserves its level, and, consequently, the uniform distribution of the fluid over the most uneven surface, 6 foot broadcast. This implement, invented and manufactured by Mr. William Crosskill, of the Beverley Iron Works, Hull, received honorary rewards from the Royal Agricultural Societies of England and Ireland, the Highland Society of Scotland, also the Agricultural Societies of Yorkshire and North Lincolnshire.

Mr. Alexander Dean, of Birmingham.—Stand 35.

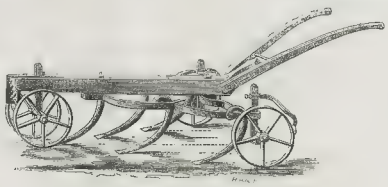
A Potato Pulping Mill. This mill acts on the grating principle, reducing the potato to a firm, smooth, and soft pulp, of the consistency of rich cream, from which the starch or flour for general use can be rapidly and economically manufactured. These are also made of various sizes, for horse or steam power, with dressing apparatus attached.





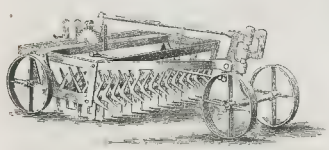
Mr. Stratton, Bristol.—Stand 41.

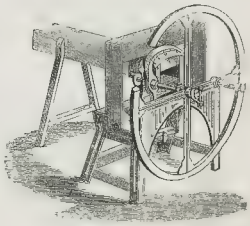
Read's Sub-pulverising Plough obtained a £10 prize at Shrewsbury. Its mode of operating is shown in the Engraving. The beam is constructed of B. T. Stratton's patent corrugated iron, possesses immense strength, and is a most important implement.



Mr. Jno. Howard.—Stand 69.

The "Champion Plough," improved and manufactured by Mr. John Howard, of Bedford. To this excellent implement the first prize was awarded by the Royal Agricultural Society of England, at their meetings at Liverpool, Bristol, and Shrewsbury; and was designated by P. Pusey, Esq., M.P., "The Champion Plough of England."

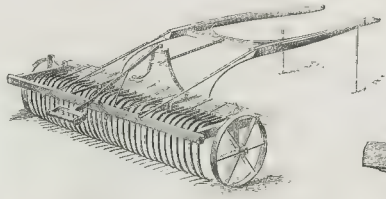




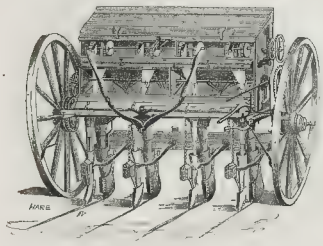
Mr. Read, 37, Regent Circus, Piccadilly.—Stand 64

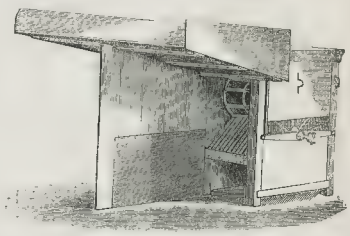
Read's Improved Scarifier is an appendage to his Patent Subsoil Pulverising Plough, manufactured and exhibited by himself, Mr Stratton, of Bristol, and others. To the same frame, three broad shares may be adapted, for paring the surface of pea or bean stubble, from 2 feet 10 inches to 3 feet 4 inches wide.

The Norwegian Harrow obtained a £10 Prize at Shrewsbury, manufactured by Mr. Stratton, of Bristol. This is a new improvement for pulverising the surface, and is, in the opinion of practical farmers, a valuable acquisition to agriculture.



Garrett and Son's Patent Chaff Cutter (Horse Power). The principal feature in this machine is, that the hay or straw is advanced by separate impulses to the cutting knife, thereby preventing any undue friction by pressure against the under surface of the blade. The lengths are adjusted from ¼ to ¾ in., by simply shifting a bolt into the various holes made for that purpose.



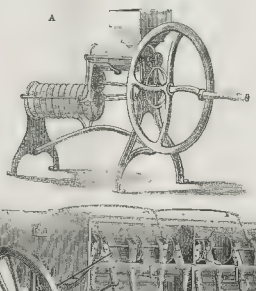


Messrs. Sanders and Williams.—Stand 76.

A Patent Horse-Drag Rake. This implement obtained the Royal Agricultural Society of England's prize, at Southampton, in 1844, and is one of the most useful implements employed by agriculturists. Messrs. Sanders and Williams, patentees, Bedford. Implements for similar purposes were exhibited by Messrs Grant, of Stamford, Wallake, Hornchurch, &c

Mr. R. Garrett.—Stand 47

"Garrett" and Son's Patent Lever Drill, for Seeds and Manure, having undergone several important improvements, is entitled to especial notice. 1st. It is adapted to drill corn or seeds, with or without manure, in any required quantities, and at any distance apart; the regular supply of manure being secured by a double-action stirrer, combining a perpendicular with a rotary motion. 2nd. As a simple corn or grass seed drill; an improved apparatus is adapted to regulate the delivery of seed up or down hill, and the steerage machinery worked by the stag-horn levers behind, enables the attendant to keep the rows of corn perfectly parallel with the preceding course of the drill. 3rd. As a turnip and manure drill the axle is made to slide so as to suit the different widths of ploughing, and fit it for either flat land or ridges. The deposited seed is slightly covered with soil by small chain-harrows, appended to the end of each lever.



Garrett and Son's Barley Awles, or Hummelling Machine, (A) with registered improvements, exhibited for the first time at this meeting. It is for separating the Awl, or horn, from the Barley, which is performed in the most effectual manner. The small cylinder to which the hopper is affixed has within it a barrel of wood running the whole length, leaving about an inch space between it and the cylinder all round; on the outside of the barrel a number of short stubbs are arranged in a spiral direction, from end to end; these stubbs also forming segments of a screw, similar to Lowe's Patent Ship Propeller. Thus, when put to work, the barley, being admitted from the hopper, is allowed to fill the cylinder quite full; the barrel is then put in motion, and the stubbs, passing through the mass of barley, break off every horn, at the same time screwing it forward towards the revolving cylindrical screen, through which, as it passes, it is cleansed of the broken horns and dust, presenting a fine sample, perfectly fitted for the market.

Mr. R. Hornsby, Grantham, Lincolnshire.—Stand 14.

Hornsby's Patent Drill, (B) for Corn and General Purposes. Prize Machine, constructed with 10 coulters (for clearness, five only are shown in the Engraving), fitted with a rotary stirrer, with lever to throw the same in or out of work as the Drill travels, for depositing compost, bones, or other manures, either moist or dry. The Royal Agricultural Society of England awarded prizes to this drill at Liverpool, Bristol, and Derby.

Messrs. Barrett, Exall, and Andrewes.—Stand 22.

A Two-Horse Power Threshing Machine, invented and manufactured by Messrs. Barrett, Exall, and Andrewes, of Reading—the peculiarity of which consists in the concave, or breasting, being made to expand or contract, so that, at whatever distance it may be placed from the drum, that distance is equal throughout. This contrivance renders it applicable to all kinds of grain and cover.

Public Testimonial to Lieut. Waghorn, R.N.—The services of Lieut. Waghorn are well known, and the daily-increasing importance of the relations of England with India, renders the Overland route between the mother country and her magnificent dependency—of which he was pioneer—one of the most remarkable improvements of the time. In fact, not only England, but Europe and even America, participate in the advantages which Mr. Waghorn's services have secured. Before Mr. Waghorn stepped forth to devote himself to a task of such magnitude, no part of India could be reached in less than four months. The mails from Bombay now reach England in about thirty four days, and the regularity with which the Overland communication is conducted, is the practical demonstration of his original views on the subject. We are glad to perceive that a committee has been formed for marking the sense entertained of the advantages derived by the British Empire from Lieut. Waghorn's spirited enterprise.

Directions for Affixing Postage Labels.—The most effectual plan is to dip the label wholly into water, to shake off the water immediately, and to press the label upon the letter with a piece of clean blotting paper. When the gum is dull in appearance, it will require rather more time and moisture to make it stick firmly, than when it is glossy. N.B.—The purpose of wetting the label wholly, is to counteract the tendency it has to curl up from the letter, when one side only is wetted, a tendency caused by the expansion of that side, as it imbibes the moisture

THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

Downing-street has been without its regular official tenants, its inmates only holding possession and answering the calls as a matter of accommodation till it is known who is to have the key of the door. The centre of political interest has still been Chesham-place, and many and anxious are the eyes directed towards the mansion of Lord John Russell—the possible, or proximate, or probable Minister, or maker of a Ministry, for everything is so uncertain that we hardly know how to class him. It appears that all the deliberations of the chiefs of the Whig party have been, not on the actual construction of the new Government, but on the question whether they shall undertake the task of constructing it. The question debated for so many days has been, shall we do it? not, how is it to be done? This delay in accepting a task at the command of the Sovereign, proves, at least, that great difficulties surround it. One party being out, is by no means the same thing as another coming in; and whatever may be the "hunger for the vacant chair," it would be useless for the successor to take his seat on it merely to be pushed from it immediately. It is very easy to be bold in opposition, but office plunges every man into the midst of intricacies that require caution and dexterity. Lord John Russell naturally asks, "If I take power how long can I keep it? and what support can I depend on?" In short, what are his prospects on taking office? Another question should, perhaps, go before it—what made Sir Robert Peel resign it?

The true explanation of the reasons for that apparently inexplicable step, would give us the clue to the maze in which all parties seem at present involved. To ordinary observers it appears unaccountable—an effect without an adequate cause. At the present moment the winter is mild—the stock of Corn in England reported to be quite an average one—prices by no means high or excessive; and employment still sufficient, though symptoms of a decline in the demand for some kinds of labour are showing themselves. Ministries have steered frailer barks than the vessel commanded by Peel, over rougher seas than now threaten us. Why, then, is the helm abandoned to other hands? Such are the feelings of many at the present moment—a mixture of dislike, suspicion, and perplexity.

On the other side it is replied, the present condition of things is not the sole point to be considered; the failure of a great staple of food in the poorest and most populous division of the Empire is proved. There are many months to be provided for between the present time and next harvest; should we want a supply from other countries, Europe has not got any surplus to send us; on the wide plains of Poland—the great terror of the English farmer as the source of an overwhelming competition against him—there is at this moment actual famine. There is an universal impression that a scarcity threatens the greater portion of the Old World, for every Government of Europe has taken measures of precaution against it. A statesman governing a nation like this, and judging from knowledge as full and perfect as unlimited means of enquiry can procure him, and feeling his awful responsibility, cannot but be influenced by this general, though, at present, somewhat vague terror, and wishes to do something; he cannot remain quiet while all other Powers are acting. What he proposed to do, is not fully explained; all we know is, that his colleagues refuse to coincide with him, and that a Government with a great majority in the Commons, and with any opposition to it hopeless in the Lords, has fallen to pieces, giving to its political foes an opportunity they could hardly have dreamed of winning for themselves.

Either, then, there is a great and stern necessity which compels the late Premier to adopt a certain course to meet it, or the resignation is—not exactly a trick perhaps—but an experiment on the capability of others to govern instead of him; if the Ultra-Protectionists under the Duke of Richmond are afraid to try—if the Abolitionists under Lord John Russell try and fail—what then remains but for Peel to come into power again with more influence than ever? There is one alternative besides, but it is scarcely possible; it is that of a Russell holding office, and the late chief of the Conservatives supporting him! Years of gradual approximatition may end at last in an actual alliance; but we must confess, of all the speculations of a time when nothing but speculation is to be met with, this seems the most improbable, though Sydney Smith, some years ago, predicted something of the kind: "There never was an instance in this country where parties were so nearly balanced, and in a very few years either Peel will swallow Lord John, or Lord John will pasture upon Peel; parties will coalesce, the Duke of Wellington and Viscount Melbourne meet at the same board, and the Lion lie down with the Lamb." When that was written, parties were very equally balanced, but the last General Election gave an overwhelming preponderance to the Conservatives; and when that was gained, their Leader immediately began to assimilate as much as possible his policy to that of his opponents, gradually breaking down the great distinctions between them. The more able he was to govern on his own principles, the greater disposition he exhibited to abandon them. The whole history of party for the last four years has been a contradiction and an anomaly, and now it has become confusion worse confounded. Something must shape itself out of the chaos, but it almost defies calculation to predict what it will be. In fact, at the present crisis, "making a Ministry" is a task of unusual difficulty. We cannot recall an instance in which any party Leader was called on to undertake it, with a clear majority of ninety against him in Parliament: how can he encounter such desperate odds? He can only meet them officially to encounter assured defeat; and then the whole matter is thrown upon the country for decision.

In whatever way, then, this "making a Ministry" may terminate, it is a matter of secondary importance compared with the next stage of the proceedings—the appeal to the country. Men may take office, but to another and greater authority they must look for power. Compared with that part of the struggle, the personnel of the new Ministry, whoever may compose it, is a thing indifferent. It seems to us a marvel that the great landed interest, so strong in both Houses, should not at least have made a trial of the possibility of a Government of their own. Why are they always content to let others act for them, with the liability of being, as they have unquestionably been, deceived and betrayed?

As we write, the rumours are strengthened, that the decision of Lord John Russell is a determination to attempt to construct a Free Trade Government. Conversions have been rife lately in the Whig ranks—some so close on the eleventh hour, as to induce misgivings of the motive. With these recruits he may succeed; but it would be better, perhaps, if he gave to the country an Administration including men chosen a little beyond the small circle—almost a family one—of the Whig Aristocracy. Old associations, and the traditions of office, allot the chief posts to the old names; but for the subordinate departments, a few more fresh and unworn might be introduced with advantage. The last few years of the Liberal Government left disastrous recollections. A mere re-production of that ill-starred body would not awaken much enthusiasm on the hustings, and on that decision everything, beyond a few feverish months of official existence, must depend. The question here broached may become more pressing a few years hence than it is now, but still it is one which those who have the "making of a Ministry," will find worth consideration.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S HOUSE, CHESHAM-PLACE.

During Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, Lord John Russell's house in Chesham-place, Belgrave-square, was the meeting-place for the most eminent members of his party. There were daily interviews, some of them of long duration; and of course, during the Ministerial crisis, the public took great interest in watching the progress of these conferences. We may add that, in spite of the important matters which were under arrangement at Chesham place, that locality on Tuesday did not present the least symptom of excitement. Our artist, who went there to take a sketch of the spot, mentions the disappointment he felt at not seeing any objects to afford scope for his pencil. He says—"A profound silence, uninterrupted by even the humblest vehicle, reigned all about the place. There was no crowd, as I or anybody would have expected, waiting anxiously for the decision of the important matters under discussion inside the house. No rattling of chaises and four, bringing into town the future arbiters of the British empire, disturbed the usual stillness of this spot. Indeed, without the assistance of a postman, who happened to knock at the corner house, our artist might have doubted whether this very corner house, that had been pointed out to him by a butcher boy as Lord John Russell's, was really the scene where at that moment the interests of millions of people were at stake."

The Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord John Russell returned to town on Thursday morning from Windsor Castle. A meeting was held shortly afterwards at the noble Lord's residence, in Chesham-place, Belgrave-square. There were present, Lord John Russell, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Cottenham, Earl Grey, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Auckland, Viscount Morpeth, Lord Monteagle, Sir John Hobhouse, Sir George Grey, the Right Hon. Edward Ellice, the Right Hon. Thomas B. Macaulay, the Right Hon. Francis T. Baring, and the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere. The meeting broke up at a quarter past two o'clock.

After the meeting, Lord John Russell left his residence in Chesham-place for Windsor Castle, to have an audience of her Majesty. The noble Lord returned to town in the evening.

The purpose of the noble Lord's visit to Windsor was to submit to her Majesty a list of an Administration proposed by himself.

THE LATE MINISTRY OF SIR R. PEEL.

We believe that when an explanation takes place in Parliament as to the causes of the resignation of Sir R. Peel, the following division in the Cabinet for and against him, will prove, in every particular, correct.

There were for Sir Robert Peel, in support of his views, including the right honourable baronet himself:—

The Earl of Aberdeen.	The Earl of Lincoln, and
The Right Hon. Sidney Herbert.	Sir James Graham.
In opposition to those views—
The Duke of Wellington.	The Earl of Ripon.
Lord Stanley.	The Earl of Haddington.
The Duke of Buccleuch.	The Lord Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst).
Lord Wharncliffe.	Lord Granville Somerset.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (the Right Honourable Henry Goulburn).

As regards Lord Lyndhurst, we can state that the noble and learned lord contemplated, previous to the meeting of Parliament, to relinquish the high unctions of Lord Chancellor, owing to the uncertainty of his health.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

It may be well supposed that the news of the resignation of the Peel Ministry excited immense sensation in Paris. In that capital, however, the formation of a new Cabinet was considered a matter of much more easy accomplishment than it was found to be in London For instance, the Débats of Monday last treated the matter as settled, little imagining that, even on Thursday, nothing would be known about the new Ministry in London

When the resignation was known on 'Change, the Three per Cents. fell nearly ½, and there was a general fall in the price of railroad shares.

The National asserts that the "crisis" has caused much pain in the high est quarter, as, with Lord Palmerston in the Foreign Office, the entente cordiale could no longer exist. This journal pretends to know that a course has been sent to England with despatches, the object of which is a renon strance against the appointment of a nobleman known to be the persona enemy of the King. All this may be, and most likely is, a fable; but it is valuable to the extent of showing how strong is the general conviction in Paris that the Whigs in power will be the signal for a return to that danger ous "isolation" which Lord Palmerston and M. Thiers contrived to create, and to which Lord Aberdeen and M. Guizot put an end.

Considerable uneasiness continued to be felt in Paris respecting the con test probable for the Creil and St Quentin Railroad Line. The National states that a most respectable and universally esteemed gentleman connected with the Strasburgh and Bale Railroad line had committed suicide. The unhappy person is M. Gabriel Ivoi, brother of the Agent de Change whose failure caused, a fortnight since, so much confusion and regret. It appears that he shot himself with a fowling-piece at his country house at Grenelle on Thursday morning (last week).

The news from Algiers, given in these papers, is to the 6th inst. It is stated that Marshal Bugeaud had penetrated into the territory of the Flittas, and had made numerous razzias, taking 500 Arabs prisoners, and captur ing an enormous quantity of cattle. Bou Maza, who had retired from the Dahra upon the approach of the French columns, had produced fresh trou bles in the subdivision of Orleansville, the column of Lieutenant Colonel St Arnaud had entered and re establ shed the communications be tween Tenez and that point That officer had attacked a large body of Arabs in the Medjajas territory, and killed a great number of them, and completely despoiled the two insurgent tribes, Ou el Faren and Hamiss. Great agita tion was said to prevail in the Ouaresseni, where a new Scherif, called Hadi Hassoun, had arrived from Morocco

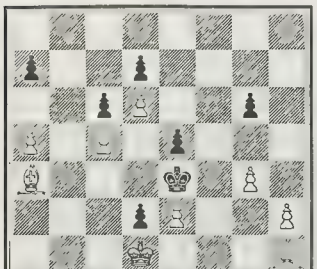
White moving first, to mate in four moves.



NATIONAL SPORTS.

Sometimes I hunt the fox, the vowed foe
Unto my lambes, and him dislodge away;
Sometimes the hare I pursue by fraudes of the doe,
Or from the goat her kidde how to convey
Another while I bayte and nets display,
The birds to catche, the fishes by begyle:
And when I wearie am, I down dos lay
My limbes in every shade, to rest from toyle,
And drinke of every brooke when thirst my throte doth boyle.
—Fairy Queene.

Although, as recited in our last week's article on this subject, practical sporting, as regards the million, is just now in pretty general abeyance, theoretical sporting, as concerns the million, is in very spirited operation; indeed, the matter was probably never so energetically agitated. Whether it be sympathy or some other mysterious working of nature that hath brought it to pass, certain it is that the Corn question is now both politically and socially before the public in an attitude to command universal attention, whatever its deserts. Leaving it, in the former relation, to be dealt with by the combined wisdom of the nation, we take the liberty of investigating its claim in the latter respect, inasmuch as, whatever may be urged against the legislative treatment of the Corn-laws, the annals of Parliament afford no parallel of a pressing case of impolicy being suffered to remain in such a predicament as the existing state of our Game-laws. The practice of preserving beasts and birds of game had, no doubt, obtained before the days in which Spenser wrote; but the original privilege, as then enjoyed in reference to field sports, was in spirit that which, in the above stanza, he draws obviously from a familiar subject.

The time has come—the occasion is even after date—in which our code o Game-laws should be revised. It was never meant to bring about the plague of hares and pheasants by which many of our counties are now overrun; it was never designed for the sport of the unsporting system now carried to an unEnglish excess in many of our great shooting districts. Last year a pamphlet in defence of the Game-laws was published by Mr Granthy Berkeley, a Member of Parliament, and well known for his contributions to the sporting periodicals, as the uncompromising champion of aristocratical monopoly in the fere naturæ. The beast replies and rejoinders, all as wide of the mark as the declaration of a senator opposed to the passing of a Bill to legalise the sale of game, that a year after it became the law a hare would be as scarce an animal in Great Britain as a wolf. How stands the fact? During the past season hares had so multiplied that many acres of Manors had to call in the aid of poachers to put them down—or to reckon on cultivating their own wastes! We throw out of the present treatment of this question all consideration of the moral evil brought about by the existing system of preserving; we divest ourself of the argument against it which its premium for poaching affords; we repudiate all the advantages which the unpopular sophisms, and the popular fallacies of Mr. Berkeley and Mr. Bright would lift up to us—and simply seek to place it before that tribunal, which certainly is the fittest to deal with it—English sportsmen of the good old English school.

A few days since, a leading journal published a letter from an officer of rank, residing in the neighbourhood of Windsor, setting the case of game preserving in a very strong point of view generally, and winding up his denunciation of the system with this startling assertion: "The carnage (by shooting) about here is not less than elsewhere. After about two hours' firing, the game and rabbits being hemmed in by keepers, to prevent escape, my information leads me to believe the amount of the slain generally exceeds two hundred, some of which are sold at Eeham, fattened by my neighbours. My contribution towards it—I mean this in the most literal sense of the words, and smartly mean to prove it, by the sale of competent witnesses—amounts this year to the entire rental of my estat 7 If we beueve this deliberate assertion of Captain Forbes—and how can we doubt it? does it not establish a case calling aloud for the repeal of a law, which, even in one solitary instance, could be made the instrument of such inustice as this? We are the earnest, uncompromising advocates, of the National Sports of this country, because we are convinced they act beneficially on the popular tastes and resources. We are for the like reason opposed to that new fancy of woodcraft known as the battue. It is a foreign invention, and the sooner it is abolished the better. When the Duke of Brunswick was Viceroy of Hanover one of those exhibitions was got up, thus alluded to in "Blame's Fancy Sketches:"—"At the extremity of the enclosure a sort of pavilion was placed. None were admitted into the arena but the Royal Highnesses and the Grand Duke of Austria, and the Duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz: thirty-five victims fell to the first stark I saw a bear running about the ground with his entrails hanging out, and one of the young Dukes of Brunswick thought it a great exploit to place his spurs in the very part where a mortal wound had been already inflicted. Sir Edward Nagle having laid four hares dead at his feet, exclaimed in the language of his profession as he wiped his sword—'Now that I've dined, I have done.' I've given the gamboons of four pigs, by ——." Save the soliloquy, a recent scene of the sort at which we assisted, as the phrase is, presented similar features of attraction and humanity. Upon the ground of justice, the Game-laws must be revised. The following was the price current at the close:—

THURSDAY.—A few members looked in, but with so little disposition to speculate, that not a bet was laid.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE ELECTORS OF LONDON AND THE CORN-LAWS.

On Monday there was a numerous meeting of the electors of the City of London at the Guildhall, upon the subject of the Corn laws

At one o'clock the Lord Mayor entered the hall, and was followed by Mr Cobden, who was greeted with loud cheering. Among the other gentlemen who occupied the platform we noticed the following: James Pattison, Esq., M.P.; Raikes Currie, Esq., M.P.; Dr. Bowring, M.P.; Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; William Williams, Esq., M.P.; T. Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.; Arch. Hastie, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Moffatt, Esq., M.P.; John Dillon, Esq.; R. Ricardo, Esq.; Alderman Sir John Key, Bart.; Alderman Wood; Mr Sheriff Laurie, D W. Harvey, Esq.; William Hawes, Esq.; C. Wordsworth, Esq., barrister; John Lock, Esq.; R. Taylor, Esq.; and W. H. Ashurst, Esq. The following letter was received from Lord John Russell:—

Chesham place, Dec. 14.

My Lord Mayor,—As I understand that your Lordship is to preside at the meeting of the City of the Lord on Monday next, on the subject of the Corn laws, I request you will have the goodness to state, that the peculiar circumstances of my position at this moment will prevent my attendance.—I have the honour to be, your Lordship's obedient servant,

JOHN RUSSELL.

The first speaker was Mr. Dillon, who urged the repeal of all laws which operated as a premium upon famine, and moved "That the principle of protection in commerce is unsound—false in theory and in practice; delusive to the classes who seek protection, and injurious to the community at large. That the great practical rule of leaving all commerce unfettered applies more peculiarly, and on still stronger grounds of justice as well as policy, to the trade in corn, and in all articles wnatsoever which form the food of the people, than to any other trade."

Mr. Wilkinson created much disapprobation and some derision by arguing that there was no deficiency of food. The resolution was agreed to, as was also one declaring that the principle of protection had failed in realising the advantages promised by its supporters.

Mr. Charles Perkins, brother to the brewer of that name, in proposing the next resolution, said, the Peel Administration were afraid to face the speech of the President of the United States, which would arrive in this country with the next ten days. The Western States of America had now a majority in the Congress, and they never would meet this country upon terms of amicable feeling and mutual interest until they had free access to the markets of this country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Hawes, in seconding the resolution, hoped the meeting would be content with nothing less than a total repeal of the Corn laws.

Mr. Cobden then came forward, and was received with prolonged shouts of applause. After complimenting the electors of London upon their power and influence, he said, "Who are the opponents with whom we have to deal on this occasion? Who are the men to tell us, the inhabitants of London and the vast multitudes of the populous north, that we should not be allowed to exchange the fruits of our industry for the food which is offered open-handed by every country on the globe? Who are they that will stand up in array against this magnificent meeting, and tell us that we must not do this? Oh, we must find them, forsooth, in Buckinghamshire and Essex (Cheers and laughter.) Yes, in Essex they had an old Protectionist gathering, and they tell us that that which is to stem this mighty avalanche of opinion—this great movement—is to come from Chelmsford. (Laughter.) If there is plenty in the land, there is no use to go 3,000 miles to America for a supply; but if there is not plenty, then that system which prevents the people from receiving a supply must be an unrighteous system—a system abhorrent to every law human and divine. (Loud cheers.) Every law is bad, and to be condemned, that interferes to prevent a supply of food to the people of any country. (Cheers.) Now, gentlemen, with regard to the protective societies, of which we have heard so much. They tell us confidently that there is a sufficient supply of corn and potatoes in the country. If this is so, I wish to know what is the matter in head quarters. If there is no potato rot, what is that murrain which we have got in the Cabinet? (Cheers.) No, gentlemen, there are ominous signs in the sudden rupture of the Cabinet. (Hear, hear.) I believe it is based on some reports received respecting the crops in Ireland, and in many parts of England; reports, forsooth, for Sir Robert that the evil is much worse than any intimation the public have yet received, that this sudden break up has taken place. I believe that, by next spring—and it is my duty to state it—there will not be a sufficiency of food to be applied for the purposes of seed. (Hear, hear.) It is easy for our dukes and squires, manœuvring like old women at agricultural meetings, to say there is no scarcity, and to attempt to arrest the opinion in favour of free trade. They can go out to shoot and hunt during the day, and when they come in they can regale themselves with venison, champagne, and the like dainties. With them there is no scarcity; not so with the people. (Hear, hear, hear.) Mr. Cobden concluded in these terms:—"Your struggle is against a large section of the landed aristocracy of the country, whose everlasting struggles are to keep you, the people of England, without the earnest wealth they possibly can for the exercise of your skill, and the reward of your industry. (Applause.) They wish rather to live great amongst a little and impoverished people, than to rise with the greatness and increased power of those who will rise higher still, if they will only allow claims to those beneath them. (Applause.) Your struggling is with the monopolising landowners of this country, who are but a handful of men. Confront them with the people of this country, and they are as but a cork upon the cataract of Niagara. Why there are men living now, old enough to remember how the thousands assembled round the Mansion House to sign the petition, not merely against the laying on of this tax, but to give time to consider what its effects might be upon the nation. Upwards of 40,000 names were put to that petition in one day. London was moved from its very centre to oppose this very law. We say, therefore, down with the very idea of compensation—down with the very idea of compromise—we go for the total, immediate, and unqualified repeal of the Corn laws!" (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst thunders of applause.)

Other resolutions complimentary of the Corn-laws were agreed to.

Dr Bowring, in seconding one of them, said his friend Mr. Cobden had spoken of those who will probably be some of the new Ministers, but he (Dr. Bowring, believed public opinion would not be satisfied until a portfolio was in Mr. Cobden's own hands. He should be President of the Board of Trade. (Applause.)

MEETING OF THE ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—The first meeting for the season of the Anti-Corn Law League took place on Wednesday night at Covent Garden Theatre; and, as may be well imagined under present circumstances, it was a most numerous one. Great enthusiasm was manifested. The Chronicle says—"From the roof the house was a living human pile, in which the fairer portion of creation held a large proportion; the open floors of the boxes giving vistas of anxious countenances, extending along the circles, and an occasional murmur of distant struggling, evincing the fact that there were crowds content to take their chance of catching the voices of the speakers from the distant passages and staircases." It was stated that applications had been made for 30,000 tickets of admission. The chair was taken by the Hon. C P. Villiers, M.P., and the speakers were Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Bright, M.P., and the Rev. Mr. Fox. Amongst other members of Parliament present were—Henry Metcalfe, Esq., Howard Elphinstone, Esq., Benjamin Smith, Esq., Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., James Pattison, Esq., and Adam Smith, Esq. Altogether, the assembly formed a splendid manifestation against the Corn Laws.

A WEEK'S GOSSIP.

"He hath strange places cramm'd
With observation—the which he vents
In mingled fancies."—SHAKSPEARE.

We might gossip at abundant length of Cabinets and rumours of Cabinets, but really just at the present hazy conjuncture, politics are anything but safe ground for planting jokes. Nothing so absurd that invention can conceive, which may not be on the cards, a startling fact. Had we ventured a fortnight ago to predict that the strong Peel Government would have been scattered to the winds, and Lord John Russell busied in forming a Cabinet, the world would have looked for the cap and bells, and taken our predictions for an anticipation of some of the pantomimic tricks and transformations. Yet all this has come about. Then the wildest fancy flights of ours could not surpass in extravagance the conjectures of our sober daily brethren; and altogether we feel that the changes and chances of Cabinets just at present, are better food for the red-tape gossipers of the Carlton and Reform Clubs, than for us, who have no place to lose nor pension to hope for.

We were present on Monday last at the Westminster Play. An account of it, with the Prologue and Epilogue in their classical garb, will be found elsewhere. As the Epilogue, however, is full of allusions to the day, and turns entirely on the Railway madness, we have thought we might be doing our lady readers some service (and we are grateful to say that we have lady readers), and save their unhappy brothers or husbands some trouble in construing, and a great many excuses for not construing,—by subjoining a translation of it. The task is not an easy one to render Latin Hexameters and Pentameters into corresponding English metres. But we have ventured upon the attempt, and present the results of our essay:—

EPILOGUE.

Enter DAVUS, with a "share list!" in his hand.

DAVUS. Not a day passes but out comes a line! and then the premiums still rising,
Rising as fast as they can. (PAMPHILUS crosses stage.)
Pamphilus! as I'm a man
PAM. Pray do you come from the city? From Capel Court? It's surprising
Tho' the Times makes a dead set, higher the prices still get.
PAM. not recognising DAVUS. Really. Sir you've the advantage. DA. You don't mean to say you don't know me!
DAVUS, your flunky of yore. PAM. But the old Davus no more!
Rigged out so smart and so spruce! How is this? DA. By prospectuses, blue ones.
PAM. Well if your prospects look gay, 'tis more than your master can say.
But what's the news in the world? DA. Why, everyone's going it rather;
Up come committees, like beans, of ways, tho' perhaps not of means.
The iron age is restored, 'twould astonish my worthy old father—
Could he come to life, I'd go bail, at railways in sad way he'd fall.
Money is made now like smoke, and like smoke goes in puffs in the papers,
How can we meet with a check who have no specie but spec?
But, pray, excuse the remark you appear to me troubled with vapours, Surely you find Mrs. P. all that a good wife should be?
PAM. My family, Sir, 'is very dear!—and though the confession's unpleasant,
I'm hard up, I confess. DA. I'll get you out of the mess. (tosses scrip.)
Here, take this scrip, 'tis the real philosopher's stone, just at present,
Were you as poor as a rat you'll make a fortune by that.
There! What a name for a line, the Albens and Megara Junction,
With a great Pelopons nesian branch, all in one!
All my own work, every inch! Of director you shall have the function—
PAM. Nay, nay, you're joking. DA. All right! 'Twixt friends, you know, honour bright!
I'll let you know how we do it—first take up the map, choose your cities,
Needn't be nice, any two places whatever will do.
Then make a fine sounding list, to humbug your local committees,
Of every village that lies, right in the line the crow flies.
Make out a wonderful show of the traffic, the commerce that will be,
With a great Pelopons nesian branch, all in one!
All my own work, every inch! Of director you shall have the function—
PAM. Nay, nay, you're joking. DA. All right! 'Twixt friends, you know, honour bright!
I'll let you know how we do it—first take up the map, choose your cities,
Needn't be nice, any two places whatever will do.
Then make a fine sounding list, to humbug your local committees,
Of every village that lies, right in the line the crow flies.
Make out a wonderful show of the traffic, the commerce that will be,
Multiply prices by ten, 'tis but the stroke of a pen!
PAM. I see. DA. The country, of course, just the one to establish a line in.
A.1 the way thro' quite a fat (like the subscribers in that),
Gradients easy; say, perhaps, one in fifty, your steepest incline in,
Ca'l on a lot ments two bob—never was such a cheap job!
PAM. What can you do with a trifle like that? Such a sum I'd be scorning.
DA. Do them subscribers, friend mine, nothing we can't do the line.
The traffic we drive is in shares, not in passengers. Well, the next morning,
Out comes your line in the list, into your mill comes the grist.
Capel-court's full of your shares, the stags in a state of commotion,
Then's the time for you to bull, and the hard cash in to pull.
Not one share kept for yourself, to the public serve in your devotion;
Let them have all, that they'll buy, slip out yourself on the sly.
Of the Capel court school, all the schoolmen in capital Nominalists are,
Brimmy be called realists when the fin's safe in their fists.
PAM. Well, it's a wonderful plan, but doubtless some dangers and twists are
In such a game? DA. There's no risk, only in selling be brisk.

Enter SOSIA, LESBIA, CHERMES, and MYRIS.

SO. I say, DAVUS, old fellow, of the new line you're a director?
DA. Yes. ALL. Then scrip—scrip—scrip! Come, the certificates tip!
(DAVUS distributes scrip
PAM. All of you buying, I see. So 'I was Myus. PAM. Oh! I recollect her;
Women, too, staggering, 'tis queer! MYRIS. Why not, you know I'm a dear!
DA. Oh! we've all sexes and sorts.

Enter SIMO in a passion.

SI. Where's that rascal? (to DAVUS) It's you I address, Sir.
DA. Well, old gent, how d'ye do? Pray what's the matter with you?
SI. Here's a posse of fellows, with bags, set my grounds in a mess, sir, Sending my hedges to pot, whether I like it or not.
DA. Oh! the surveyors, no doubt. YES—I own that 'tis I who command it;
Our new line's running up through your estate, old chap!
SI. Right through my hall and best bed-room, ecod. I'm blessed if I stand it Property rights are a joke! DA. Pooh, Sir, 'it will all end in smoke!
SI. Terminus once was the god who marked fields out with hedges and ditches,
But your terminus, zounds! hedges and ditches confounds!

Enter CRITO.

Whom have we here? 'Tis Crito! CRI. Huzzah! such a prospect of riches
I've such a scheme! SI. You too mad! zounds, this is really too bad.
CR. A plan for a grand atmospheric to join all the islands together;
Into the ocean 'twill fly, running on bridges of air.
DA. Magnificent! So. to CRITO. What, you too scheming? CR. Why not?
My nest I must feather
Every one does it, I find, why should I linger behind?
SI. Here's a rise state of things! Well, DAVUS, what think you of doing?
DA. Doing the public's the thing, I am the great Railway King!
ST. A King! You a King? But no matter,—the times I've no time for reviewing.
(To public.) You are the Kings at whose throne all our allegiance is sworn.
Ever to stick to the ways of our forefathers here we'll endeavour,
And let the world take its course, be it for better or worse.
With these the Muses be pleased, and Honour and Honesty ever
Keep up their glorious rule over our Westminster School.

"Amen, to that, sweet powers;" though it struck us, on Monday night, as we surveyed the dormitory, with its ranges of unsavoury-looking stumpbedsteads, and dirt encrusted floor, that there would be no harm if Honour, Honesty, and the Muses, had a little cleanlier dwelling place, and one which recalled a little less forcibly to the recollection the casual ward of a union workhouse.

RETIREMENT OF COLONEL REID.—Colonel Reid, the recently elected M.P. for Windsor, has just retired, upon half-pay, from the lieutenantcolonelcy of the 2nd regiment of Life Guards. It is expected that Major M'Dowall, who stands next for promotion in the regiment, will succeed to the vacancy created by the retirement of Colonel Reid. A step in their respective ranks will also be obtained by the senior captain, lieutenant, and cornet.

DEATH OF COLONEL HUGHES, C.B.—News has been received of the death of Colonel J. Hughes, C.B., who expired on the 29th ult. at Poggibouzzo, in Tuscany. The gallant deceased served in Portugal and Spain under Sir John Moore, and was present at the cavalry actions at Mayorga and Benevento. Subsequently, he again proceeded to the Peninsula. The gallant Colonel was brother to Lord Dinorben.

ROYAL ACADEMY PRIZES.

On Wednesday, the 10th inst, the Anniversary of the Foundation of the Royal Academy, its Members met at Trafalgar-square, for the election of the various officers, and the usual biennial Distribution of Prizes. The chair, in the absence of Sir M. A. Shee, the President, who, from continued indisposition, could not attend, was taken by the Keeper, Mr. Jones. The Prizes were awarded in the following order:—

A gold medal, and the Discourses of the Presidents Reynolds and West, for the best historical picture in oil colours; the subject to be—"Finding the Body of Harold." To consist of at least three figures; the size of the cloth to be a common half-length, viz. 4 feet 2 inches, by 3 feet 4 inches; the principal figure to measure not less than 2 feet in height. Awarded to Mr. C. J. Hooke

A gold medal, and the Discourses of the Presidents Reynolds and West, for the best composition in sculpture; the subject to be—"The Hours leading out the Horses of the Sun." Basso relievo—imbost not to exceed 2 inches; the figures not to be less than 2 feet nor more than 3 feet high; the principal figure to measure not less than 2 feet in height. Awarded to Mr. A. Brown.

We have engraved these two Prizes, which are highly indicative of the advance of art among the Academy Students.

The remaining prizes were.—To Mr. A. Johnson, for the best architectural design for a National Record Office.—silver medals, with the lectures of Barry, Opie, and Fusell, to Mr. T. Clark, for the best copy in oil; and to Mr. W. Gale, for the best chalk drawing from the living model:—silver medal to to Mr. G. A. Sintzenich, for the second best drawing; and to Mr. T. Clarke, for the third best drawing:—silver medals, with the lectures of Barry, Opie, and Fusell, to Mr. A. Brown, for the best model from the life; and to Mr. W. Walters for the best architectural drawing of the Strand front of Somerset House;—a silver medal to Mr. S C Capes, for the second best drawing:—a silver medal, with the lectures of Barry, Opie, and Fusell, to Mr. J. A. Vinter, for, for the best chalk drawing from the antique:—silver medals to Mr. G. B. O'Neil, for the second best drawing; and to Mr. W. Anderson, for the third best drawing:—a silver medal, with the lectures of Barry, Opie, and Fusell, to Mr. G. Moss, for the best model from the antique:—and silver medals to Mr. Kelsey, for the second best model; and to Mr. L. Wyon, for the best medal die from the head of the Apollo Belvidere.

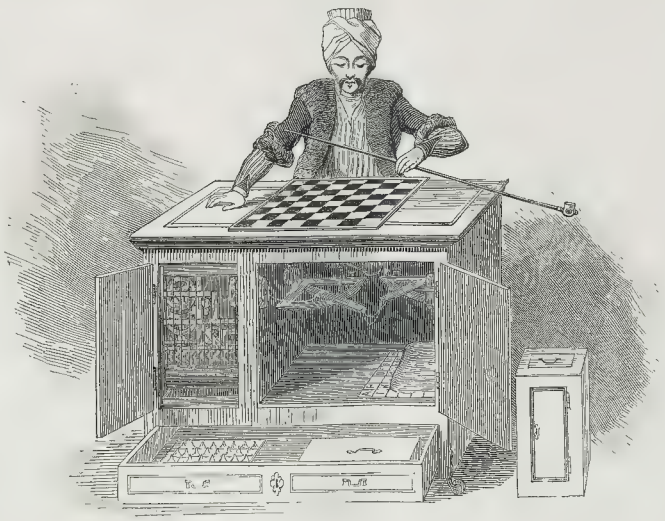
The meeting concluded with the reading of an address to the students, which had been composed by Sir M. A. Shee, for the former biennial meeting, but not delivered by him on account of indisposition. We understand, by the way, that Sir M A. Shee has been induced to recal his resignation of the Presidency of the Royal Academy.

PAINTING PRIZE.—"FINDING THE BODY OF HAROLD."—BY MR. J. C. HOOK.

NEWSPAPER

THE AUTOMATON CHESS-PLAYER REDIVIVUS.

By an extract of a letter from a Correspondent in New York, we learn that, after years of oblivion and neglect, this marvellous piece of trickery, which so long excited the admiration of the scientific world at Vienna, Berlin, Paris, and London, has been dragged from its dusty obscurity, once more to delight and astonish the sight seeing multitudes of the other hemisphere. Our communicant, indeed, speaks of the figure now exhibiting as of another wonder, the invention of a pianoforte maker of New York; but we have cogent reasons for believing that the long celebrated Automaton of Kempelin, and the Chess-playing Turk of the Broadway, are one and the same. Age may have dimmed the lustre of his eye, and weakened the thin, small voice which of old astounded the gaping visitors with its feebly enunciated "check;" but there, in his ancient turbaned glory, with beard and calumet, and flowing robes—there, in unmistakable imperturbability, sits the Wizard who, for half a century, put at nought the penetration of the wisest heads in Europe. Since the revelations of M. Mouret, the celebrated Chess-player, whose skill directed the movements of the Automaton for years, a good deal has been written explanatory of the means by which this remarkable deception was carried on; but even now, except among people immediately interested in the game of Chess, very little is known upon the subject. Most persons, to be sure, have heard of "The Automaton Chess Player," and entertain a vague notion that it was in some measure conducted by human agency—a sort of "Jack in the Box;" but how this was effected—the wonderful ingenuity shown in the concealment of the player—the exquisitely delusive semblance of massive wheels and springs, and intricate mechanism, with which every nook and cranny of both chest and figure were apparently filled—and, above all, the originality of conception displayed in the device by which the imprisoned agent became acquainted with his opponent's moves during the progress of a game—are as much a mystery to the world at large, as ever—and we shall therefore take advantage of the present opportunity to say a few words on the subject.



THE AUTOMATON CHESS PLAYER.

The Automaton Chess Player was invented in the year 1769, by Wolfgang de Kempelin, a native of Hungary, Aulic Councillor to the Royal Chamber of the domains of the Emperor of Germany, and long distinguished for his skill in Mechanics. His object in constructing it appears to have been merely to afford a passing amusement to the Empress Maria Theresa and the Court; and there is much reason to believe that the exaggerated enthusiasm with which it was received, and the pompous announcements of its marvellous powers, afforded but little gratification to the inventor himself, who frequently spoke of it as an ingenious trifle, the chief merit of which consisted in the happy choice of means employed to hide the deception. In 1783, the Chess Automaton was publicly exhibited in Paris, and excited the surprise and admiration of all who saw it: from thence it was removed to London, where at the time Chess was extensively practised and patronised by the higher classes. It was subsequently taken by special invitation of the Emperor, to the Court of Frederick the Great, at Berlin; this Prince was devotedly attached to Chess, and in a moment of liberality he proffered an enormous sum for the purchase of the Automaton and its secret. The offer was accepted, and in a private interview with De Kempelin, he was furnished with a key to the mystery which had baffled the whole scientific world. In a short time, however, Frederick threw aside the novelty so dearly bought, and for many years it lay forgotten and neglected amidst the lumber of his Palace.

M. de Kempelin died in 1804, but in two years after, when Napoleon occupied Berlin, we find the Chess Automaton in the field again, under a new master. On one occasion of its exhibition at this period, Napoleon himself is said to have entered the lists. After some half-dozen moves he purposely made a false move, the figure inclined his head, replaced the piece, and made a sign for Napoleon to play again. Presently, he again played falsely; this time the Automaton removed the offending piece from the board, and played his own move. Napoleon was delighted, and to put the patience of his taciturn opponent to a severer test, he once more played incorrectly, upon which the Automaton raised his arm, and, sweeping the pieces from the board, declined to continue the game.

After a second tour of the leading cities in Europe, where it was received with unabated enthusiasm, in 1819 it was again established in London. Of its subsequent history but little is known. For some years it was exhibited in Canada and the United States, and was finally understood to have returned to New York, where it has remained ever since.

Of the appearance, and manner of exhibiting this remarkable figure, the reader will obtain a pretty intelligible idea from the cut prefixed, and the following brief description:—

Upon entering the apartment where it was exhibited, the Automaton, attired in handsome Turkish costume, was seen seated behind a chess-board, affixed to a chest, about three feet high, two feet deep, and four feet long. Both the figure and the wooden chair on which he sat were attached to the chest, and this being upon castors, the whole was moved with facility about the chamber. The exhibitor commenced operations, by showing the interior of the chest, which was divided by a partition into two unequal parts, both apparently so occupied by machinery, that the concealment of a human being appeared impossible. After opening the doors in front and behind, pulling out, at the same time, a long shallow drawer, at the bottom of the chest, containing a set of chess men, a cushion, and some counters, two lesser doors were also opened; and then, in order to make the exposure of the inside complete, lights were shown at the back openings, enabling the spectators to see right through the interior. The machine was then turned round, and lights were again exhibited at the different openings, in such a way that every corner seemed visible. At the same time, the Automaton's robe was turned over his head, so as to display the internal structure, which was seen to be full of wheels, cylinders, and other clock-work; and, in this exposed state, the whole apparatus was wheeled round, for the inspection of the visitors. After allowing sufficient time for examination, the exhibitor closed all the doors, removed the machine behind a balustrade, and invited any one who chose to play a game of chess.

As soon as an antagonist appeared, the eyes of the figure were apparently directed to the board, and, after some moments of seeming meditation, it began the battle. First, leisurely raising its arm from the cushion on which it rested, the hand was directed towards the piece to be played; the fingers then opened, took hold of the piece, and deposited it on the proper square; while, during the operation, a noise of wheel work was heard, which ceased only when the Automaton's arm had returned to rest again on the cushion. Many attempts, like that just related of Napoleon, to disconcert it, by playing falsely, were made for fun by visitors, but always without success, for, upon the least infringement of the established rules of the game, the Automaton, after tapping upon the chest, with an air of offended dignity, would replace the erring piece, and then proceed to take advantage of the illegal move, by playing one of his own men.

Upon the termination of every game, the doors were again unclosed, and the whole machine subjected to a second inspection by the persons present.

It is certainly difficult, in the face of this gratuitous display of the whole internal structure of the machine, to conceive the possibility of a concealed confederate, and yet, such is the simple and unscientific solution of this celebrated mystery. The chess-player who directed the movements of the Automaton was really hidden in the interior; and all that mass of finely executed clock-work, wheels, and springs, and cylinders, so ostentatiously exhibited to the admiring world, was merely a sham, substantial enough in appearance to fill up every portion of both chest and figure; but so contrived that it would collapse or expand to suit the exigencies of the hidden agent's various positions while the inside was shown. Thus, during the exhibition of one portion of the machinery, he was enabled to take refuge in another, sometimes in the body of the automaton, and at others in a portion of the chest. These changes were of course in obedience to preconcerted arrangement, and a few repetitions were sufficient to accustom him to the routine. While conducting a game, he sat at the bottom of the chest, with a small jagged chess board and waistcoat of the figure; others, that an illumination of every move was conveyed to him by the exhibitor; but upon reflection insuperable objections to both these theories were found, and the problem remained unsolved till M. Mourez himself furnished an account of all the mysteries connected with the Automaton. From him we learn that the chest-shaped figure was seated immediately under the chess board of the Automaton, and that the centre of this chess board, which formed part of the ceiling of his narrow cell, was an exact representation of the chess-board above, but to the side presented to the imprisoned player at every one of the sixty-four squares was suspended, by the finest silk, a tiny metallic ball. Now, as the chess men with which the Automaton played above had each of them a magnet inside, the moment any one of them was placed upon a square it attracted the little ball attached to the corresponding square below and fixed it to the board, so that, by the time the exhibitor had arranged all the men on the board, thirty-two (the number of the pieces) of the balls beneath would be drawn up close to the under chess-board, while the other thirty two would remain suspended. To illustrate this portion of the subject we will imagine the pieces duly arranged, and the game about to be opened by the Automaton. Looking up at the chess board on his little ceiling he sees by the thirty two balls drawn up that the men are properly placed on the board before the public, so, duly turning the handle which directs the arm of the figure, and putting in motion the springs by which its fingers act, he causes it to take up the piece intended to be played, and, watching the board on his ceiling at the same time, as the Automaton's fingers take up the piece, the corresponding ball to fall, as before described, and when this piece is placed on the destined square, he sees also the ball below it drawn up. Having completed his first move, and carefully repeated it on the small board in his lap, he sits anxiously awaiting the move of his opponent. Presently he sees one little ball fall and another rise; he makes the move thus indicated on his own board, and in this manner proceeds with the game to its conclusion.

This brief description of the once celebrated "AUTOMATON CHESS PLAYER" may not be unacceptable to the general reader, and for the amusement of Chess amateurs we append two games recently played by the Automaton in New York.

FOOT BALL AT RUGBY.

This truly English game is played in perfection at the fine Elizabethan school, at Rugby, in Warwickshire. Our artist has sketched a match, at the moment of a "skrummage;" the buildings in the background being the Chapel and part of the School house.

Foot-ball, a term used metonymy for the diversion of driving the ball itself, is mentioned by Fitzstephen, among the games of the Londoners, in the time of Henry II. Pepys, in his Memoirs, 1665, says, "January 2, to my Lord Brouncker's by appointment in the Piazza, Covent garden; the street full of foot balls, it being a great frost." About a century since too, matches of Foot ball were played in the Strand, where the Maypole streamer flaunted in the breeze.

Nevertheless, Foot ball was mostly played by "sturdie plowmen, lustie, strong, and bold," or, as the courtly Waller sings:—

> A sort of lusty shepherds try
> Their force at foot-ball, care of victory
> Sometimes, pease and horse-beans were put into the ball, a blown bladder; and then,
> It ratleth, soundeth, and shineth clear and sure;
> While it is thrown, and caste up in the ayre,
> Each one contendeth and hath a great desire
> Formerly, money was given at weddings for Foot-ball play; and, not many years since, it was customary, in the north of England, among the colliers, to watch the bridegroom coming out of church, after the ceremony, in order to demand money for a foot ball.
> Makes them salute so rudely breast to breast,
> That their encounter seems too rough for jest.
> With foote and with hande the bladder for to smite
> If it fall to the grounde, they lift it up anyone,
> And this wynneth the victory they count it no payne.

"THE ANDRIA" AT ST. PETER'S COLLEGE, WESTMINSTER.

We gave a brief notice of this classical and interesting perf rmance last week. It is curious to see the old fashion of Latin playacting survive in our own matter-of-fact times, when even the universities and colleges have left off the celebrations of the classics has almost disappeared. We cannot but think it is well such old-world customs should survive at our public schools. They form a link between the present and the past, and do much to perpetuate in England that conservative feeling which, as earnest advocates of progress, we wish to see active, in order to make progress safe and sure. Attrition is as necessary for advancement in politics as in medicine, and without such a healthful opinion we could no more get on in the one than we could without friction in the other.

Of the costume of the play we must speak in the highest terms. All was Greek, and correct. The whole Triumph was in character, and the groups of actors attitudes, while old Solus cringed his polished knees and chin and "played acting" admirably to the audience. We may except the Davus of Mr. Milman, which was rugged and significant enough. However, the enunciation was as distinct, the parts as perfectly committed to memory as ever.

The dialogue, with allusions to the railway mania, was taken by the audience in every point, and lost nothing in delivery at the hands of Davus, Pamphilus, and the other interlocutors.

We subjoin the Latin. In our columns of gossip will be found an English translation, with the Latin metre preserved and added by rhyme.

PROLOGUS IN ANDRIAM.

Salvete.—Prologum fortitus comœdiæ,

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE POST OFFICE ROBBERIES AT RUGBY.—Garratt, the young man employed at the post office, Roy, who was charged with stealing money from various letters, was re examined on Saturday last, and fully committed for trial on all the charges.

MONUMENT TO SOUTHEY AT BRISTOL.—A monument, the funds for which were raised by subscription, to the memory of Robert Southey, is now in course of erection in the north a le of Bristol Cathedral. It com-ists of a bust, executed in white marble by Baily, R.A., also a native of Bristol, in his best style, placed on a pedestal of Gothic design, which bears the following brief inscription "Robert Southey, born in Bristol, Oct. 4, 1774: died at Keswick, March 21, 1843."

ROMAN REMAINS AT COLCHESTER.—A Roman tesellated pavement of great, tabe extent, but without any variegated design, was discovered last week in a garden at Mile-end, Colchester, the property of Mr Bryant. Remains have also been discovered of Roman walls, and from portions of charcoal and other appearances it is supposed that the building originally must have been destroyed by fire. Portions of urns, the remains of human bones, and a coin in a fine state of preservation, have also been found. The latter bears on the obverse, "VRBS ROMA," with helmeted head; the reverse, Romulus and Remus with the wolf.

THE AGRICULTURISTS AND THE CORN LAWS.—Several meetings have been held in different parts of the country during the week, at which resolutions condemnatory of the Corn Laws were agreed to with great unanimity. Among them was a most important meeting of the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Wakefield. There have also been meetings of the advocates of the Corn Laws. At the Banbury cattle show on Monday, a Mr. Elman denounced Sir Robert Peel as "a renegade and a deserter from the ranks of the agriculturists." This opinion was received with "tremendous applause."

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The proceedings on Monday at the Repeal Association were interesting, because Mr. O'Connell gave his views upon the present state of affairs. The honourable and learned gentleman said—that we had arrived at a most important, a most critical period, of which no intense was his conviction, that he thought it right to double his subscription to the Repeal fund for himself and sons, and, therefore, instead of now banging in £5, the outlay he meant to transmit double that sum, namely, £10. (Cheers). He had now come to the business of the day. (Cheers). Is Repeal—(cheers,—no compromise—(cheers)—no postponement—no surrender. (Cheers). Come what may, we will struggle for Repeal. In this sentiment he had the coincidence of Mr. Smith O'Brien, and he would read a letter from him on the subject. [Here the learned gentleman read an epistle from his worthy colleague, dated from Cahermoyle, county Limerick.] Yes, Repeal and no compromise shall be our motto. Still he must look to the pressure of immediate circumstances. One-third of the potato crop was destroyed, and none could tell how much further the disease would go. Then how to live scarcely. Fish is invariably the case. In Waterford, Limerick, Dro heda, and Wexford, the fishing fever was actually prevalent. The agricultural labourers were on the verge of starvation. At Mullinavat (county Kilkenny), on his way to Waterford, he inquired the rate of wages of labourers, and found it was only 1s. 6d. a week. What did the Government do? Oh, they sent over a scientific commission! What a mockery! There were differences of opinion as to when the famine would commence. For his part, he thought it would commence so early as January. What the Government should have done was, to open the ports. But the Government was broken up, and what was it dissipated them? He attributed it to the interference of the Whig-elect Prime Minister. Hear, hear They could agree upon Coercion Bills, but they could not agree about feeding the people. What is to be our course then? Why, to join the Minister that will feed the people—to work with the people of England who seek for the abolition of the Corn laws (Hear, hear.) For his part, he would work with Cobden and Bright and Lord John Russell. Why should we not support the abolition of the Corn laws? Do these laws make wages high here? Certainly not. The Corn laws give a fictitious value to land. They were, to his mind, most abominable. He now proclaimed every man an enemy who did not support Cobden and Bright against the two-elect Prime Minister. Hear, hear They were for justice—for cheap food—for feeding the hungry. He was therefore at once for supporting the new Administration. Let them not think, however, that, in supporting the new Minister, he was compromising Repeal. No, while determined to fight by the side of Cobden and Bright for a bigloaf Administration, he had nothing in view but the best interests of the people of Ireland. (Cheers.)—The week's rent was announced to be £207 19s. 11d.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths during the week ending December 13, was 970, only eight more than during the previous week. The deaths from measles, bronchitis, and pneumonia, are still greatly above the average.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

In the month of December—and, as it were, on the threshold of another prosperous year—we are again enabled to make one of those joyous announcements to our readers, which are ever sources of pleasure to ourselves in the proportion in which their fulfilment tends to the profit and enjoyment of the Public, "for whom we live"—or, at least, of that portion of it with whom we are in weekly and friendly communion.

The perfect honesty of principle and purpose with which this Journal has continued its career, has maintained for it the undeviating confidence of those who placed reliance upon its early promise, and have had no reason to regret their trust. This is our boast; and it will be seen that we uphold our right to it.

It was in this spirit that—destined little to profit, but much to please—we prepared those magnificent commemorations of our early patronage, and afterwards confirmed prosperity—the GRAND VIEW OF LONDON—and superb PANORAMA OF THE THAMES—presented, at fitting intervals, to our readers.

It is in the same spirit that NOW—towards the close of our Seventh Volume, and at other year—with foot arm in the stirrup—gratitude inspiring, and confidence insured—we announce our intention to present our readers with Noble Presents, in appropriate form, and with the best genius and illustration that modern art can afford, and without a thought of expense,

MAGNIFICENT PICTURES
OF THE
PRINCIPAL CITIES OF EUROPE.

It is not more our determination that their production shall surprise all who receive them, than that the faithful illustrations themselves shall become so many records and monuments of what the good-will and hearty friendship of the public enabled the first Illustrated Newspaper in the Nineteenth Century to achieve. Edinburgh and Dublin put forth their sister cities with London, and we may well aspire to reflect on a grand scale the Chiefest Cities of Europe when not Europe, nor any territory short of the whole known world, is able to affix a limit to our circulation.

The minute details of our plan, in presenting these Magnificent Pictures to our Subscribers, will be immediately placed at their disposal. For the present, we are glad to believe that there is not one of them who will not feel confidence and pleasure in its plain ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Number of our Journal, with the Presentation Print, price 6d. No extra charge will be made. The first Print, a VIEW OF THE CITY OF DUBLIN, will be presented early in the ensuing year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"B."—In answer to our Correspondent and several other Subscribers, respecting the chance or legality of a Sham Lottery, put forward by an obscure society yourself, we have attended to offer one or two observations, to put thoughtless people on their guard against parting with their money. As to the plan of numbering receipts, and appearing to issue them to the public, how can it be supposed that a house can receive "a thousand" bona fide receipts, and, in case of any one of such receipts being the number entitled to a prize, of course the public would not know the actual position of the holder? From beginning to end, the whole is illegal, and no one claiming a prize could recover it. The whole is, therefore, "a delusion, a mockery, and a snare?"

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1845.

FORMATION OF THE NEW MINISTRY.

At the time we write, various reports are in circulation, but we forbear to notice them, in the belief that we shall, in a later impression, be enabled to give an authorized statement respecting the formation of a new Cabinet, about which such anxiety prevails.

In the meantime, we may state that, on Thursday morning, Lord John Russell arrived from Windsor, and forthwith a meeting of the leading Whigs took place at his Lordship's residence. This conference lasted a considerable time, and, at its conclusion, the Noble Lord went back to Windsor, and had an audience of Her Majesty, to submit the result of the conference. It is obvious that, until this was done, the decision of the Noble Lord upon the important matter under consideration could not be made public. We are in a position to communicate the particulars as soon as they can with propriety be allowed to transpire.

The Times of Wednesday mentioned a rumour that the post of Commander-in-Chief had been offered to Prince Albert, and states that it had obtained currency on Change. In our late edition of Saturday last we mentioned the report, which was then current at the West-end.

From the latest information, derived from the best sources, we can state positively that the new Administration is at length formed.

There is one question connected with the present state of political affairs which appears rather to be overlooked in the manifold speculations as to who is to be in and who is to remain out, though, to the country, it is of as much importance. If the present Parliament is dissolved in a few weeks after it is called together, what is to become of the six or seven hundred new Railway Bills awaiting its decision? How will these partly proceed with last session to be disposed of? By a special regulation the progress they had made in Committee at the time the session closed, was allowed to be reckoned in the next, and that they should be resumed at the point where the inquiries then closed. This might be done from one session to another of the same Parliament, but we know not how this Parliament can establish any regulation that would be binding on the new one that succeeds it. Without committing a breach of the Constitution we doubt if it is possible for it to make any such order. A new Parliament must begin de novo; thus, the progress made and interrupted last year will go for nothing, and the bills now lodged will make no progress at all. There is an absolute necessity that the Legislature should be called together as the earliest possible period in order to come to some decision on this question alone.

It requires but little reflection to perceive the excessive injury that this great and growing public interest will receive from this check, produced by political circumstances, with which, itself, has nothing to do. When Parliament meets, its attention will be engrossed by the great question on which the "to be or not to be" of parties depends. Private business will be of very secondary interest; whatever is done in it will rather be directed to clearing off the remanents from last session, than forwarding the new-born schemes. This, in the few weeks which political sears allot to the approaching session, will be but imperfectly accomplished: then comes the dissolution, and the consequent scattering of all parties to the winds, to gather themselves together again in new combinations. The election will take some weeks, and a new Legislature will meet again, with the same great public question before it to be set at rest; many of the members, it is not unnatural to suppose, will be new to that practical part of their duties which the experience of past sessions has so thoroughly impressed on the old ones. Then, unless the new Parliament sits unusually late into the next year, but little will be done, in proportion to the enormous mass of private business which is before them to do. All the augurs ill for the actual progress of Railway business in the ensuing year.

The energy and improving spirit of the country is thus checked and fettered by making them dependent on the changes and chances of political events. Questions of pure calculation, matters of practical and scientific enquiry, which base no claims on principle, are left floating on the capricious sea of politics, which sometimes, like the ocean itself, does indeed "ebb and flow by the moon." Should this be so, and could not the inconvenience be remedied?

The subject of enquiry before a Railway Committee is plain matter of fact; the necessity of a line between point and point, the amount of traffic, the difficulties to be surmounted, and the means of overcoming them, the comparative advantages and disadvantages of rival lines, are all matters of fact, detail, and figures, which could be as well decided whether a Parliament was sitting or not, or whether the Treasury Bench is occupied by the Whigs or the Conservatives. The confusion and embarrassment into which the greatest branch of national internal business will be thrown by the impending dissolution, will more strongly than ever press on the attention of the public a question more than once mooted before—whether it is not both desirable and possible to create some permanent tribunal for the preliminary investigation of railway undertakings.

The supreme power of our Legislature should be in all things upheld, or that body would sink in importance, and our constitutional system gradually degenerate into a weakness which might be abused even to the loss of national freedom. The Parliament then must remain the last grand court of appeal from all inferior and permanent bodies, and the source of the necessary powers to purchase, occupy, and construct. We should not wish to see one particle of its power in these respects taken from it. But from the irksome task of enquiring into traffic, gradients, and levels, the checking of accounts, and the examination of plans, it might wisely be saved to the great advantage of all parties. This work of preparation might be trusted to a Board, which should sit in permanence, combining its labours free from the interruptions of Ministerial "crises" and "difficulties." Composed of competent and scientific men, it would be more capable of selecting the best and most practicable lines than gentlemen chosen with little or no regard to their fitness for the task imposed on them. Sitting continuously, it would become thoroughly acquainted with the subject; as one body, it would act with more unity and a greater knowledge of the bearing of one scheme on all others, than the numerous little knots and parties into which the Legislature now divides itself. Give it the power to crush all bubble, fictitious, and useless lines in the bud, but compel it to make a clear and succinct report to Parliament of the lines it did elect upon, and the reasons for so acting, and no doubt can be entertained of the great advantages that would ensue. Other kinds of business have been deputed to Boards and Departments, which can act while the Parliament, by prorogation or dissolution, is in abeyance; and when we consider that the pending Railway Bills represent hundreds of millions of capital, and affect the traffic and communication of the whole empire, it is evident that some further, more certain, and permanent, but still subordinate power, must be created to dispose of them.

The only strong expression of opinion excited in France by the change in the English Ministry, is one adverse to the appointment of Lord Palmerston as a member of the new Cabinet. In all other respects, the break-up of the Conservative Government is regarded as a matter of little importance, but the nomination of Lord Palmerston to the Foreign Office is considered as unfavourable to the continuance of peace. The Eastern Question, and the Treaty of 1840 are not forgotten; and as our Minister of Foreign Affairs did then, for a time, take a position independent of France, and caused a passing excitement which took a warlike tendency, his coming into office again is looked upon as ominous of war. But, though our policy at that time was one independent and exclusive of France, we must deny that it was hostile to that country or its interests. The integrity of the Turkish Empire was threatened by the revolt of a rebellious Pacha; the Powers of Europe were bound to interfere to maintain that tottering State, which has long been unable to maintain itself. France was invited to join in that interference, and, on her refusal, what would have been done with her, was effected without her; mais tout. In does not appear that the unique interest of France, either territorial or commercial, was injured. But the nation is, perhaps, more susceptible of an apparent slight to its dignity, than of a real blow to its material welfare, and the journals raised a war-cry, which, if it failed to involve Europe in a war, was rather to be attributed to the good sense of the people, than the moderation of their leaders. A remnant of the feeling remains; because Lord Palmerston has been once charged with the isolation of leading France, it is taken for granted that his whole foreign policy (if he gets into office) will involve a series of insults to that country. But any Minister who should exhibit the least tendency to indulge such a disposition, would immediately lose confidence and support. There is no war party in England; we have for many years turned our attention almost exclusively to commercial questions: when the mind of a people takes this direction, war becomes more than ever repugnant to its inclination. Without a war party in the country, a war Ministry in power is an impossibility. Our ambition is to weave and spin, and manufacture for the world; and it would be a strange inconsistency of us to harbour a desire of shooting our customers. The Paris journals may magnify Lord Palmerston into a sort of bugbear, but the tendency of public opinion in England compels him to be a conservative of the peace of all nations. We suspect, however, it was more the manner in which the late—perhaps, we should say, the present—Secretary for Foreign Affairs did a certain act, than the act itself, which excited the anger of our brethren across the Channel; thrice, within the last few days, we have seen the National quoting a passage from some alleged speech of Lord Palmerston's, to the effect that he would make the French Government "go through the eye of a needle." What is meant by it we cannot fathom; nor does our memory of past debates recall any such expression. Does it shadow out a Scriptural allusion, perverted by translation? Was it used as a threat, or to deplore a great impossibility? We know not, and we fear Hansard would not assist us; but, whatever it was, it gave great offence, and has been long remembered; for we not only see it often alluded to by the French press, but have heard it denounced as an insult by Frenchmen in society. We should like to see it cleared up; there is some mistake at the bottom of it, for such decided language appears anything but diplomatic; and Palmerston is too adroit in Ministerial practice to commit the very unofficial blunder of letting his words betray his feelings.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE NEW WHIG MINISTRY.

Some of our contemporaries publish lists of the new Ministry; but as we know that all the arrangements are not finally settled, we decline to copy them. At the same time we are enabled to state that the names will include nearly the whole of the members of the last Whig Administration, although some of the leading appointments will be differently distributed. Lord John Russell held a long conference with his official friends in Chesham-place yesterday, and it is probable that a perfect list of the new Ministry will shortly appear in an extraordinary Gazette. At all events we hope to be able to present it to our readers in the course of this day (Saturday). We have made arrangements to gratify the public curiosity with the least possible delay.

DEATH OF LORD WHARNCLIFFE.

We regret to learn that Lord Wharncliffe, late Lord President of the Council, expired at his residence in Curzon-street, at half-past ten o'clock yesterday (Friday) morning.

The deceased Lord was born in October, 1776. He married, the 30th of March, 1799, Elizabeth Caroline Mary, daughter of John, first Earl of Erne, by whom he had issue: the Hon. John Stuart Wortley, M.P. for the West Riding of Yorkshire; Charles Stuart Wortley; James Archibald Stuart Wortley, M.P. for the county of Bute; and Caroline Jane Wortley. The deceased Lord represented the county of York for several years in Parliament, and obtained his Peerage by patent on the 13th of July, 1826. A vacancy is thus created in the representation of the West Riding of Yorkshire, the Hon. John Stuart Wortley being called to the House of Lords by the title of Lord Wharncliffe

Woodstock Election.—Lord Alfred Churchill, second son of the Duke of Marlborough, was on Thursday morning elected without opposition for Woodstock, in the room of Lord Lodlow, who has been raised to the peerage by the death of the Marquis of Ely.

Explosion in Staffordshire.—An explosion of a steam engine boiler, attended with loss of life, injury to 16 or 17 persons, and considerable damage to property, took place at a colliery belonging to Messrs. G. C. Thorneycroft and Co., near Wilenhall, on Monday last. Mr. Thorneycroft was badly scalded and bruised; Edward Hood, engineer, was killed, and John Reece, engineer, had his legs broken. All the persons injured are going on favourably.

Fire at Wandsworth.—On Thursday morning, shortly before one o'clock, a fire broke out upon the extensive premises of Mr. R. Bell, sawmill proprietor, and lucifer match manufacturer, situate in Garrett-lane, Wandsworth. It originated in the saw mill department, a building 70 feet long by 40 wide. By five o'clock the contents of the place in which the fire began was destroyed and the building nearly consumed. Several of the adjoining premises are also severely damaged. The cause of the fire is unknown. Mr. Bell was unassured for stock, but the buildings were insured in the County Fire Office

The late Murder in Lambeth.—A subscription has been entered into on behalf of the widow and family of the unfortunate man Fitzgerald, who are left entirely destitute by the melancholy bereavement.

Atrocious Barbarous Murder in Ireland.—The south riding of Tipperary has become the scene of a blood stained and cruel murder. The victim in this instance is Mr. Charles Acheson, formerly a respectable and extensive hardware dealer in Clonmel, but being unfortunate in business, was obliged to take a situation as clerk in the employment of Messrs. John Stein and Co., the distillers, at Marsfield. He went into Clonmel on Monday evening, and delayed some time at the house of Mr. M'Gloin, town clerk, which he left about nine o'clock, and was accompanied by Mr. Gibson as far as the Union workhouse, where he bade him good night, when the unfortunate man proceeded on his way home. He was waylaid in a limestone part of the road near Birdhill, and within forty perches of his own house, and beaten with stones in the head and breast in a most frightful manner; the eyeballs were driven from their sockets, and his brains dashed about the road. The lifeless body was found next morning in the horrible manner above described. The only cause that can be assigned for this horrible murder is, that Mr. Acheson discharged three men from the distillery last week for misconduct.

Murder at Jersey.—There has been a murder at Jersey, which has excited a great sensation in the Channel Islands. The name of the victim is Thomas Hodge, the name of the murderer John Noon, both seamen. It appears that the individual who has thus fallen a victim to brutal violence had formerly been a sailor belonging to a vessel in a trade between the port of Jersey and Newfoundland. About three weeks ago he arrived in St. Helier's from the latter place, and took up his lodgings in Munster Street, generally frequented by the better class of seamen. He was universally respected as a quiet, orderly individual. On Wednesday, the 10th instant, being the anniversary of his birthday, he treated his friends to an entertainment in the house in which he resided. In return for the compliment, his fellow lodgers, being just on the eve of departure for a distant port, invited him on the evening of the following Saturday to a farewell entertainment in the house at which they had all mutually taken up their residence. The hour of ten had arrived, and the whole party were quietly seated at supper, when the individual who is at present the unhappy object of atrocious charge of wickedly depriving a fellow creature of his life, intruded upon their innocent hilarity. Seating himself down in the midst of the company, he forthwith began to use bad language. At last his conduct seems to have proceeded beyond all further endurance, and the landlord of the house was obliged to rebuke him for his unmanly behaviour in the company of females. Noon still continued his oaths and imprecations as before. All efforts proving unavailing, it was at length found necessary to remove him from the apartment. The deceased, with the view of seeing that no harm should result to the individual, volunteered to accompany him on board his vessel, where he was to take up his quarters for the night. Hodge had only proceeded a few steps upon his way, and was descending a flight of steps which led from the door of the house to the court below, when the murderer was observed to draw from his pocket a large knife. Before, however, the murderous instrument reached the spot at which it was evidently intended to be struck, it fell upon the assailant's hands; but lastly stooping to the ground, it was in a moment plunged into the thigh of the individual who, regardless of incohvenience, had so willingly volunteered to do an act of kindness. The unfortunate victim still survived for a short space of time, and in three minutes from the receiving the fatal stab of the assassin, he had breathed his last. The assassin has been arrested Fearful and Extraordinary Occurrence at Forfar.—About 10 o'clock on the forenoon of Wednesday (last week), the whole community near Forfar were thrown into a state of extreme excitement by a report that William Brown and William M'Leish, two labourers, had been precipitated through a seam of wood which was lying across his breast, and thus got himself relieved. Throughout Thursday Brown's spirits continued to rally, while those of M'Leish, from the pain of his injuries, fell somewhat. Brown, in the forenoon, encouraged him Abernyte cane, and still they had to penetrate further down, into they got as low down as Brown. The workmen, after much trouble, were enabled to communicate freely with Brown, who was at a depth of about 40 feet, by means of a tunnel between the two excavations; but being so closely wedged in by the fallen rubbish, he was unable to avail himself of that means of escape. At this critical juncture his cousin Brown passed through the tunnel, and, at the risk of being precipitated to the bottom of the well, reached him from his perilous situation. He is now considered out of danger. Great anxiety was now manifested for the extrication of his unfortunate companion, M'Leish. On Sunday night it was determined to make another attempt to save the unfortunate man M'Leish, by beginning at the top of the well, and to renew the blasting at all the way down to where he was, but all their efforts were unavailing. M'Leish existed in his awful situation about half past eight next morning (Monday). Early in the morning he appeared to be in good spirits, although much more pressed than before the rubbish slipped down with him.

SNAP-DRAGON. (A CHRISTMAS SCENE.) BY WILLIAM HARVEY.

DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

"BRINGING IN CHRISTMAS."

"A merry Christmas! and a happy New Year! I'm very glad to see you."

The pair of noble pictures upon the preceding pages—by two of the master pencils of this graphic age—require but a brief literary illustration. Perhaps, they tell their own national story. We say national, for the common memorials of Christmas in th s country is peculiar, and exclusively its own. Bear the evidence of a contemporary, in a passage which has been, as it were, the epigraph of our Artists' "Bringing in Christmas:"—

"Of the 'high days of the Calendar,' Christmas was always the one which held the chief place in England, where it was celebr ted in a manner so different from what was customary in other countries, as to excite the astonishment of foreigners. As soon as the Christmas holidays had arrived, work and care were universally thrown aside; and instead of devotional practices, by which other countries commemorated the sacred occasion, E gland rang from one end to the other with mirth and jovi lity. Christmas Carols were trolled in every street; masquerades and plays took possession of houses and churches indifferently; a lord of misrule, whose reign lasted from All Hallow Eve till the day after the Feast of Pentecost, was elected in every noble household to preside over the sports and follories of the inmates, while each member prepared himself either to enact some strange character, or to devise some new stroke of mirth. The towns, on these occasions, assumed a sylvan appearance; and houses were dressed with branches of ivy and holly; the churches were converted into leafy tabernacles; and standards be cked with evergreens were set up in the streets, while the young of both sexes paraded around them."

No description, however, can give us an idea so vivid of the reign of this madcap potentate, and the character of an English Christmas, as the following sketch, in which the bile of Stubbs rises into absolute eloquence:—

"First, all the wild heads of the parish, conventic g together, chuse them a grand captain (of mischief), whom they ennoble with the title of my Lord of Misrule, and him they crown with great solemnity, and adopt for their king. This king anointed chuseth for him twenty, forty, three score, or a hundred lusty guts, like to him self, to wait upon his lordly majesty, and to guard his noble person. Then, every one of these his nobles he inve ts with his liveries of green, yellow or some other wanton colour. And as the ught that were not gaudy enough, they bedeck themselves with scarfs, ribb ns, and laces, hanged all over with gold rings, precious stones, and other jewels, this done they tie about either eg twenty or forty bells, with rich handkercl efs in the r hands, and sometimes laid across over their shoulders and necks, borrowed for the most part of their party of pretty Mopsies and loving Bessies for bussing them in the dark."

Our Artist has grouped the most characteristic celebrities of the season. High above the merrie band hangs the evergreen. The stern rages without, but not to chill the Mummers and Minstrels, with their ludicrous frolics, not forgetting the Hobby horse Dance:—

We are come over the Mire and Moss;	A Dragon you shall see,
We came all on Hobby horse;	And a wild man there to be.

Then we have the Loving Cup, borrowed from the Wassail-Bowl, though the latter was carried about with an image of Our Saviour. Nor is the huge Yule Log forgotten—to light up "the lood festivity of mirth."

OLD ENGLISH CHRISTMAS.

(See the Engravings.)

While young and old, and grave and gay,
Have all put off modern way
Of making "Christmas Mame;"
Come let us see, how full of glee
The jolly Monsers used to be
All in the Olden Time!

His fun and frolic, by your leave,
We're full as bright on Christmas Eve
As ever was by me!
He used to have his bowl, I ween,
And quaff his toast of "Death to Spleen"
Beneath the kissing bough!

He used—, but mercy on our rhyme!
Here is his Majesty sub me,
By all the hog-chold n own
As jolly Christmas—and, ere I see
They clear him, like a new M.P.,
In triumph to his throne.

Ay, thus it was the ancient way,
For every home on Christmas Day,
To have its proper King;
They drew'd his bowl, they rear'd his throne,
T'e rigg'd a Christmas of their own,
And made him dance a d sing.

And so they bore him hand in hand,
The Bacchus of their merry band,
With cup, and crown, and bough,
And made him drink, and laugh—ho! ho!
Beneath the kissing mistletoe—
Even as we see him now!

Look out! Look out! Beyond the door
The white snow driveth m re and more—
The moon rides through the cloud!
But there are warm hearth's earth her light,
And though it be a winter night,
Their mirth shall yet be loud!

Look in! Look in! the sports begin,
Now listen to the merry din,
What gleeful voices sing
Their well-dressed Christmas on his way;
Arch Pre-ident of all their play,
And in their homestead, King!

Maiden and yeoman—ripe for kisses—
Together bear this king of blisses,
With mistletoe in hand.
The Wassail Bowl is borne before,
The huge Yule Log is on the floor,
The blaze is near at hand.

But ere he reach his throne, I vow!
Well placed and velvet-cushioned now,
They make him pause beneath the bough,
With bacon full in view!
There must he pledge a cup of joy
To chubby little Cupid boy
("Love, life, and youth, without alloy"),
The pet of all their band.

Fair lovels women round him group,
And reverend age that still can stoop
To mix in childish mirth;
And lusty boys, who proudly bear
The bowl in which he drowns his care—
That mighty Christmas river there,
Enough to drown the earth.

Now let him on his throne alight,
He's brought us all a jovial night;
Of old it was a pleasant sight,
To see him brisk and m.e.low!
But whether in the days we've sung,
Or modern moments, old or young,
CHRISTMAS is ev'ry where the king
To be a Rare Old Fellow!

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Lord John Russell and the Marquis of Lansdowne, who arrived at the Castle last evening, at a few minutes past ten o'clock, took their departure this morning for Bhomley, and proceeded on the Basingstoke to Fadd ington, by the train which left at ten minutes before eleven o'clock. Lord John and the noble Marquis were elected with her Majesty for upwards of half an hour previously to their departure from the Castle. In consequence of the extremely unfavourable nature of the weather, her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Infant Royal Family, have been prevented from taking their accustomed airings. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this afternoon. A special messenger arrived at the Castle this afternoon with despatches from Lord John Russell. The Royal dinner party this evening included the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Spaeth, and Lady Fanny Howard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—We are happy to say that the Lord Chancellor is considerably improved in health since the departure

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE BISHOP OF JERUSALEM.

Michael Solomon Alexander, D.D., Bishop of the United Church of England and Ireland in Jerusalem, died on the 23rd ult., near Balbeis, on his way across the Desert from Syria to Cairo. This learned divine, by birth a Jew, became a convert to Christianity, and, being a man of great erudition, was appointed Professor of Hebrew and Rabbinical Literature in King's College, where he gained such high esteem and reputation that, upon the foundation of the Bishopric of Jerusalem, he was selected by the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. M'Call having declined the office) to preside over the Anglican Church of the Holy Land, and consecrated Bishop of Jerusalem in 1841. The disease to which his Lordship has fallen a victim is stated to have been either apoplexy or ossification of the heart, and the fatal result seems to have been accelerated by the fatigues of travelling. At the time of his death Dr. Alexander was on his way to England, accompanied by his wife and daughter; but his constitution sank under the exertion of the journey. His remains were brought to Alexandria for interment. The next presentation to the Bishopric of Jerusalem vests in the King of Prussia.

THE CATHOLIC BISHOP OF OSSORY.

The Right Rev. William Kinsella, D.D., the respected Bishop of Ossory, died suddenly, on Friday, the 12th inst. He's health had been for a length of time declining, but the melancholy event we record, came unexpectedly on his Lordship's friends. This venerable Prelate was consecrated 26th July, 1829; and has since fulfilled his sacred duties with the respect and esteem of all parties. His last public act was the affixing of his signature to the renewed protest of the Irish Hierarchy against the College Bill.

SIR LAWRENCE JONES, BART.

The Smyrna paper, the Impartial, gives the following details of the murder of this youthful Baronet.—"On the 6th November last, at two o'clock in the afternoon, two English gentlemen, Sir Lawrence Jones, Bart., and Captain Twopenny, late Macri for Smyrna: they were accompanied by a Greek dragoman of the name of Nicoli, and also three conductors. On the night of the same day they all slept at Karghi, and the next, at 12 o'clock, they found themselves at the foot of the mountain called Khassils Bel, where they stopped to breakfast. During this repast, one of the conductors ran secretly to the dragoman that two or three Zhybecks were at a distance in front, but as he, in a short time, lost sight of them, the voyagers were undisturbed, and their route was continued. But they had not proceeded more than ten minutes another journey, when they were suddenly assailed by a warm fire of musketry from behind one of the rocks of the mountain. Sir Lawrence Jones fell dead, as well as the Greek, Nicoli, by this fatal discharge, and Captain Twopenny, who was grievously wounded, miraculously escaped."

Sir Lawrence Jones, who had not quite completed his twenty-ninth year, was eldest son of the late General Sir John Thomas Jones, of Cranmer Hall, Norfolk, who, after a long course of active and confidential service, as an officer in the Royal Engineers, was created a Baronet in 1831, and died in 1843. Sir Sir Lawrence never married, the title devolves on his brother—now Sir Willoughby Jones, Bart.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The following is an extract of a letter from Naples, dated Dec. 1:—"The Emperor of Russia is expected here for a few days at the end of the week, when a grand review is to take place, besides various other fêtes. The beggars and pickpockets are all in prison, to be carefully kept there till the Emperor's visit is over. Potatoes are now shipping here for Ireland, as also wheat for England, in considerable quantities."

A letter from Dresden states that M. André Seizler, chapel-master at the cathedral of Zchopau, in Saxony, has just discovered, at the town of Pisek, in Bohemia, an autograph paper of Mozart, containing the notes of some couplets composed for the baptism of his son Charles, lately deceased, at Gratz, in Styria. This morceau is shortly to be published at Bonn, in the "Album of Beethoven."

The Turkish Government has issued circulars prohibiting the exportation of corn from Roumelia, after the expiration of a month, on the pretext of the great scarcity that exists throughout the empire, but especially in Syria.

The Levant Mail brings an account from Smyrna of the murder of Sir Lawrence Jones, by brigands, apparently Albanians. A Greek servant was killed by his side, and Captain Twopeny, who had left Macri with him for Smyrna, was also severely wounded by the brigands, who fired at them from an ambush. Greece was comparatively tranquil.

A letter from Alexandria of the 30th ult., states that the Pacha was entirely engrossed with the preparations for the marriage of his daughter, which was to take place on the 15th of the present moon; 20,000 spoons had been purchased at Alexandria for the pilaus to be given to the poor. All kinds of amusements were to take place on the occasion. The Pacha was much flattered by the reception given to his son in Italy. It was said that he had forbidden him to visit Rome, to avoid any remarks that might be made at Constantinople respecting such a visit. At Gibaishit, near Tripoli, in Syria, the Ottoman troops wishing to force the inhabitants to deliver up their arms, a revolt had taken place, and 900 of the Turkish troops had been massacred.

On Tuesday week the Antwerp Theatre took fire, and would in all probability have been reduced to ashes, had it not been for the prompt assistance of the firemen, who exerted themselves with unusual zeal. The fire was soon extinguished after having done but slight damage.

The Frankfort Journal publishes accounts from Berlin of the 7th inst. The conspiracy was occupied in investigating a conspiracy which was said to have been discovered. A private letter had been addressed to an advocate with the King, and had made certain important revelations to his Majesty. It is said that this soldier had been obliged to swear that he would not reveal to mortal but the King himself the secrets intrusted to him by an unknown individual. The King is said to have been greatly affected. The whole affair is enveloped in the most profound mystery.

The private letters from America anticipate a much less hostile message from the President than had been looked for; and it is believed that far more good temper will be shown than had been calculated upon a few days back.

The new breakwater at Harwich is expected to be commenced in a very short time. A contract for 50,000 tons of Kentish ragstone has been already made.

A letter from Osnabruck, in Hanover, of the 9th inst., says:—"Father Mathew, of Ireland, has found an emulator in M. Marc Christian Frederick Seiling, a Lutheran minister of our town. This venerable man has just returned from a tour through the province of Hildesheim, in the fifty towns of which he has received pledges from about 20,000 persons, of both sexes and all ages, to abstain entirely from drinking spirituous liquors. During this two years and a half that M. Seiling has been engaged in this pious work, he has procured for the different temperance societies in Germany, 83,582 members, of whom 25,141 are men, 27,770 women, and 29,741 young persons of both sexes, of from 12 to 21 years of age."

We learn by accounts from Dresden of the 12th, that the Saxon Chambers had, after an animated debate passed a resolution for the adoption of open trials by public instead of secret and written testimony in criminal trials. In pursuance of this resolution, Government will be invited to present next session a law affirmatory of the principle of oral testimony. A proposition for the introduction of trial by jury was also agreed to be postponed.

A letter from Lansanne, of the 11th, says:—"It is currently reported that the Conservatives would attempt on Sunday an attack against the Government, arms were secretly brought from the arsenal of Morges, and placed in several houses of the town. In the night a band of Radicals seized on the cannon destined for the exercise of the college. A sharp struggle ensued, in several persons were wounded. In the morning the place was covered with blood."

Letters from Bologna, in the Mannheim Gazette, state that a suspicious looking vessel, under the Greek flag, has lately been several times seen in that quarter, and it is supposed, was fitted out at Malta, to make a descent on the States of the Church. A rumour had been circulated in various towns along the coast that a fresh landing was intended by the Italian refugees, but it appears that the strict surveillance kept up by the vessels of the Pontifical Government has prevented its taking place.

The Augsburg Gazette publishes accounts from Constantinople of the 26th ult., which announce that, in consequence of the bad harvest, the export of corn from the ports of Varna and Kodosto had been prohibited, to commence from the 25th of December next.

A letter from Hanover, of the 8th, states that the Prince Royal has been indisposed for some time, but not so seriously as some of the journals had represented. His Royal Highness is now convalescent, and is able to take out door exercise.

We have accounts from the Cape of Good Hope to the 22nd of October. They state that landed property in the eastern province had very decidedly increased in value within the last twelve months, several Dutch farmers having paid an advance of 25 to 50 per cent. for estates. The Natal colonists were pleased at their intended annexation to the Cape Government. A slight shock of earthquake had been experienced at Pietermaritzburgh. The thieving propensities of the Kafirs in the neighbourhood of this latter village were complained of as much almost as on the frontier of the old colony.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Fair average supplies of English wheat have come to hand during the present week, and the stands to day were well filled with samples: but their active disposal on Monday the demand was in a very languid manner, at prices barely equal to those obtained on Monday last. In free foreign, as well as bonded wheat, but little was passing, and the quotations were almost nominal. The finest malting barley was quite as dear, but all other kinds were a dull inquiry, and rates from lower to 2s per qr. was in short supply, and being retailed slowly at late rates. The show of oats was not large. The best qualities sold at full currencies. In other kinds very little was doing. Beans and peas might have been purchased on easier terms. The flour trade was very dull, the highest price of the best town-mad[illegible] 47s per 280 lb.

English wheat, 3,850 barley, 36,010; oats, 7,960; rye, —; wheat, —; barley —; oats, —; beans, —; wheat, 1,230; barley, 1,970; oats, —; 31 quarters. Flour, 5,060 sacks.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 51s to 52s, ditto, white, 56s to 57s. Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 51s to 52s, ditto, white, 56s to 58s; fine, 59s to 60s; grinding barley, 30s to 32s, distilling ditto, 34s to 35s; malting ditto, 36s to 38s; rye, 34s to 36s; mixed ditto, 32s to 34s; brown ditto, 30s to 32s. Kingston and Ware, 56s to 60s. Chevalier, 62s to 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feeding, 30s to 32s, potatoe ditto, 36s to 38s; Tweed and Cork, black, 28s to 30s, ditto, white, 32s to 34s. Black beans, new, 32s to 34s, ditto, old, 37s to 40s; grey peas, 35s to 37s; maple, 37s to 39s; white, 41s to 43s; boilers, 40s to 44s, per quarter. Town-made flour [illegible] to 47s per 280 lbs. Stockton, and Yorkshire, 39s to 41s, per 240 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, [illegible] to 60s; fine, 62s to 64s. In Bond—Barley, 25s to 27s; beans, new, [illegible] ditto, 26s to 28s; beans, 42s to 44s; peas, 41s to 43s; per quarter. Flour, American, 35s to 36s; Spanish, 34s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed still continues to move off, at full prices; but all other articles remain very inactive.

Linseed, English, sowing, 46s to 52s; Baltic, crushing, 46s to 50s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 47s. Rapeseed, 34s to 40s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 19s, per cwt. Canaryseed, 46s to 48s per qr. Mustard seed, 5s to 8s; white ditto, 12s to 18s. Tares, 3s 6d to 5s 6d, per bushel. English, foreign, 40s to 42s, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 4l 15s to 5l 5s; ditto foreign, 4l 5s to 4l 15s per 1000 pounds; coarse cakes, 4l 0s to 4l 5s, per ton. Canary, 54s to 58s, per quarter. English Clover seed, red, 45s to 59s; extra, 52s to 56s; white 60s to 62s; extra up to 65s. Trefoil, red, 6s to 8s; extra, 10s; white, 10s to 12s; extra, 14s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 8d to 9½d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 55s 6d; barley, 32s 9d; oats, 24s 6d; rye, 36s 1d; beans, 40s 8s; peas, 41s 6d.

Six Weeks' Averages.—Wheat, 55s 9d; barley, 31s 9d; oats, 24s 2d; rye, 36s 4d; beans, 40s 3d; peas, 41s 9d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 14s; barley 8s; oats, 3s; rye, 6s6d; beans, 1s; peas, 1s 6d.

Sugar.—On the whole, rather more business has been doing in West India sugars since our last, and in the refining kinds, a rising influence exists in the market. Of 1,500 hhds. of this description of sugar, 1,000 hhds. have sold at an early advance. Refined goods are dull, at 42s to 43s 6d for brown, and 44s to 45s per cwt. for common lumps.

Coffee.—In the market very little business has been transacted. Good ordinary Ceylons, 41s to 44s; and ordinary native Javas, 42s to 43s per cwt.

Rice.—Nearly all descriptions of rice have declined in value, from 1s to 1s 6d per cwt. with a fair demand.

Provisions.—The best qualities of Dutch butter move off freely, at 106s to 112s per cwt. while Irish is in good request, at 96s to 98s. Inferior sorts are unaltered. Fine butter dull, at 80s to 86s per cwt. Hams, 58s to 62s for Westphalia, and 56s to 58s for Yorkshire. Lard, 48s to 50s per cwt. Bacon, 52s to 56s for Waterford, 56s to 58s for Limerick, and 54s to 56s for Londonderry. Irish beef nearly steady, at 110s to 120s per drum for fresh, and 60s to 68s per firkin for Cork. Bacon hams, 80s to 90s per cwt. Pork, 60s to 70s per barrel for Irish, and 70s to 80s for mess. Limerick, middle, 62s to 66s; and fancy, 68s per cwt. The best Irish hams support previous rates; but the inferior kinds of provisions are a slow inquiry.

Tea.—This article may be considered steady, at 2d to 3d per lb. for P. Y. C. on the spot. For delivery, several lots of common have been entered into, at 2½d per lb. Much more will be done in Congou, at 2½d to 3d for Pekoe, and Moyun Congou, at 3d to 3½d per lb.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, 45s to 80s; old do., 60s to 90s; clover ditto, 70s to 85s; old straw 25s to 30s; wheat straw, 26s to 30s; new ditto, 18s to 24s per load.

Seeds.—Linseed (Friday).—Our market still remains in a very languid state for all kinds of hops the supply of which on offer is by no means large, yet prices rule about stationary. New Hops: Kent pockets, 46s to 80s; Weald of Kent ditto, 40s to 80s; Sussex ditto, 40s to 75s; Mid. Counties ditto, 70s to 90s; Yearlings, Sussex pockets, 40s to 46s; Wealds, 42s to 50s per cwt.

Seeds (Friday).—Our market still remains in a very dull state for all kinds of hops the supply of which on offer is by no means large, yet prices rule about stationary. New Hops: Kent pockets, 46s to 80s; Weald of Kent ditto, 40s to 80s; Sussex ditto, 40s to 75s; Mid. Counties ditto, 70s to 90s; Yearlings, Sussex pockets, 40s to 46s; Wealds, 42s to 50s per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Stanley, 18s 3d; Killingworth, 16s 6d; Stewart's, 17s 3; Lambton, 17s; Hetton, 17s.; and Adelaide, 17s per ton.

Potatoes.—The best qualities move off freely, at 80s to 120s per ton; but other parcels are s[illegible]

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts on sale here, to-day, being large, even the time of year considered, the beef trade ruled very quiet, at a decline on Monday's quote[illegible] of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. There were on offer 70 oxen and cows, imported with 770 sheep and lambs, from Holland. The sale of sheep was moderate, while the mutton trade was steady, at unaltered currencies. The supply of calves being rather limited, the veal trade was steady, at full prices. The inquiry for real good qualities of stock was heavy, at a decline in value of 2d per 8lbs. The pork trade was firm, at previous rates. Much more was sold in town, at 4d to 6d per stone. Per 8lbs. to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime large ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Scots, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; large coarse calves, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; first-rate small porkers, 4s 8d to 5s 0d. Sucking calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter-old store pigs, 18s to 22s each. Beasts, 1,626; cows, 125; sheep, 7,080; calves, 68; pigs, 450.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—There was a steady general demand at full prices.

Per 8lbs. by the carcase.—Inferior beef, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime large ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; large pork, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 10d; small pork, 4s 10d to 5s 4d.

ROBT. HUDSON.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The still pending question of who will carry the repeal of the Corn-laws is the exciting topic of commercial circles. It is generally considered probable that if Lord John Russell cannot form office, he will be willing to open the ports, and thus provide for the approaching scarcity before it actually arrives. Such a measure would necessarily affect the price of the Funds, and in the anticipation continues to depress the Consols for the account, under the impression that would compel a free importation of foreign grain, would also prove the ex istence of a considerable scarcity at home. Large purchases must be therefore necessary, and as it must be done at a time when the Bank will be in ordinary channels of exchange cannot be rendered available in paying for it. Gold must be, consequently, the only medium of discharging the debt, and for every five sovereigns exported, the greatest diminution in the Bank of England's withdrawal from circulation of a note of equal value. The circulation of the Bank of England will, therefore, be contracted by as much as the amount of money paid for foreign grain, which will be required, from not having its requisite accommodation, and the rebarding, if not ultimate withdrawal of many of the bona fide railway schemes will inevitably result. This could not create a panic, but would be an arrest of merchandise like any other production, either by total repeal or a small fixed duty. From these causes Consols advanced a point on Monday, strong doubts existing of Lord John Russell's ability to form a Government, and the chance of the ports being opened diminishing in consequence. The closing price of Money was 9¼ to ⅜, having been done at the higher quotation. On Tuesday the business was very limited

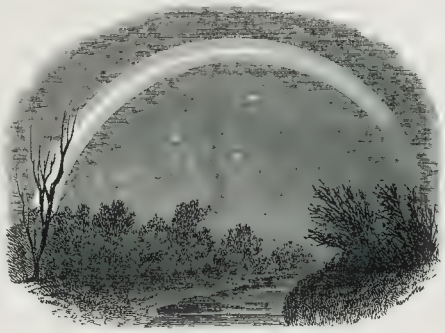
LUNAR RAINBOW.

(From a Correspondent.)

Not finding any mention of a very beautiful Lunar Rainbow observed near Northwich, Cheshire, on the 3rd inst., in your last week's paper, I venture to enclose a slight sketch as it appeared, about half-past eight on that evening. The afternoon had been very stormy, thunder and lightning, accompanied by heavy showers of rain and hail; but, as evening approached, the rain was less frequent, and at the time I name, the sky was clear and starlight—the moon much obscured by a cloud and near the horizon, but affording sufficient light to form the perfect arch. I have tried to represent the delicate shadowy whiteness that floated over star and cloud while scarcely obscuring them. Jupiter shining brightly above the constellation of Orion, was at first under the centre of the bow; but, during the half-hour of the duration of the phenomenon, several changes took place in its appearance; sometimes fading nearly away, then rising again with fresh brilliancy, till it seemed to divide into two arches, so much flattened at the top as to cover Jupiter; when, finally, this interesting object disappeared.



LUNAR RAINBOW.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE BEDFORD AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.

On Saturday last, the works of the Bedford and Birmingham Railway were commenced at about the centre of the line. The spot appointed for turning the first turf was that portion of Brogborough Hill, about four miles from Woburn. At about two o'clock, a large concourse of people had gathered here from Bedford, Woburn, Ampthill, and the surrounding villages; and a profusion of flags and standards were planted along the lands in the direction of the proposed line. A carriage and four with postillions in scarlet livery, arrived, and it was then announced that the Duke of Bedford, who had arranged to turn the first turf, could not do so, in consequence of his Grace having been suddenly, summoned to London to meet Lord John Russell. In order, however that there might be no delay in the proceedings, the Duchess of Bedford consented to officiate for the Duke, and Lord Alford attended to assist her. Her Grace was conducted to the site of the proposed works, where she was welcomed by the Directors of the Bedford Railway, Mr. Theed Pearse, the secretary, the deputations of the London and Birmingham, and the Eastern Counties lines, Mr. Scott, the engineer, Messrs. Grissell, Peto, and Jackson, the contractors, and a large party, composed principally of the county families and clergy. Her Grace's arrival was announced by a salute of cannon, which was followed by three cheers from the assembly, and a band of music struck up as her Grace was conducted along the temporary platform.

Mr. T. J. Green, of Bedford, the Chairman of the Directors, then explained to the Duchess the line of railway, and invited her Grace to do honour to the proceedings by commencing the works, and handed her the spade. The Duchess curtseyed, and, taking the spade, pressed it into the earth. Lord Alford then took the spade, and, having addressed the company, his Lordship then took off his hat and great coat, and began digging the clay most diligently, until he had filled the barrow, amidst loud cheers. Having filled the barrow, he wheeled it away along the platform, and led the way to a splendid marquee. The cannons were again fired off, flags waved, and the National Anthem was played. On arriving at the marquee, his Lordship emptied his barrow, and then deposited it, together with the spade, at one end of the tent. The barrow was made of beautifully grained oak, grown on the Woburn estate, richly carved and polished. On the front the arms of the Duke of Bedford are carved in a very elaborate style, and beneath them is a silver plate bearing the following inscription:—

"With this barrow
The works of the Bedford and London and Birmingham Railway
Were commenced by his Grace the Duke of BEDFORD,
Who turned the first sod on the 13th day of December, 1845,
Upon lands in the parish of Husbo Crawley, and county of Bedford."

The Spade, in the lower part, whence the twist terminates, is electro-plated, and has the ornaments in full relief; on the centre of the shovel part, are the arms of the Duke, and beneath is engraved an inscription similar to that on the barrow. From the commencement of the twisted part of the spade shaft is oak, cut from the Woburn estate; and just below the handle is a group of oak leaves, acorns, &c., in bold relief, electro-plated. The wood-work was executed by Messrs. Saunders and Woolley, of Regent-street: and the electro-plate by Mr. Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields.

The company then retired to partake of an elegant collation served in the marquee, of which about 200 ladies and gentlemen partook. After several toasts had been drunk, the party broke up; and, on the Duchess of Bedford entering the carriage, another salute was fired: the contractors requested her Grace to accept of the barrow and spade, and they were placed in the carriage. Three cheers were then given, her Grace took her departure, and the company soon after dispersed.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

EGREMONT CASTLE, CUMBERLAND.

The fine ruins of this noble fortress, which was once the seat of the potent Lords of the great Barony of Copeland or Egremont, occupy an eminence about 300 yards to the south-west of the town. Some parts of its walls exhibit indubitable traces of great antiquity, from the occasional introduction of that peculiar kind of masonry known as herring-bone, and from the similarity of its arrangement to the grains in an ear of corn, sometimes more classically termed, 'spicata testacea.'"

EGREMONT CASTLE.

This Castle was built towards the conclusion of the eleventh century, by William de Meschines, on whom the Barony of Copeland was bestowed by his brother, Ranulph, who had received a grant of the whole county from William the Conqueror. It occupies the summit of a mount apparently artificial: the principal remains are a square tower, entered from the south-west by a semi-circular archway, with a ribbed roof; and a part of the wall which probably divided the inner and outer wards, where are two windows; and a gateway, with grooves for a portcullis, of a more recent date, with pointed arches. The Moat is still to be traced, nearly encircling the Castle; and a stream of water, by which it was formerly supplied, flows on the eastern side. This Castle suffered materially from wanton spoliation, until measures were taken for its prevention by the late Earl of Egremont.

THE CASE OF THE SPANISH PIRATES.—The division of the Judges in the Brazilian pirates' case was eleven against the conviction and two for it. Baron Platt was one of the two, and Baron Alderson the other. Mr. Justice Coleridge and Mr. Justice Cresswell did not sit.

PRIZE CATTLE AND IMPLEMENTS.

Upon the present page we have engraved a few of the finest Prizes from the Grand Cattle Show of the Smithfield Club.

On the two first animals we find the following notes :—

OXEN.

Class I.—A 3 years and 10 months old short-horned ox, bred by the late Lord Huntingfield, and fed and entered by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. —Third prize of £16. A fine large animal, and decidedly superior to the one entered by his Royal Highness last year.

MR. TWITCHELL'S PURE LEICESTER WETHER.

Class V.—A 4 years old West Highland ox, entered by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Commended by the Judges : a fine large beast of its kind. His Royal Highness appears to be partial to the Scotch breed, perhaps because he has a vivid recollection of his reception among the northern Thanes.

The following are the details of the remaining Prizes engraved :—

Class VIII.—The Right Hon. the Earl of Leicester, of Holkham, Norfolk, a 11 years and 2 months old North Devon cow, bred by the late Mr. G. Talbot, of Temple Guiting, near Winchcomb, Gloucester, and fed on Swedish turnips, mangold wurtzel, hay, oil cake, and bean-meal. Travelled to the show by van 40 miles, and by railway 70 miles; has had four calves.—First prize, £15, and silver medal.

MR. S. WEBB'S SOUTHDOWN WETHER.

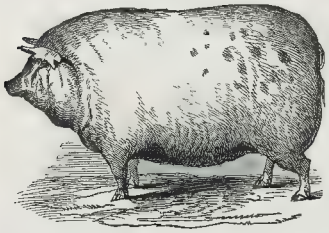
SHEEP.

Class XI.—Mr. Thomas Twitchell, of Willington, near St. Neots, Bedfordshire, a pen of three 20 months old pure Leicester wethers, bred by himself, from rams hired of Mr. Samuel Bennett, of Bickering's Park, near Woburn, Bedfordshire.—First prize, £20, and silver medal.

Class XV.—Mr. Samuel Well, of Babraham, near Cambridge, a pen of three 32 months old Southdown wethers, bred by Mr. H. J. Adean, of Babraham, from rams hired of Mr. Jonas Webb, of Babraham.—First prize, £20, and silver medal.



MR. C. ELEY'S BERKS AND YORK PIG.

PIGS.

Class XVI.—Mr. Charles Eley, of Heathfield Farm, near Hounslow, Middlesex, a pen of three 18 weeks and 2 days old Berkshire and Yorkshire pigs, bred by Mr. C. Eley, sen., and fed on buckwheat, barley, and pea-meal, and milk.—First prize, £10, and silver medal.

Class XVII.—Mr. H. M. L. Whiting, of Heston, near Hounslow, Middlesex, a pen of three 23 weeks and 4 days old improved Buckinghamshire pigs, bred by himself, and fed on barley and pea-meal, skimmed milk, and linseed.—First prize, £10, and silver medal.

We next submit to our readers a few Engravings of important Implements, for which we had not room in our last number.

MR. H. M. L. WHITING'S IMPROVED BUCKS PIG.

PRINCE ALBERT'S SHORT-HORNED OX.

Stacey's Double Mill, and Beart's Tile Machine, exhibited by their respective inventors. Dean's Gorse Crusher was too late to be admitted on the Gallery. Cambridge's Hand Thrashing Machine, Corne's Chaff Cutter, and Richmond's Steaming Apparatus, were exhibited only in Models, having been withdrawn in consequence of the expense of transport.

Mr. G. Stacey, Uxbridge.—Stand 45.

A very simple combination of a Corn Crusher with a Bean Mill. A New Machine, which, when worked in the ordinary way, and the corn is allowed to drop from the end of the spout, it is a Crusher; but when the motion of the winch is reversed, and the little trap door in the spout is opened so as to admit the beans between another pair of rollers, it then performs the office of a Bean Mill, and for both purposes is a most compact and efficient little implement.

Mr. Beart, Godmanchester.—Stand 79.

Beart's Tile-Making Machine was in full operation during the show, and fully maintained its reputation as a simple and efficient implement. Several prizes have been awarded to it. In working this machine the inventor recommends using only a small quantity of clay, by which much unnecessary friction against the sides of the cylinder is avoided, and the form and texture of the tiles improved.

A New Machine for Crushing and Cutting Gorse, to render this most nutritious, though thorny shrub, available as food for Cattle. Manufactured by Mr. Dean, of Birmingham.

Models, by Messrs. Coutan and Hallen.—Stand 82.

A Patent Hand Lever Thrashing Machine, invented and manufactured by Mr. Cambridge, of Wiltshire. This is a unique piece of mechanism, and differs from all others in the mode of communicating rotary motion by the agency of levers. It is stated, that with this machine, four men and three boys can thrash 80 bushels of wheat in a day, without injuring either corn or straw.

An Improved Apparatus for Steaming Roots, &c., for Cattle.—The steam generated in the boiler passes through the tubes to the vegetable pans on either side; the tubes are connected to the pans by a stuffing box, in the fulcrum, by which means the pans can be turned up, and vegetables shot out, without disconnecting them from their fittings. Invented and improved by Mr Richmond, of Salford, near Manchester.

A Patent Three Knife Chaff Cutter, invented by Mr. J. Cornes, of Barbridge, Cheshire, manufactured by Mr. Cambridge, to be worked by two men. It is furnished with pinions of varied diameters, which, gear ing into a wheel attached to the axle of the feed roller, regulate the length of cut. This machine obtained a prize of £10 at the Shrewsbury Meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England.

In our last week's notice of the Cattle Show, we stated, in error, that the iron roof lately erected over the area set apart for that exhibition, was de signed and constructed by Mr Wm Boulnois, jun. We have since been informed that the designer and constructor is Mr. F Bramwell, superintend ent of the Fair Field Works, Bow, the proprietors of which establishment, Messrs Adams and Co., were the contractors for its execution.

In the large 37s in the List of Prizes, the Heifer was fed by Mr. Trinden, not Trind r, and purchased by Mr. W Cooper, not Copeland, of Bridge street, Abingdon.

—On Monday morning, Smithfield Market was attended by a numerous body of butchers, graziers, farmers, and drovers, and by a curious, slight seeing public, all anxious to take a look at the show of prize and other fat cattle, and to pass remarks upon the quality and number of animals exhi bited. The market presented a scene of unusual bustle and excitement; the bellowing of the oxen, lowing of the cows, bleating of sheep, squeaking of pigs, hallooing of the drovers, screaming of the women who are hardy enough to trust themselves in the market, quarrel ing of men, and pushing and driving of the throngs of spectators—altogether forming a pic ture which baffles all attempt at delineation

Apart from the actual business of the day—the buying and selling—the butchers, graziers, and others were engrossed with the result : f the Prize Cattle Show, and its general features, the number and quality and award of prizes being warmly and freely discussed and commented upon. The Show, also, upon Smithfield stones to day was, of course, jointly and separately analyzed and criticised. As usual there had been inflated statements cir culated amongst some parties that the Show, both on the stones and at the Bazaar, would present something very superior to the exhibitions of former years. Amongst impartial and practical men, however, a juster opinion was formed upon the subject and the result proves the soundness of their judgment, which, upon the whole, was very favourable; but it has not escaped the observation of many persons competent to form a correct opi nion, that during the last two or three years there has been a falling off in the degree of perfection to which the animals have been brought, in com parison with preceding exhibitions

On Monday, "the great day" at Smithfield, the show of cattle was ex ceedingly good; and, as purchasers were present from all parts of England, the trade was not so dull as would have been the case under the circum stances previous to the formation of railways.

Among the cattle there were a good many very superior Scotch beasts; and some extraordinarily fat compact animals of this description, sold by Messrs Guerrier and Gilbert, attracted a good deal of attention. as also some very superior large Rants, Hereiords, &c., by the same salesmen. The show of Mr. Guerrier was about the best in the market, but Mr. Collings and other salesmen had consignments of very superior and extraordinary animals. On the whole, the show of beef was by some considered finer than last year, but others entertained a different opinion. The supply of sheep was small for the time of year, but generally of a very fine description, and, if anything, also in advance of the show of 1844. Amongst the many pens of very superior fat sheep, some extraordinary Gloucesters of Mr Faulkner, Mr Large, and Mr Wm. Ewer, sold by Mr Giblett, attracted, for their great size and symmetry, general and unqualified approbation; these, with others of similar beauty, were the chief attraction with the more spectators.

The following statistics of the Prize Show at Baker street for the last and present year will exhibit the comparative results :—

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

BRIGHTON AND CROYDON. The Croydon Company has accepted the terms offered by the Brighton Company, and the amalgamation is now fully setti d

PLANS DEPOSITED WITH THE BOARD OF TRADE.—A computation has been made of the capital required for the railways deposited with the Board of Trade: For England, £334,460,000; Scotland, 30,000 000; Ireland, £25 000 000, total capital, £389,460,000 Of this amount many of the lines are duplicates; and in some cases, three, four, five, and six plans are deposited for the same scheme, or schemes, to the same place That will not affect the amount of deposits, if they are all made, which would be £20 250,000, or 10 per cent on three fourths of the capital But the deposits are required to be on three fourths of the estimates, which deposit may not be 20 millions. Probably, not two thirds of this sum will be deposited.

SHAREHOLDERS AND CREDITORMAN.—This Company, who, at a recent meeting announced their intention of returning the deposits, less ten shillings per share, issued a notice on Saturday evening, informing the shareholders that they could not fulfil their engagements, in consequence of a bill in Chancery having been filed against them PROTECTION AGAINST RAILWAY LITIGATION.—A meeting of gentlemen took place on Saturday, at the offices of Mr. John Harrison, 5, New Inn, Strand to devise measures to be taken in consequence of legal proceedings having been threatened by several Companies. Allusion was made to several disreputable Companies, who have declared their intention to sue for the amount of deposits on letters of allotment. and it was suggested that a society should be formed to defend the actions so commenced, and which, it was stated, could not be sustained A discussion of some length took place, and it was agreed that a more public meeting should be called on Saturday next (to day, to reconsider the matter, and, if found necessary, forthwith to establish the society.

THE BROAD AND NARROW GAUGES.—On Tuesday, the first experimental trip of a series which the Gauge Commissioners instituted for the purpose of testing the comparative capacities of the broad and narrow gauges was made on the part of the Great Western line between Paddington and Didcot, a distance of fifty three miles The experiment was tried with the Exon engine, and the train consisted of eight carriages, six of the first class and two of the second Amongst those who went by the train were Sir Frederick Smith, late Inspector General of Railways, and Professor Barlow, both on the commission; General Pasley, Inspector General of Railways; Captain O'Brien, of the Board of Trade; J. W Brooke, Esq; I. K Brunel, Esq C E., G P Bidder, Esq, C.E., T M Barlow, Esq, Resident Engineer of the South Eastern line; Messrs. Berkeley, Stevenson, and several other gentlemen The time appointed for the commencement of operations was ten o'clock, and at two and a half minutes past the hour the train left the Paddington terminus, and proceeded as far as the first mile post from which it had been determined the experiment should commence. At six minutes and three quarters past ten the train left its starting place, and at twelve minutes past eleven arrived at Didcot Having performing the fifty two miles in one hour, five minutes, and fifteen seconds. There was a tolerably strong head wind against the train in its course downwards, and nearly a minute was lost at the West London crossing in consequence of the hoisting of the usual stoppage signal The return experiment commenced at eight minutes and twenty seconds past twelve and the train arrived at the last milestone at nine minutes past one, accomplishing the fifty two miles in one hour and forty seconds The maximum speed in the down-train was a mile in one mi nute and five seconds, and in the up train, a mile in one minute and two seconds It may be added that a distance of thirteen miles in the up trip was performed in four en minutes and forty seconds. The speed was considered extre ordinary, from the fact of the engine drawing at tons 13 cwt., exclusive of itself and the tender For the second trip the train started from Paddington at two o'clock, and accomplished the distance in sixty n inutes. The return trip occupied fifty five minutes It is ex cted that the experiments on one of the broad gauge lines (probably the London and Birmingham) will take place in the course of a few days. The experimental runs were renewed on Wednesday. The maximum speed on the down trip was exactly one mile per minute; and the maximum of that on the return was 62 miles per hour. The down train, upon leaving the Sunning hill cutting, was doing 59 miles per hour; but such was the greasy state of the rails, that they were obliged to put on the steam power to prevent the wheels from slipping, and this reduced power was continued for about ten miles. The twenty two miles between the 11th and 33d mile posts were done in 22 minutes 33 seconds; and it was at this point of the journey, and when every body was expecting a most extraordinary result, that the wheels began to slip, in consequence of the rails being in a bad state, arising from the drizzling rain. The train was again in requisition, and the only difference being that the experiment was with six carriages instead of ten, and with sixty tons instead of eighty.

MISCELLANEOUS RAILWAY NEWS.—Among the items of Railway intelligence this week we may mention the suspension at present of the project called the Grand Junction and Midland Union Railway. The Manchester, Rocby and Derby, and the Great Eastern and Western Railway Companies have come to the resolution of breaking up and returning the deposits, less the expenses to the shareholders.—An agreement to amalgamate at par between the Sheffield, Ashton under Lyne, and Manchester; the Huddersfield Canal and Railway, the Sheffield and Lincolnshire Extension, the Great Grimsby and Sheffield Junction, and the Grimsby Dock Companies, has been concluded with satisfaction to the various parties interested.—It appears to have been determined to appoint a new Committee of Management to investigate the affairs of the Direct London and Exeter Railway.

THE RECONSTRUCTION.

The period of doubt and uncertainty has closed, and, at last, we have a Government. The obstacles that so long delayed Lord John Russell's decision finally prevailed; and just as the world was led to suppose he would undertake the task, it appears he had informed his Sovereign that the task was an impossibility, and that he must altogether decline any farther proceedings. Once more Sir Robert Peel emerged from his retirement; and the slight terror in which his colleagues had been kept for a fortnight, lest the Whigs might succeed, having had its effect, they became tractable, agreed to support his policy whatever that may prove to be, and thus the late Government has been reconstructed, with increased stability.

We last week remarked—

Either there is a great and stern necessity which compels the late Premier to adopt a certain course to meet it, or the resignation is—not exactly a trick, perhaps—but an experiment on the capabilities of others to govern instead of him: if the Ultra-Protectionists under the Duke of Richmond are afraid to try—if the Abolitionists under Lord John Russell try and fail—what then remains but for Peel to come into power again with more influence than ever?

That result has taken place, and the late dissolution of the Cabinet has considerably strengthened the hands of its chief. It has done so in two ways—first, by bringing over to his side those who held aloof, or doubted; and, secondly, by removing altogether one from whom the strongest opposition was to be expected. Lord Stanley quits the Government, in which he has long served with anything but a willing or active spirit. In the general policy of the Cabinet he will not be missed, and great will be the satisfaction of the Colonies at his departure; as he has no party to attach himself to in Opposition, he will not be formidable as an enemy; and thus has a once great and prominent public character been politically extinguished. With the rarest talents, powerful eloquence, and every advantage of birth, wealth, and position, it is impossible to consider Lord Stanley's political career as other than unsuccessful: "the stamp of one defect" may often be fatal; and he always laboured under an inability to act cordially in concert with his colleagues. He forsook the Ministry of Earl Grey, and, in the long ten years' Opposition to that party was in all his glory as a partisan; but, again in office, the old discontent with his position reappeared, and, after a period of visible estrangement, and zeal decayed, he now abandons the Government of Sir Robert Peel, which is all the better for his loss. Another dissentient from the policy of the Premier was the late Lord Wharncliffe: he is removed by death at a most critical juncture—the mental excitement attending it having, in all probability, hastened his decease.

Mr. Gladstone resumes office, to the great satisfaction of all who lamented that his fine abilities should be lost to the public service. He succeeds to the Colonial Department resigned by Lord Stanley, and will be a direct accession of strength both in council and debate. Thus improved and fortified both by what it loses and what it gains, the "re-formed" Government is decidedly in the ascendant. The funds rise; there is a general feeling amounting almost to satisfaction that Sir Robert Peel is back again, founded on an impression not yet demonstrated to be causeless, that he is the only man uniting the many qualities necessary to keep together a firm Government. It is believed that, though he will not undertake to do so much as his opponents, what he does undertake he will carry; and, on the other hand, the landed interest sees right well, that, though he may lessen the present degree of their protection, yet by him alone can they expect to retain any protection at all, or make terms in case even he finds it impossible to preserve the system. The railway world is relieved from the fear of an immediate dissolution, and sees a prospect of bills progressing, and the friends of peace find some satisfaction in an escape from a Palmerston when a question like that of Oregon, and a President's Message like that of Polk, remain to be considered and settled, if possible, pacifically. From each and all these causes, the re-establishment of the Cabinet of Sir R. Peel is felt as a relief from a good deal of political uneasiness and anxiety. The Parliament stands summoned to meet "for the dispatch of business," on the 22nd of January, an anticipation of the usual period which indicates some important matters of debate; and, now that all seems fixed as to the persons, and arranged as to the time of action, the question rises—what will be done?

The Corn Laws will undergo a modification, but their repeal we do not believe would be proposed by the present Ministers, or carried, if proposed, in the present Parliament. Even the modification contemplated will, it is rumoured, be accompanied by some scheme of compensation to the landed interest, in order to break the fall from a system under which vast and complicated engagements and relations have grown up, capital embarked, and responsibilities incurred, to another state of things, in which the produce of the land will be left to find its natural level in the market, its price unassisted by the present amount of duty on foreign food. In fact, the great, and almost overwhelming difficulty of the question, will now have to be encountered. It is not by argument alone that the question can be settled. Peel has himself acknowledged, that the strength of argument is on the side of Free-trade, and Graham asserts that its principle is only that of "common sense." The correctness of the theory is granted, but the pinch of the case is when we come to deal with actualities. It is, indeed, the Slavery question over again. No one will dispute but that slavery was in principle more immoral, and a greater violation of the laws of God and the first rights of man, than any regulation affecting trade and commerce. But the English Government and Legislature, at a time when abstract rights and pure political morality were little known and less practised, sanctioned the whole system, and in a manner, entered into engagements with men to protect and uphold it, and all the interests involved in it. When the enormity became too glaring an exception to the whole spirit and working of the British Constitution, abolition was insisted upon; yet even in such a case as that, the system could not be abolished without compensating those who had property embarked under it, on the faith of English Laws. The people paid dearly for the injustice and wrong done by their ancestors, and the return to a free and natural state of things had to be purchased "with a great sum." Granting that the Corn-laws are an error and an injustice, —are all they have been described to be—if "vested interests" can be distinctly proved under them, and traced to them alone—the penalty of wrong-doing, through their representatives, again falls upon the people. That the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, is one of those texts whose perfect truth has often been illustrated by nations as well as individuals: thirty years ago we established a system that experience condemns—we are seeking to abolish it, and find we must "buy out" the holders of the privilege we bestowed. The word "compensation" is whispered about, and, considering that it is never linked with less than a formidable array of millions, it may well be heard with apprehension.

But full compensation should only be given for full abolition: if any remnant of protection is preserved, a compromise may still be made, but it should be of a different kind. A money "compensation," adds millions to the National Debt, the burden of which remains heavy upon all future generations, and if the people get relief in one shape they would feel an oppression in another; the burden would be only shifted, there would be no absolute release from the load. The opposition to the plan would be so strong and so universal, that the success of such a proposition is perfectly hopeless. Some other plan must be thought of, and far better it would be to make time do the work of money, and spread the work of abolition, if total abolition it must be, over a series of years. The duty might start from its present rate, and decrease year by year till it remained at a small fixed amount, or vanished to one so small as to make no addition to price, and merely kept on for the purpose of registering the quantities imported. Between this time and the practical extinction, the landed interest would have fair notice, and time to adapt itself to the change; the people would secure a sufficient importation, and the trade would be certain, as the amount of duty, being fixed, expences and profits might be calculated—a very difficult process at present. On the other hand, some taxes, of which the land pays the greatest part, for purposes advantageous to the whole community, might with fairness be thrown on the general fund; the county rate, which defrays a great portion of the expense of our criminal proceedings, might be made a national expenditure; the efficacy of the Law is a matter of national concern. The land has to keep up much of the roadway of the kingdom; the land does it exclusively, for large tracts of road are without tolls. The development of railroads tends to induce a neglect of the old roads, which are still very important; superintendence will be wanted, and here again the State might step in with money and power for a national benefit. The land would be relieved of two burdens of which they have much reason to complain; let that relief stand as part of the "compensation." One more suggestion may be made for the benefit of the landed interest, which, as it is the abolition of a tax, will be acceptable to all: with a surplus revenue of two millions, might not the Malt-tax be abolished? An Excise impost is far more mischievous than a tax levied as a Custom duty. Great would be the relief if the maltster and the brewer were left unshackled; the benefit to them would re-act on the farmer with especial advantage, and at the same time produce an immense benefit to the whole of the labouring classes of the kingdom. In these measures, or measures like them, might a fair compensation be given; but to burden the nation for the purpose of buying out the interst of the land in the Corn-laws, would excite and perpetuate the worst kind of animosity between class and class, and would remain a cause of irritation for ever. We do not believe any statesman would propose it; but in the other direction something might be done, with no injustice to any, and with benefit to all. Whether such will be the nature of the alterations to be made by Sir Robert Peel, or whether he intends to make any, or none at all, remains to be seen; if so, the amount and degree of the impending change will furnish to politicians ample matter for the favourite Christmas game of "Speculation."

THE SECOND MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

In great part of our impression on Saturday last, we announced the important fact that Lord John Russell had relinquished the hope of being able to form a Ministry, and that Sir Robert Peel had been recalled. We now supply from our contemporaries an account of the circumstances attendant on this Second Ministerial Crisis.

On Saturday morning last, Lord John Russell left his mansion in Chesham-place, at half-past nine for Pelham Crescent, Brompton, to have an audience of the Queen, and to resign the command he had accepted of his Sovereign to form an Administration, the endeavours he had made to obtain the support of several political friends having rendered his attempt abortive. The fact that Lord John Russell intended to wait on her Majesty to inform her of his Lordship's proposed resignation was received by the Queen at Windsor Castle on Friday evening, a message having been despatched to the Castle shortly after the conference at his Lordship's residence, conveying to the Queen the result of their deliberations, and the cicumion of opinion which prevailed. The noble Lord returned home by the half-past one o'clock train from Slough, and on his arrival his Lordship communicated with the majority of his supporters who would have taken office under him, with an intimation to assemble at five o'clock.

By that hour the Earl of Auckland, Viscount Palmerston, Viscount Morpeth, the Earl of Carendon, Sir John Cam Hobhouse, the Right Hon Edward Ellice, the Right Hon. T B. Macaulay, the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, and Lord Monteagle had congregated. The conference lasted nearly two hours.

Rumour relates that, beginning with Lord Grey, Lord John Russell offered him the Colonial office. He accepted, but had the curiosity to ask who was to have the Foreign office? The answer was, Lord Palmerston—an information which had the immediate effect of causing the Earl Grey's face to assume an anxious, patriotic and disinterested as it undoubtedly was. He most strongly objected to the appointment, and, for his own part, positively refused to serve with Lord Palmerston as Foreign Minister. Lord Grey, in withdrawing from the Cabinet under these circumstances, only followed the example of the Parisian capitalists, who have been withdrawing their money from the funds with more or less haste, exactly as there was reason to expect that Lord Palmerston was to be the channel and negotiator of international amity. However, be Lord Grey and the Bourse right or wrong, so it was, he would not come to a place in which he was told that Lord John represented the utter impossibility of passing such a man by, possibility or impossibility, Lord Grey was inexorable, and took his ground on the absolute incompatibility of himself and Lord Palmerston sitting at the same council table. The whole of Friday evening is said to have been spent in fruitless endeavours to move the rock. As Lord John Russell considered that he could not dispense with either of these gentlemen, the least-evasive Bedford to leave them at liberty to follow the.r own devices in the approaching struggle, he resolved again, for the last time, to return his commission into Her Majesty's hands.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, late on Friday evening, appears to have received, by the arrival of one of the Royal messengers, her Majesty's commands to attend at the Castle in the afternoon of Saturday, at the usual audience The Right Hon. Baronet left his mansion in Whitehall gardens at half-past one on Saturday morning, to proceed by the two o'clock train from the Great Western Railway Station at Paddington to Slough, and thence post to Windsor Castle.

Her Majesty was engaged nearly three hours with the Right Hon. Baronet, who then consented again to take upon himself the responsible duties of office.

The Chronicle gives a different version of the course of affairs. Our contemporary says:—"On Friday night, the letters of Lord John Russell communicated to her Majesty that, in consequence of a difficulty which had unexpectedly arisen, he must resign the commission with which she had honoured him to form an Administration. In the afternoon of Saturday his Lordship waited on her Majesty for this purpose. The difficulty referred to, we feel it right to say, did not arise from any difference of opinion upon the great question which has occupied the public mind for some time. Upon that question there was on Friday, and continues to be still, the most complete agreement between Lord John Russell and the friends with whom he had been in consultation during the week. Nor is there any truth in the statement made by some of our contemporaries, that there was any difference of opinion as to the individuals who were to have composed the future Cabinet."

Lord John Russell, on Sunday, left town, for the Grove Park, near Watford, Herts, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Clarendon, the noble Earl having arrived at his seat on Saturday night from town. Lord John, on Monday morning, left for Minto House, near Hawick, on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Minto. Lady John Russell has arrived at Minto House, from the seat of Mr. Rutherfurd, M.P., near Edinburgh

The following was, we believe, the intended allocation of places in the Ministry which the sudden resistance of Lord Grey to the appointment of Lord Palmerston as Minister for Foreign Affairs brought to so premature a close

First Lord of the Treasury, Lord John Russell.
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord Palmerston.
Secretary of State for the Home Department, Sir G. Grey.
Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Grey.
Lord Chancellor, Lord Cottenham.
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Besborough.
Secretary for Ireland, Mr Labouchere.
President of the Board of Trade, Sir J. C. Hobhouse.
First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Auckland.
First Commissioner of the Woods and Forests, Lord Morpeth
President of the Board of Trade, Lord Clarendon.
Lord Privy Seal, Lord Minto.
The Vice Presidency of the Board of Trade was tendered to Mr. Cobden.
The Earl of Ellenborough arrived in town early on Saturday afternoon from Gloucestershire, and immediately proceeded to the residence of Sir Robert Peel. The noble Earl remained upwards of an hour with the right hon. Baronet.

The Earl of St. Germans has arrived in town from his seat, Port Eliot, Cornwall.

The Earl of Dalhousie visited Sir Robert Peel on Wednesday.

Sir Robert Pe l left his residence in Whitehall gardens on Wednesday afternoon for his seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. Before his departure, the Earl of Aberdeen had an interview with the right hon. Baronet.

The following appeared in our latest edition last week:—

The news of the Return to Office of Sir Robert Peel has created a great sensation throughout the metropolis this (Saturday) evening; and, although several versions of the causes which have led to this Second Ministerial Crisis are in circulation at the Clubs, we forbear to publish mere conjectures.

Our inquiries in official quarters enable us to confirm the statement given in the first page, that Sir Robert Peel has been again summoned to Windsor. The right hon. Baronet had a long conference with her Majesty, and, on his return to town in the evening, a Cabinet Council was immediately summoned. A letter was also despatched by Sir Robert Peel to the Lord Chancellor, who soon afterwards went to the right hon. Baronet's residence at Whitehall. From thence Sir Robert Peel and the Lord Chancellor proceeded to Downing street.

The Cabinet Council was summoned for nine o'clock, and soon after that hour Sir James Graham and several other members of the Council arrived. The Duke of Wellington joined his colleagues about half an hour afterwards. The Cabinet Council remained in deliberation a very considerable time.

It would be idle for us to affect to be acquainted with the result. It cannot, of course, yet be known whether Sir Robert Pee. has again undertaken to carry on the Government, but we pledge ourselves for the accuracy of our account of the progress of this important movement so far as it has proceeded. We have reason to believe that the Duke of Wellington has had an interview with her Majesty, as well as Sir Robert Peel, and, from the presence of his Grace at the Council, our readers can form a judgment as to how far his Grace may now be considered to concur in the views of the right hon. Baronet. It will be recollected that the noble Duke was not present at the last Cabinet Council, but his attendance upon the present occasion may, perhaps, be considered as indicative of his adhesion now to the views of Sir Robert Peel

Of course, however, we do not vouch for the accuracy of this information; but, the above statements having been supplied to us from an unexceptionable source, we have thought it right to put our readers in possession of every incident likely to elucidate the mystery connected with the Resignation of Sir Robert Peel, as the public feel such anxiety upon the subject. Up to the present moment, the real cause of it is unknown.

According to our latest information, the arrangements for the re con struction of Sir Robert Peel's Cabinet are settled. The chief difference is the retirement of Lord Stanley.

Lord Stanley, we regret to learn, feels himself compelled to withdraw from her Majesty's service. His lordship acted throughout the late painful and protracted discussions with perfect fairness and openness.

All the other colleagues of Sir Robert Peel will remain in office. They are influenced, no doubt, by the same motives by which Sir Robert Peel was influenced, when he informed her Majesty, on Saturda, last, that he required no time for consultation or deliberation; that on the instant he should resume the functions and responsibilities of Prime Minister.

The ordeam of the Duke of Wellington and of those of his colleagues who had, in the first instance, dissented from the views of Sir Robert Peel, was not to leave him to pursue his arduous and patriotic course alone, but to share the burthen with him, and give him all the aid which their high station, their known ability, and disinterested integrity so well enabled them to afford. The position of Lord Stanley was peculiar, and, acting on strong conviction and on his sense of public duty, he resolved on retiring.

Sir Robert Peel therefore resumes his cour-e.

The changes in the constitution of the Ministry which its recent return to power will occasion, will not be of any very great importance. Mr. Gladstone has succeeded Lord Stanley in the Colonial office, Lord Dalhousie will be called to occupy a seat in the Cabinet, Lord St. Germans will be appointed Postmaster-General, also, probably, with a seat in the Cabinet, and, for the present at least, there is little probability of further change. The retention of the Lord Chancellor will, perhaps, induce him to avoid the fatigues of his abortious office during another session, but his Lordship will continue until then to afford his colleagues his valuable assistance in their deliberations.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The news of the resumption of office by Sir Robert Peel, which reached Paris on Monday, created an immense sensation, and was, generally speaking, received with congratulations. It led to great excitement on 'Change, and prices improved considerably.

The adjudications of the concessions of the Creil and St. Quentin Railways took place at the office of the Public Works on Saturday afternoon. The Rothschild, Hottiguer, Laffitte and Company offered to take it for 25 years 11 months; Carnette and Muguet for 38 to 40 years; Colbert and Co., for 56 years; Ardouin for 43 years. The Cordier Company did not bid

On the same day, the adjudication of the concession of the Paris and Lyons Railroad was produced, when the only company bidding for the Laffitte, Ganneron, Barillon and Baudran) having offered to take it but for 44½ years, and the Government minimum being 41½ years.

The singular termination of the adjudication was much commented upon in all the journals.

It appears subsequently, however, that at a Council of Ministers held on Saturday night, it was agreed that the Minister of Public Works should accept the proposition of M. Laffitte, on the part of the coalesced companies, to take the Paris and Lyons line on the terms named as the maximum in the Minister's sealed packet, namely, at 41 years 60 days.

In pursuance of this determination, the Moniteur publishes a report of the Minister of Public Works, M. Dumon, respecting the adjudication of the Paris and Lyons Railroad.

This report is followed by a Royal Ordonnance, dated the same day, declaring that the offer made by General Count Baudrand, Charles Laffitte, Hippolyte Ganneron, and William Barillon, for the grant of the Paris and Lyons Railroad, was accepted, and that the company they represent should hold it for 41 years and 60 days.

A dreadful murder was committed at Neuilly, near Paris, a few days ago, by a young man named Francois Querelles, aged twenty five. The motive was jealousy at the favour shown by his employer to another workman. M Rouzet, a builder, employed nearly distinguished amongst his workmen two young men, Querelles and another, named Louis Rollet. The former was foreman, and the latter out a simple workman. They lived together in the same house, Rue du Chateau, 39. In the course of last month, M Rouzet entrusted a piece of work to Rollet alone, without placing him, as usual, under the orders of Querelles. The latter became exceedingly jealous at this proceeding, and soon his fellow-workmen perceived that there was a coldness between him and Rollet. On Wednesday, Querelles proceeded to Paris, and purchased a pair of pistols and some powder and ball, and returned home before Rollet came in from work at the usual late hour of his return, which was before that of Querelles. Next morning neither of them appeared, and the neighbours becoming uneasy, entered Rollet's room, the key being in the door, and found him lying dead before the fire-place, with his head in the grate, and lying near him covered with blood, brains, and hair. In Querelle's room were found the pistols which he had bought the preceding day. He has not since been heard of, and the police are in full pursuit of the murderer, who could have been the author of this crime?

SPAIN.

The Spanish Cortes were opened on the 15th inst., with a speech from the Queen, in which her Majesty, after alluding to the state of the relations with foreign powers, said, "I desire to protect, by all means, our navigation and commerce. By giving life and animation to agriculture and industry, a new stimulus will be given to the progress of our navy, which will insure its recovery from the state of prostration into which it had fallen, and which will not less confer benefit and advantage upon our foreign possessions, so worthy of all our interest, for the fidelity they have always displayed, and under all circumstances." Her Majesty then alluded to the defeat of treasonable attempts, and the fidelity of the army, the subordination and discipline of which might serve as a model for the world, and adverted to important reforms which had been effected. Her Majesty in conclusion made these announcements

"My Government proposes also to submit to you measures calculated to increase the public wealth and to strengthen the credit to the nation.

"My Government will also present to you a project of law with the important object of enduring, in a permanent and solid manner, public worship and the clergy.

"During the last session you introduced into the constitution the reforms indispensable for placing in harmony the prerogatives of the Crown and the rights of the nation. You authorised my Government to promulgate those organic laws, by means of which the political machine received freedom of action and movement. You decreed, in fine, a new plan of finance, calculated to put an end to the disorder which consumed the resources of the State. At present it devolves on you to examine the results of your former resolutions, and to introduce such further improvements and reforms as shall appear to you called for and necessary—a task which, though less brilliant, is not the less useful and glorious. Your zeal and perseverance will be necessary to aid my Government in the laudable task of regulating the finances and administration of the state, which necessarily felt the effects of previous great and fatal disorder."

THE UNITED STATES.—(HE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The ship Sea arrived at Liverpool on Monday afternoon, with New York papers to the 4th inst., and also brought the President's Message, which was delivered to Congress on the 2d inst. This document, as usual, is very long one, but the portion of it which chiefly interests this country is that relating to the Oregon Territory. The tone adopted upon this important subject is, we regret to say, a bellicose one. Mr. Polk commences the Message by referring to the affairs of Mexico and Texas, and asks the Congress to adopt the necessary measures for carrying out the annexation. He then comes to the Oregon question, and after tracing the various negotiations upon the subject, says:—

"The civilised world will see in these proceedings a spirit of liberal concession on the part of the United States, and this Government will be relieved from all responsibility which may follow the failure to settle the controversy

"All attempts at compromise having failed, it becomes the duty of Congress to consider what measures it may be proper to adopt for the security and protection of our citizens now inhabiting, or who may hereafter inhabit Oregon, and for the maintenance of our just title to that territory. In adopting measures for this purpose, it is deemed proper that nothing be done to violate the stipulations of the convention of 1827, which is still in force. The faith of treaties, in their letter and spirit, has ever been, and, I trust, will ever be, scrupulously observed by the United States. Under that convention a year's notice is required to be given by either party to the other, before the joint occupancy shall terminate, and before either can rightfully assert or exercise exclusive jurisdiction over any portion of the territory. This notice it would, in my judgment, be proper to give; and I recommend that provision be made by law for giving it accordingly, and terminating, in this manner, the convention of the 6th of August, 1827."

After some further remarks, the President proceeds —

"The recommendations which I have made as to the best manner of securing our rights in Oregon are submitted to Congress with great deference. Should they, in their wisdom, devise any other mode better calculated to accomplish the same object, it shall meet with my hearty concurrence.

"At the end of the year's notice, should Congress think it proper to make provision for giving that notice, we shall have reached a period when the national rights in Oregon must either be abandoned or firmly maintained. That they cannot be abandoned without a sacrifice of both national honour and interest is too clear to admit of doubt."

Mr. Polk concludes his comments upon the Oregon question in these terms —

"Near a quarter of a century ago, the principle was distinctly announced to the world, in the annual Message of one of my predecessors, that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.' This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European power attempt to establish any new colony in North America. In the existing circumstances of the world, the present is deemed a proper occasion to reiterate and re-affirm the principle affirmed by Mr. Monroe, and to state my cordial concurrence in its wisdom and sound policy. The re assertion of this principle, especially in reference to North America, is at this day but the announcement of a policy which no European power should cherish the disposition to resist. Existing rights of every European nation should be respected; but it is due alike to our safety and our interests, that the efficient protection of our laws should be extended over our whole territorial limits, and that it should be distinctly announced to the world as our settled policy, that no future European colony or dominion shall, with our consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American continent."

Mr. Polk gives this account of the financial condition of the United States

"The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report to Congress, will communicate a full statement of the condition of our finances. The imports for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June last, were of the value of 117,254,564 dollars, of which the amount exported was 15,346,830 dollars, leaving a balance of 101,907,734 dollars for domestic consumption. The exports for the same year were of the value of 114,646,606 dollars; of which the amount of domestic articles was 99,999,778 dollars. The receipts into the Treasury during the same year were 29,769,133 dollars and 56 cents; of which were derived from the customs 27,528 112 dollars and 70 cents; from sales of public lands, 2,770,693 dollars and 51 cents, and from unsolicited and miscellaneous receipts, 163,998 dollars and 56 cents. The expenditures for the same period were 29,968,296 dollars and 98 cents; of which 8,588,157 dollars and 71 cents were applied to the redemption of the public debt. The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July last, was 7,558,806 dollars and 22 cents. The amount of the public debt remaining unpaid on the 1st of October last, was 17,075,445 dollars and 53 cents. Further payments of the public debt would have been made in anticipation of the period of its reimbursement under the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the acts of July 31, 1841, and of April 15th, 1842, and of March 3rd, 1843, had not the unsettled state of our relations with Mexico menaced hostile collision with that power. In view of such a contingency, it was deemed prudent to retain in the Treasury an amount unusually large for ordinary purposes. A few years ago our whole national debt growing out of the revolution and the war of 1812 with Great Britain was extinguished, and we presented to the world the rare and noble spectacle of a great and growing people who had fully discharged every obligation. Since that time the existing debt has been contracted, and, small as it is, in comparison with the similar burthens of most other nations, it should be extinguished at the earliest practicable period. Should the state of the country permit, and especially if our foreign relations interpose no obstacle, it is contemplated to apply all the moneys in the Treasury, as they accrue, beyond what is required for the appropriations by Congress, to its liquidation. I cherish the hope of soon being able to congratulate the country on its recovering once more the lofty position which it recently occupied, as the country, which exhibits to the world the benefits of self government, in developing all the resources of national prosperity, owes to mankind the permanent example of a nation free from the blighting influence of a public debt."

In the course of the Message, the President invites the attention of Congress to the importance of making suitable modifications and reductions of the rate of duty imposed by the present tariff laws.

INDIA AND CHINA.

ARRIVAL OF THE HALF MONTHLY MAIL.

The Bombay Mail of the 15th of November has arrived.

The chief fact of interest mentioned in the papers is the departure of the Governor General from Agra, on the 29th of October, and his quick movements, whereby he was to arrive at Delhi on the 1st of November—that is, many days prior to the time when he was expected here. The affairs in the Punjaub have not lost their interest, although no late atrocity is recorded. The situation is most extraordinary. Ministers are murdered at the Prime Ministers or Wuzeers, as well as all the Kings that do not act as they please. The boy King, Dhuleep, is represented as being no great favourite with them. "Gholab Singh is not expected, as he is ill at Jessulna." and a "Faustina," has contrived to keep the soldiers at bay since the death of her brother, Jowahir Singh, although she has had no Prime Minister, for Gholab Singh, whom the soldiers wish to have for that wealth, to that most dangerous post, and then to plunder and to butcher him, as they did his brothers and his nephew, has contrived to gain his mountain fortress of Jammu, where he has forced the Governor to refuse him admittance. Tej Singh, the late Governor of Peshawur, has also declined the offer.

The British army remains collected on the frontiers of the Punjaub, and will march at once if ready to march at once if necessary. There is nothing positive known of the fate of Peshora Singh, who was, as it now appears, aided in his late attempt to hoist Attock by Dhost Mahomed and the Affghans, who intended, if possible, to restore Dost Mahomed to Peshawur.

Prince Waldemar of Prussia, who was at Umballa on the 4th of November, was about to proceed to Loodiana and Ferozepore; but his return to the former place was expected, as soon as the invasion of the Punjaub will be begun the ce.

From Scinde we learn that all is tranquil there. Sir Charles Napier was preparing to move from Kurachee to Hyderabad on a tour, as it was said, into the province of Cutch Bhooj; but there were not wanting speculators who imagine, if an invasion of the Punjaub be required, that he will lead the vanguard.

At Indore some confusion has arisen in consequence of a conspiracy to assassinate the Prime Minister; but the plot was discovered and frustrated, and the conspirators punished.

In other parts of India tranquillity prevails, although apprehensions are general of a great scarcity of grain and of water in various districts, during the next six months, in consequence of the deficiency of the late monsoon

From Burman the news of the detronement of Tharawaddie has been confirmed. He had become mad, and had been guilty of the most wanton acts of cruelty; he was therefore deposed, as his brother had been previously, and a regent appointed in the person of his youngest son, Shoadoogee menda, under the guardianship of Mekkaranung and Kyeewongyee. Mekkaranung, the uncle of the regent, is said to be a man of talents, and is a member of the Asiatic Society. The removal from power of Tharawaddie, in whose family madness is said to be hereditary, is hailed with satisfaction by the Burmese.

The letters from Bombay allude to the horrible conduct of a Manilla seaman, who, infuriated by drink and jealousy, ran a muck through a population part of the town of Bombay, killing five persons and wounded seventeen with his knife; he was knocked down at last and secured.

From China no intelligence had reached Bombay subsequent to the 30th of September.

The following appointments have taken place: The Rev. David Carver, of Caius College, to the rectory of Hockwold cum Wilton, Norfolk. The Rev. Alexander Grant Hudyan, M.A., of Pembroke College, to be one of the Hon. Earl Nelson's domestic chaplains.

SECESSIONS.—Mr. Hutchinson, of Trinity College, Cambridge, was received into the Roman Catholic Church at Birmingham, on Sunday last. Above thirty of the late parishioners of the Rev. — Marshall, of Swallow Inn Hall, have, together with their pastor, conformed to the Church of Rome. Mr. Oakeley, late Fellow of Balliol College, has entered as a student in Theology at St. Edmund's College, Hertfordshire, under Dr. Griffiths, Vicar Apostolic of the London District. Under that prelate, of the diocese of York, who has been lately received into the Church of Rome, was not curate to Archdeacon Wilberforce at the time of his reception, though he was previously curate to the venerable Archdeacon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Lord Lyndhurst sat on Saturday in Lincoln's Inn Hall for the first time since his late illness, and gave no less than twelve judgments. The hall was very much crowded.

THE LATE LORD WHARNCLIFFE.—On Sunday morning Dr. Merriman and the physicians, who were called in to consult on the serious illness of this respected nobleman, assembled at the family mansion in Curzon street, as well as Sir Benjamin Brodie, when there was a post mortem examination of the deceased, and it was ascertained that death was caused by an effusion on the brain.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

COURT AND PRIVY COUNCIL.—MEETING OF PARLIAMENT IN JANUARY.

The Queen held a Court and Privy Council on Tuesday afternoon at Windsor Castle. There were present his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Mr William Ewart Gladstone, Sir James Graham, Mr. Henry Goulburn, the Earl of Haddington, Lord Granville Somerset, the Earl of Lincoln, Sir Sidney Herbert, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Earl of Ripon, and Lord Wharncliffe.

Lord Stanley had an audience of the Queen, and delivered to her Majesty his seals of office as one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State

The Queen having been pleased to appoint the Right Hon William Ewart Gladstone to be one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State (for War and the Colonies), he was, by command of the Queen, sworn one of her Majesty's Privy Council in Council.

At the Court Mr. Sheriff Chaplin and Mr. Sheriff Laurie, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, accompanied by the City Remembrancer, were presented to the Queen at an audience by Sir Charles Graham. In receiving her Majesty's commands relative to the Address of the Corporation of the City of London on the subject of the Corn laws. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to appoint Saturday, the 3rd of January next, at Windsor Castle, for the reception of the Address. The Sheriffs appeared in State at the Court.

After the Court the Duke of Wellington left in his travelling carriage for Strathfieldsaye.

Sir Robert Peel remained at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert promenaded this morning in the Home Park, visiting the Queen's kennel and the Royal aviary in their return to the Castle. The Prince of Wales and the Princesses Royal and Alice were also in their usual airings this morning in the private grounds.

Divine service was performed this morning in the Queen's private chapel, before her Majesty and the Prince Consort and the members of the Royal household, by the Hon. and Rev. G. Courtenay. A sermon was also afterwards preached by the Queen's domestic chaplain. Her Majesty and Prince Albert took an airing this afternoon. The Royal dinner circle this evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Spaeth, the Countess Dysart, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon Miss Devereux, the Dowager Lady Lyttleton, the Hon. Miss Napier, the Earl of Warwick, Mr. Ormsby Gore, the General Wemyss, Major General Sir Edward Bowater, Colonel Bowles, &c. Her Majesty's private band was in attendance after dinner, and performed before her Majesty and the Court in the Red Drawing Room. A splendid ox, roasted whole, weighing upwards of 300lbs., was served up at the Royal dinner table this evening. The Court will remain at the Castle until within a day or two of the Meeting of Parliament, when it will take its departure for Buckingham Palace.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION OF COMMON COUNCILMEN.—St. Thomas's Day having fallen on a Sunday, the annual wardmotes for the election of Common Councilmen were postponed until Monday last. In many of the wards the old members were returned without opposition, and in few of them was there any very animated contests arising out of political partizanship. These elections, however, have excited little interest, of late years, beyond their own localities.

CHRISTMAS PROVISIONS.—The various metropolitan markets, during the week, have exhibited a most extraordinary and abundant supply of all descriptions of provisions, which have been imported from the country for the entertainment of those who have the means to enjoy themselves at this season of festivity. At the Newgate and Leadenhall markets and Scotch cattle markets presented so fine a show of poultry, the fowls in general being in the best possible condition. Many of the trains had with them between five hundred and six hundred pheasants, and the Norfolk train, which came in early on Tuesday morning, had eight hundred parcels. Several wholesale dealers have forwarded between two and three thousand geese, the supply being required in consequence of the unusual mildness of the season, but in some of which there are above five hundred members. Turkeys fetched from 3s. to 25s. each; geese, from 3s. 6d. to 12s. each; fowls, from 2s. 6d. to 10s. 6d per pair; porkers, from 6s. to 18s. each; hares, from 2s. 6d. to 5s. each.

COUNTRY NEWS.

OPENING OF THE SHEFFIELD AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.

Monday was a great day for the towns of Sheffield and Manchester, the railways between the two points being opened throughout. The great obstacle—the tunnel which passes under the hills between Lancashire and Yorkshire—was on that day formally opened. It cost £200,000, and has taken nearly six years in execution.

The tunnel is regarded as one of the greatest specimens of engineering skill, is 3300 yards, or three miles and twenty yards in length, being exactly midway between the termini of the line. It is 15 feet wide, and is 16 feet 6 inches high. It is adapted for a single line of road, and it will be worked by an engine which will be entirely confined to taking trains through each way, so that no collision can by possibility take place. In addition, it is securely fenced throughout, and is lighted by means of a telegraph, which will convey signals through the tunnel in an almost incredibly short space of time. The level of the rails at the eastern end of the tunnel is nearly 1000 feet above the level of the sea at low water. The depth of the lowest of the five shafts is 659 feet.

A train of about twenty carriages left the Sheffield station at ten o'clock in the morning, drawn by two of the largest engines, conducted by Mr. Chairman, Mr. J. Parker, M.P. for Sheffield, the other Directors and their friends. Precisely at five minutes past ten the train was put into motion, and got under rapid way. The weather was extremely unpropitious, in consequence of a tremendous fall of snow. The train reached Dunford bridge in three quarters of an hour, where it remained twenty minutes for water. It then proceeded into the tunnel, at a steady pace. It was 19½ minutes in passing through this great subterranean bore; and, on emerging into the "regions of light," at Woodhead, the passengers gave three hearty cheers, making the mountains ring. It speedily passed over the wonderful viaduct at Woodhead, and arrived at Manchester at a quarter past twelve, the band playing "See, the Conquering Hero Comes!" The party were met here by the Manchester shareholders, who proceeded to Sheffield, and dined with their Sheffield friends. The line was opened to the public on Tuesday. General Pasley, the Government Inspector, left Sheffield at ten o'clock on Saturday, and, after passing over the line, gave the usual certificate of safety and consolidation.

This line is intended to form part of the Huddersfield and Manchester line, which will constitute the shortest and most direct communication between Manchester and Leeds.

ELECTION PROSPECTS.—The provincial papers represent the Parliamentary boroughs to be in much the same state as they were with perfect safety the Parliament, supposed to be necessarily consequent on the advent of a Whig Radical Administration. The recall of Sir Robert Peel, however, will put a stop to such activity; therefore it is unnecessary to notice the various movements which the anticipated elections occasioned. There must be a vacancy for the West Riding of Yorkshire, as the Hon. John Stuart Wortley will be called to the House of Peers, and it seems to be the impression that Lord Morpeth will be returned.

MEETING OF THE LEAGUE AT MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday there was a very numerous meeting of the League at Manchester, Mr. R. Cobden Gregg in the chair. Mr. George Wilson read the accounts of the League, from which it appeared that they had a balance in hand of nearly £13,000. Mr. Alderman Mead moved the first resolution, to the effect that the meeting still reposed confidence in the League, and would continue their support of it. It was carried unanimously. Mr. Henry Ashworth, of Turton, moved the thanks of the meeting to the League, and that a requisition should be entered into in aid of the great £250,000 fund, and the appointment of a committee to collect subscriptions. Very nearly £60,000 was subscribed. There were no less than twenty subscriptions of £1000. Mr. Cobden, on behalf of the Council, then addressed the meeting, and observed that two years ago, when they subscribed £14,000, they were designated "a great fact;" and now that they had subscribed £50,000 by 5d., they might be called a greater fact. The amount subscribed that day was a greater sum than was ever subscribed for any one object. The meeting gave him great pleasure, because, from the beginning to the conclusion of it not a word had been said about the changes of the Ministry that were going on every day. It would show every Minister what support he would receive from the country; and, on behalf of the Executive of the League, he must say with perfect safety that Sir Robert Peel would have the support of the people of Lancashire, and of the whole of the Free-traders of the country, if he would but come out, and do his duty as a man and a Minister. He wished it to be understood that, as soon as the laws were repealed, the League would be dissolved, and every gentleman would be liberated from all liability to the League or its funds. He desired that they had not any other object in view; and as soon as the Corn laws were repealed the League would be at once dissolved.

COACH ACCIDENT AT BIRSTAL.—On Monday evening last, about six o'clock, the Leeds and Birstall coach was overturned in a lane near the latter neighbourhood of Birstal. Several of the passengers were seriously hurt. One passenger had a fracture of the ankle joint; a clergyman, from Lincolnshire, had a compound fracture of the leg; and a third gentlemen, a fractured thigh.

AFFRAY WITH POACHERS.—A collision between the Earl of Suffolk's gamekeepers and two notorious poachers, took place about two o'clock on Thursday morning (last week), in the preserves at Charlton, near Malmesbury. It appears that the head gamekeeper, George Hawes, and his assistant, Thomas Fields, had discovered a great many wires set in a field, adjoining the turnpike road at Charlton. They watched them for some time, when two men came within thirty yards of them, and, finding they were seen they made off. The keepers pursued the intruders, and Fields overtook them, when they made a furious attack on him, and beat him severely about the head and body with large sticks. When Hawes came up, Fields was on the ground, the poachers still beating him. One of them made a thrust at Hawes with a spear which they had previously taken from Fields, and wounded him in the shoulder. Both men were recognised by the keepers; they are Edgar Walker and Ambrose Davis, two notorious poachers of Brinkworth.

THE YARMOUTH MURDER.—Yarham, the man accused of murdering Mrs. Candler, at Yarmouth, was apprehended on Saturday last, at Blakeney, in Gloucestershire. The warrant for his apprehension was issued on the testimony of the woman Dirk, who stated that Yarham had confessed to her that he was concerned in the murder.

MURDER IN LIVERPOOL.—On Saturday morning last, a girl named Jane Swift, inflicted a fatal wound upon a companion in misery, named M'Gill It appears that between twelve and one o'clock in the morning, Swift and deceased were carousing with a number of sailors in a public house in Tallystreet, a neighbourhood not of the highest repute in Liverpool. Some difference arose between them, Swift being very much excited, and declared that she would take the life of the deceased before morning. After some little time, Swift was calmed down, but, on leaving the public-house, the quarrel was renewed, and the deceased, some parties say, struck Swift a blow, whilst others say she only gave her a push, in order to get her out of the way. This was, however, enough for Swift, who was already much exasperated, and she made a stab at the deceased, inflicting a most serious in a dangerous wound on the side of the neck, near the collar-bone. The deceased staggered and fell down, but was immediately carried to a neighbouring house, where she died a short time afterwards. A surgeon was sent for, but arrived too late to render her any assistance. As soon as Swift had perpetrated the deed, she ran off, with the knife in her hand, and was pursued down Park-lane by several persons who were standing by. She called out to one of the women in pursuit that she would serve her as she had done the deceased, if she persisted in following her. Ultimately she outran her pursuers, was lost sight of, and succeeded in making her escape.

IRELAND.

O'CONNELL UPON THE MINISTERIAL CRISIS.—At the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday, Mr. O'Connell, after a brief allusion to the "Starvation Committee"—the name given by him to the committee appointed to inquire respecting the potatoes—made some remarks upon the present state of affairs, which were worth hearing. He said they were in a strange state of puzzle. Sir Robert Peel had become Minister in the interval, and he believed he was correct in saying that there was no Minister at that moment. That was the state of England. It should like wise be remembered that they (the Irish) could have no confidence in him. Last week he was a Leaguer; this week he may be a protectionist; next week he may be for something modified; and he no much attached to a sliding-scale, that he might get on a sliding-scale himself and slip through their fingers. (Laughter.) They were placed in a curious position. They had no Government, and no person could prec-ely tell who they could not tell why the Whigs did not form an Administration; they could not tell why the Tories ceased to be a Government. All they knew was, that both Whigs and Tories had quarrelled among themselves, and that they agreed upon nothing but to differ. There was only one point on which they were perfectly unanimous, and that was to differ amongst themselves. What was all that to Ireland? What was the real question to consider? The present crisis was most beneficial to Ireland. It raised their expectations. It gave them the certainty of success if they were true to themselves and to their country. (Cheers.) What cared they for Whigs or Tories. Their cause was the cause of Ireland. They were on a majestic march to nationality, and the changes and the shiftings of Administrations only excited in them more and more the that species of political tyranny that would debase them, dividing and separating them from each other. Every man should be a Repealer. That day week he concurred with Mr. Smith O'Brien, and he (Mr. O'Connell) was for Repeal, and no compromise. He repeated his words—he was in favour of Repeal, and no compromise—no postponement. (Loud and continued cheers.) Nothing should delay them in their career—nothing should drive them from the pursuit of their object. (Cheers.) He said that he would support Lord John Russell upon the Corn-laws, and that he would attend du ring the debate, and influence as many of the Irish members as he could in silence, to vote upon every division with Cobden and Bright. They knew that he had no great liking for Peel—he was well aware what kind of a boneyed trickster he was, but he was equally ready to support him on the Corn law question, and he would vote for him upon every motion that had for its object to make bread plentiful and cheap. (Cheers.) While he said this, he would do Lord John Russell the justice to say that he had proved himself in a position—a very prominent position—of the highest honour. (Hear.) Whatever his conduct as a Whig might have been, it was impossible to look at his behaviour and mode of acting respecting the Corn laws, without finding a kind of veneration for his person, and concurrence in his opinions. He had behaved himself admirably. His wont with him so far as he behaved himself well, and not one inch further. (Loud cheers.) If he (Mr. O'Connell) was for Repeal, and no compromise. He repeated his words—he was in favour of Repeal, and no compromise—no postponement. (Loud and continued cheers.) They knew that he had no great liking for Peel—he was well aware what kind of a boneyed trickster he was, but he was equally ready to support him on the Corn law question, and he would vote for him upon every motion that had for its object to make bread plentiful and cheap. He had behaved himself admirably. His wont with him so far as he behaved himself well, and not one inch further. (Hear, hear.) He did not let the taunt of inconsistency retard him from boldly and manfully abandoning his former opinion—(hear, hear)—and adopting that which would prove beneficial to his country. (Hear, hear.) It was not by assailing the conduct of the Whigs, nor was he speaking in their praise as a party, but he could not avoid speaking in terms of the highest commendation of their leader, who had vindicated unanimously, from friends to whom many martyrs to liberty, and the greatest friends to the constitutional freedom of the country, spring. (Cheers.) He (Mr. O'Connell) was ready to support Peel in any good measure he proposed for Ireland—no matter what it was—whether to repeal the Corn Laws, or cheapen provisions to avert the threatening famine. (Hear, hear). Now he would prefer Lord John Russell as Premier, and his party, to the Tories; because his belief was, that the first step they would take would be, immediately to provide food and employment for the Irish people. (Hear, hear; It was said by some foolish gentlemen that he would give up Repeal to feed the people. in fact, that he said so. Now, he said no such thing, for the alternative was not put to him, but if it was, he would, of course, have no hesitation in saying, "feed the people." (Cheers.) He would, if obliged to do one thing or the other, give up Repeal, but, as he said, such an alternative was not put to him, and the course he adopted, he believed, was the best support he could have afforded to Repeal. (Continued cries of hear and cheers.) He cared for neither Whigs nor Tories, and he would vote for any measure, no matter who brought it forward, if it was a good one; and he boldly challenged the Government, if they had not sense in power, to produce such measures, and see if he would not aid him in carrying them. (Hear, and cheers.) The rent for the week was announced to be £210 18s. 8d.

ANTRIM ELECTION.—On Monday, Sir H. B. Seymour was elected for the county of Antrim, without opposition, in the room of Mr. Irving.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXTRAORDINARY CHARGE OF MURDER, IN ESSEX.—During the last two weeks some excitement has prevailed in the neighbourhood of Dagenham and the western portion of the county of Essex, in consequence of a rumour having been extensively circulated that a respectable tradesman, named Thomas Dunsdon, a potato salesman, residing at Chadwell Heath, had murdered his wife by cutting her throat. The rumour first arose since as Oct. 30th, from a wound in her throat. A Coroner's inquest was held before C. C. Lewis, Esq., the county Coroner, and a verdict was returned that the deceased had committed the act while labouring under temporary insanity. A few day s after the inquest was held, a report was spread by some of the witnesses who were examined before the Coroner, that the act was not done by the deceased, but that the husband had cut her throat, and that they were prevented from giving such evidence before the Coroner as would have fixed Dunsdon with the commission of the crime of murder. This report reaching the ears of the Coroner, he deemed it right to take legal proceedings against the originator of the scandal, a person named Banham. On the 16th of the present month an information was made before Gerald Massiter, Esq., one of the county magistrates, and on the 17th since as Oct. 30th, from a wound in her throat. FRAUDS UPON RAILWAY COMPANIES.—At the Central Criminal Court, on Monday, Edmund Thomas Yeasell, who pleaded guilty some sessions back to the forgery of the Parliamentary deed of a railway company, and upon whom judgment had been respited, was brought up to receive the sentence of the Court. Mr. Baron Alderson said that the offence imputed to the prisoner, and to which he had confessed his guilt, was by no means unknown in these days of gambling speculations, and it was a crime of a very serious nature. The prisoner, interrupting the Court, said that at the time executed the deed he was unconscious that he was doing any wrong. He did it on a promise that he should have the written [illegible] Baron Alderson proceeded to say that the sentence which he had to pass upon him was the lowest term of imprisonment which the law imposed for the offence of which the prisoner had been convicted, and that sentence was, that he be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the House of Correction for two years.

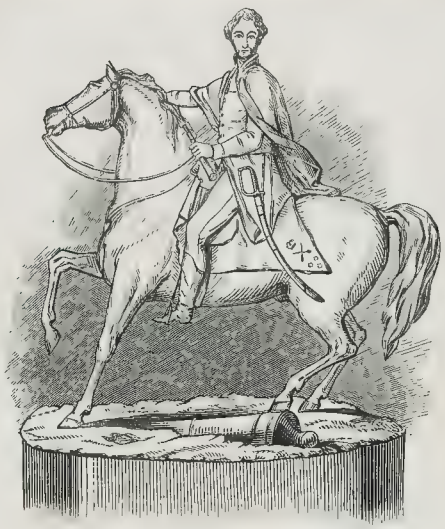
SUSPECTED CASE OF PARRICIDE NEAR MORPETH.—On the 16th inst. Inquest was commenced at Cockle park, near Morpeth, on view of [illegible] of Robert Joicey, a labouring man, aged about sixty-seven years sided at the place named. His family consisted of his wife, and a and son and daughter. The deceased, it appears, was taken ill after a large powder administered to him, which was left for him by an apparent strange man, in a rather extraordinary manner, at a public-house, two miles [illegible] This, and other circumstances, raised a suspicion that the deceased had been poisoned by one of his own family; and the inquest was consequently adjourned until the 10th instant. The man who delivered the poison was minded up, and his face was not seen by the person who received it, and he merely observed, in a low tone of voice, that it was medicine for old Joicey.. The packet bore this inscription :—"I make you a present for Joicey. Take this large powder in a glass of ale, or a glass of wine; and the remainder one in a little honey or jelly, the one at night and the other in the morning." One reason which induced Joicey to take the powder was in consequence of Dr. Henley, of Morpeth, not unfrequently having left medicine at the same house. Ralph Joicey, the son, who is a blind one, and who belonging to the Duke of Portland, having left for Newcastle on Saturday, was immediately followed by a police officer of Morpeth, who apprehended him at the residence of William Joicey, in Hutton's-court, Pilgrim-street, another son of the deceased, on the charge of poisoning his father. A Coroner's inquest has been held, which was adjourned for further evidence. The mother and daughter were afterwards taken into custody. The inquest was resumed on Monday. Several witnesses were examined. When the evidence was concluded, the Coroner put the case to the Jury, observing, that with respect to the male prisoner, they would labour under no difficulty, so that the chief point for their consideration would be whether the mother and daughter were implicated or not, as accessories. The Jury were absent about a quarter of an hour, and on their return found a verdict of "Wilful murder," against the prisoner Ralph Joicey, adding that in their opinion there was no evidence to criminate the female prisoners. The male prisoner was then committed to take his trial at the next General Gaol Delivery.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday last the Norwich train, which leaves at half past 11 o'clock for London, when within about two miles from Thetford, was run off the rail. The engine detaching itself from the train, rolled down upon the right of the embankment, killing the engine driver instantaneously, and bruising the stoker so much that he only survived a few hours. The carriages were thrown down on the left of the embankment, and although they must have rolled completely over, and the wheels been left uppermost, none of the passengers were injured. The general opinion at the time was that the great speed the train was going at caused the accident, as the preceding mile was done in 37 seconds. After two hours' delay the passengers and luggage exchanged trains, and proceeded.

CONFESSION OF THE GIRL CONVICTED OF MURDER.—Last week we gave a report of the trial and conviction of a girl named Martha Browning, for the murder of a very atrocious character, and although the evidence might be considered as of the most conclusive character, yet it will be some satisfaction to those who may have considered it almost impossible for such a person to have committed so fearful a crime, to know that, since the conviction of the wretched girl, she has made a full confession, and detailed all the circumstances connected with the horrible crime. Very shortly after she had been placed in the female capital-convict's cell, she appeared desirous to unburden her mind; and in the presence of the Rev. Mr. Davis, the chaplain, and the governor of Newgate, Mrs. Cope, she made a full admission of her guilt. No questions were put to her, or anything said to her to induce her to make such an avowal. Having admitted the perfect justice of her sentence, she expressed that it was her opinion that she ought to die for it, as a warning to others, she said that her only motive was a desire to possess herself of that which she believed to be a 25 Bank of England note, but which, as it turned out, was only a banknote for 5 pounds, and not a "Bank of Elegance." It should be stated that the prisoner can read and write very well; but she said that she never had an opportunity of full knowledge of the nature of the document, and she declared that there was only one note, and not two, as was represented at the trial. She said that, being determined to possess herself of the note, she considered the means of doing so, and at length resolved to take away the old woman's life, as being, she then considered, the readiest way of attaining her object, and that she would effect this by strangling her with the cord which was on her bonnet; and she fixed upon the handkerchief to carry her dreadful design into execution. Accordingly, she said, in the middle of the night she got up and cut a portion of the rope off, and then, with the deceased was asleep, she twice threw round her neck, and began to pull it violently. The old woman awoke, apparently from a sound sleep, in the agonies of suffocation—she struggled slightly, had sufficient presence of mind to exclaim, "Murder, murder what are you about?" as a expression which it will be recollected was spoken to by one of the witnesses, who occupied an adjoining room. [illegible] The prisoner continued to say that, when she had strangled the old woman, she then proceeded to search for the note, and inquired what was the matter. She was then standing over the dead body of her unhappy victim, and it was with great difficulty that she could refrain from screaming at the horrors of which she was the matter; and thus to induce the party to return to her room. She then remained upon the bed with the dead body until daylight, when she undressed the body of the deceased, and took the note and money of the poor old creature that which she believed to be the 25 note; and, without attentively looking at it, she placed it in her pocket, and considered that the means to escape detection of her horrible crime, and that the body might come across her to make it appear that the deceased had committed suicide. With a view to this she tied the cord in a knot, and then lifted the body from the bed and placed it on the floor by the bed side, in the position on which it was afterwards discovered. In the morning she gave an alarm, as appeared by the evidence, of the old lady being ill, and went out to inform her daughter of it, and to request that some would come to see her. Upon the prisoner being asked how she could have been strong enough to lift the dead body from the bed and place it upon the bed, she said, "I think the Devil must have helped me; but I did it." The prisoner then went on to describe the other circumstances narrated in the evidence, and said that the statements of all the witnesses were quite correct, with the exception of that of the surgeon, which she declared was not so in two particulars, wherein he stated that he was the first medical person who saw the deceased, and that when he did so her eyes were wide open; but she declared that his assistant saw her first, and that her eyes were closed, and her face appeared perfectly composed when he saw her. She then stated, that, having resolved upon the course she intended to pursue, she made her statement before the Coroner with a view to show that the deceased had destroyed herself, and which, as it turned out, had that effect, as the Coroner's Jury returned a verdict that the deceased destroyed herself while in a state of temporary derangement. She then said that she had discovered that the note was of no value, and she said she should never have attempted to make any use of it if she had not been pressed by the old woman's daughter and her husband to lend them some money, and she only went to the house with the pretended purpose to change it in order to pacify them, and on their thus insisting to know how she became possessed of it, she did not know what to do, and eventually told them the story about her having received it from some person in Bedford-street, in the Strand. When, she said, she found that the witness Gaze determined upon accompanying her to Bedford-street, she became quite heedless herself, and felt that she could no longer support her position, and from that moment her mind almost forsook her, and she did not recollect the incoherent expressions imputed to her by several witnesses, although she had no doubt she had made use of them, as she was resolved to admit her guilt. This was the substance of the statement; and after it was made she appeared a good deal more composed, and ever since that time she has appeared to increase, and she is evidently perfectly resigned to the fate that awaits her. The execution will take place on the 15th of January.

COLLISION ON THE NORTH UNION RAILWAY.—An alarming collision, productive of considerable damage, occurred on Monday night on the line of the North Union Railway. The six o'clock train from Preston had arrived between Wigan and Parkside, about four miles from the latter, when the passengers, of whom fortunately there were very few, were suddenly alarmed by a violent concussion, which threw all of them from their seats. At the moment of the concussion the second carriage from the engine was smashed in the front, one wheel being entirely broken, and the next or third carriage, in which was a gentleman, two ladies, and three or four others, partly fell on the left side, the opposite door having previously been broken in by some heavy substance. The train instantly stopped, the engine, which was also much damaged, being brought to a stand still. Fortunately no one was much injured. One lady fainted, and was with difficulty restored. As soon as the train stopped, the passengers, in very [illegible] alarm, which was increased by the darkness of the night, left the carriages by the aid of the lamps they could see, lying about in all directions. The wrecks of three or four coal waggons, which had somehow been left on the line, and with which the train had been in collision. Messengers were immediately sent with lamps in both directions to warn approaching trains of the impediments on the rails caused by the broken carriages. One carriage being on examination found not materially injured, all the passengers were huddled into it, and the engine conveyed them, at a very slow pace, to Parkside. The carriages which had suffered in the collision were necessarily left on the rails till sufficient assistance could be procured to remove them. The third class (quarter past six) and the eight o'clock train were consequently delayed for a considerable time. It is thought that the waggons must have become detached from some train, as they were so far from any station. [illegible] no doubt the directors will make prompt inquiry into the matter.



SILVER STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

SILVER STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

This beautiful Equestrian Statue of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, has just been executed in silver by Messrs. Widdowson and Veale, of the Strand. Its total height is 29 inches, and its weight nearly 200 ounces. The great Hero is supposed to be giving his last charge on the field of Waterloo—("Up Guards, and at them!")

The details of the costume have been copied from authentic sources; and the likeness is most striking. The ease and vraisemblance of the figure, and the execution throughout, reflect the highest credit on the artists.

We understand that this costly memorial of British valour has been executed to commission; and is now on its way to Calcutta.

HER MAJESTY'S IRON STEAM-FRIGATE "TRIDENT."

The Trident is the first Iron Steam-Ship-of-War ordered by her Majesty's Admiralty to be built. She was launched from Messrs. Ditchburn and Mare's extensive building-yard, at Blackwall, on the 16th.

Her principal dimensions are:—

Length, over all	..	..	200 ft. 0 in.
Length, between the perpendiculars ..	..	..	180 0
Length of the Engine-room	..	..	45 0
Breadth of Beam	..	..	31 6
Breadth over all	..	..	32 6
Depth in Hold	..	..	18 0

Burthen, in Tons, 900.

Engine power, 320 horses; oscillating cylinders, and tubular boilers.

Her principal armament is to consist of two long swivel guns of ten inch bore, one forward and one aft, to fire in line of keel, and four 32-pounder broadside guns. She was designed by the builders, and is considered to be an exceedingly fine and substantial vessel. Her ribs are double, each rib being composed of two angle-irons, 4 inches by 3½ inches, by ½ inch thick, rivetted together, and in one entire length, from the gunwale to the keel; there being of these double ribs 270 pairs. The iron skin is ¾ inch thick at the keel, diminishing upwards at the gunwale to ½ inch. The skin contains 1600 plates of iron, which are rivetted to each other, and to the ribs and keel, by 200,000 rivets. Each rivet was wrought red hot, and required the united labours of three workmen and two boys to rivet it in its corresponding hole.

The weight of the iron hull is 380 tons. The total weight of the ship, with her machinery, coals, water, guns, and stores for sea-going, is calculated at 900 tons. The load water-line is 10 feet 9 inches. The light or launching draught of water, as certified by the Government Inspector, was 6 feet 3 inches. The said light or launching draught of water, as calculated, was 6 feet 3¼ inches, being the displacement of 385 tons, the estimated weight of the iron hull; a degree of accuracy not often, we believe, attained in ship-building. The cost of the hull, with the machinery, as contracted, is £31,000.

The price of iron, when this ship was commenced, was £8 10s. per ton; the same material is, at this time, selling for £16.

OBITUARY

OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR JOHN CHETWODE, BART.

Sir John Chetwode, Bart., of Chetwode, Bucks, and Oakley, Staffordshire (at one time M.P. for Buckingham), died on the 17th, at his marine residence at Bognor, aged 81. He had succeeded to the title no less than sixty-six years ago, and, at the same time, had inherited extensive estates in the counties of Stafford, Buckingham, and Chester. His family was one of the oldest in England, being traced by some to a period antecedent to the Conquest. At a very early epoch, Robert de Chetwode founded the Priory of Chetwode; and, in the time of the Lion-hearted Richard, Sir Robert de Chetwode, Lord of Chetwode, received the honour of knighthood from that Prince, in Palestine.

The deceased Baronet, the son of Sir John Chetwode, the third Baronet, by Dorothy, his wife, daughter and co-heir of Thomas Brentnall, Esq., of Thorncliffe, married, first, in 1785, Henrietta, eldest daughter of George Harry, Earl of Stamford and Warrington, and had by that lady a very numerous family, of which the eldest son, John, the present Baronet, assumed, on his marriage with the eldest daughter of John Newdigate-Ludford, Esq., of Ansley, the prior and additional names of Newdigate-Ludford. Sir John married, secondly, in 1827, Elizabeth, daughter of John Bristow, Esq.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE.

James Archibald Stuart Wortley, first Baron Wharncliffe, of Wortley, in the County of York, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Lord President of the Council, Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and a Commissioner of the India Board, was born on the 6th October, 1776. He was son of the Hon. James Archibald Stuart Wortley, (afterwards) Mackenzie, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir David Cunyngham, Bart. Being a younger son, for his elder brother did not die till 1797, he was destined by his family for a profession.

After receiving his education at the Charter House, he, at the early age of fifteen, entered the army, and in his military capacity obtained credit and rapid promotion. He served in Canada, and at the Cape of Good Hope. Before 1797, he was a Captain, and acting commander of his regiment; the death of his elder brother, however, in that year recalled him home, to resign the life and profession of a soldier, and to assume the position of his father's heir apparent.

In 1802 Mr. Stuart Wortley commenced his political career as M.P. for Bossiney, in Cornwall; his first public act of note was in 1812, when, in consequence of the death of Mr. Percival, there ensued a lengthened negociation, somewhat similar to that of present occurrence, respecting the formation of a Cabinet. Mr. Stuart Wortley then moved, in a speech of acknowledged independence and spirit, an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he "would form a strong and efficient Ministry." Mr. Wortley continued to represent Bossiney till 1818, when, at the death of his father, he succeeded to the large family inheritance. He then naturally aspired to be member for the great county where he resided, and, at the general election in 1818, he was returned for Yorkshire, jointly with Lord Milton, now Earl Fitzwilliam. He continued to sit for this important place until the dissolution of Parliament in 1826, and in 1826 he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Wharncliffe.

In the political events which ensued after his elevation, Lord Wharncliffe did not take an active part until the agitation of the Reform question: that measure he opposed with great vehemence, ardour, and perseverance; he, nevertheless, attempted a negotiation between the friends and foes of the Bill, but, as every one knows, without the slightest success. In the Administration of brief existence formed by Sir Robert Peel, in 1834, Lord Wharncliffe was appointed Lord Privy Seal. His Lordship went out with his party in 1835, and acted prominently in the Opposition, until the return of the Conservative Government to power in 1841, when he became President of the Privy Council. His Lordship's family had at this time rendered essential service to the new Administration, in the successful result of the Parliamentary contest for Yorkshire, where Lord Wharncliffe's eldest son and Mr. Denison defeated the Whig candidates, Lords Milton and Morpeth.

During the Sessions of 1842, 1843, and 1844, Lord Wharncliffe was almost the leading Minister in the Upper House; the elevation, however, to the peerage of Lord Stanley, relieved him of much of his parliamentary labour. The distinguished earthly career of Lord Wharncliffe was rathersuddenly brought to a termination. The noble Lord, who enjoyed a robust and vigorous old age, and who had, though seventy, all the appearance of middle life, was taken ill about a week before his death; early on Thursday he felt better, but later on that day he became insensible, and expired the following morning, Friday, the 10th inst. The proximate cause of this fatal result was an effusion of blood or serum on the brain.

Lord Wharncliffe married, the 30th March, 1799, the Lady Elizabeth Creighton, daughter of the first Earl of Essex, by whom (who survives him) he leaves one daughter, married to the Hon. John Chetwynd Talbot, and three sons, the youngest of whom, the Hon. James Stuart Wortley, is a Queen's Counsel, M.P., and Attorney-General of the Palatinate of Lancaster. Lord Wharncliffe is succeeded by his eldest son John, now second Baron Wharncliffe. This nobleman, who was born in 1801, married in 1825 the Lady Georgiana, third daughter of the Earl of Harrowby, and has issue three sons and two daughters. His Lordship, until his father's demise, was member for the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Lord Wharncliffe descended from a branch of the Stuarts, Earls and Marquises of Bute: the second son of the third Earl of Bute, the Hon. James Stuart, father of the nobleman whose death we record, succeeded to the estates of his mother, the Baroness Mount Stuart, only daughter of Wortley Montagu, Esq., and took the name of Wortley in 1795; he subsequently inherited the estates of his uncle, the Right Hon. J. S. Mackenzie, and assumed, in 1803, the additional name of Mackenzie.

THE LATE LORD WHARNCLIFFE.

The late Lord Wharncliffe was great grandson of the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montague, an interesting edition of whose letters he published a short time ago.

JOHN WILLIAM SMITH, ESQ.

The names of the leading orators at the bar are ever familiar to the public, but there is another eminent class in that learned body, whose fame, though often more lasting, scarcely passes beyond the knowledge of the legal profession: we mean the writers upon law. The subject of this notice is a strong instance of this. His death has occurred without general remark, and yet in him has perished, by an early fate, one of the greatest authors on the subject of the common law since the days of Blackstone. John William Smith was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple, the 2nd May, 1834, and was latterly attaining extensive practice on the Oxford Circuit, and in the Courts of Westminster. But he has already acquired a high reputation by his "Compendium of Mercantile Law," a perfect model of purity of style, clearness of expression, and extensive knowledge in legal compositions. His other principal work was one entitled "A Selection of Leading Cases," a book now essential to all students, and, indeed, to every one practising at the common law bar.

Mr. Smith also wrote some less extensive treatises; all his productions went through several editions. The extreme toil and energy that these labours required, were too much for his delicate constitution, and during the last year it was evident to the eyes of his brethren in the courts that the learned gentleman was rapidly declining under his exertions. But no warning or advice could induce him to desist, and nearly to the last, he was to be seen at Westminster, with business in hand, and yet a mere shadow. He died of consumption, on the 17th inst., at his chambers, 2, Mitre Court-buildings, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. His untimely demise is the subject of deep and general regret to all belonging to the Law. His amiable disposition, and unobtrusive manners had endeared him to the Bar, and his genius was such as to render him an irreparable loss. The funeral of the lamented gentleman took place on Wednesday last: the hearse, with a procession of carriages, leaving the Temple for the place of interment, at Kensal-green.

METROPOLITAN CHURCH OF ST. PAUL, AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

The foundation stone of the Metropolitan Church of St. Paul, Auckland, was laid by his Excellency Governor Hobson, on the 28th July, 1841, eighteen months after the first establishment of the Colony. It was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of New Zealand, on the 17th March, 1844; having, however, been previously opened, for the purpose of public worship, on the 7th May, 1843. The edifice is very substantially built of bricks manufactured in Auckland, the ornamental parts of the exterior being completed in dark grey stone, found in the neighbourhood.

The interior is floored, and is provided with neat open benches, similar in character to those which are often met with in English cathedrals. There are no inclosed pews. One third portion of the sittings are "Free;" and the whole are calculated to accommodate 600 persons.

It is intended that the lower part of the Tower should be fitted up and appropriated as a Vestry.

A Gallery at the west end forms part of the original plan; and the necessary arrangements were made, in the erection of the building, for its completion at a future time, but, hitherto, the funds of the Church have not been sufficient for that purpose. The walls of the building are still unplastered, and must remain so, until a sum for the purpose of completing the interior can be raised by private subscription; which, in the present state of the Colony, it is feared will not be for some time.

The sum required would be about Three Hundred Pounds.

The Church is very beautifully situated on a hill overlooking the whole town and harbour, and forms a very striking object in the distance immediately on entering the port.

The entire cost of the building, up to the present time, has been Two Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty-six pounds, nine shillings and nine pence, which has been provided for in the following manner:—

	£	s.	d.
Raised by private subscription among the inhabitants	933	1	0

(It is very creditable to the good feeling of the inhabitants of Auckland, that

* The interest on this loan, and one hundred pounds of the principal have since been repaid to his Lordship, from the pew rents received by the Trustees.

it was one of their first cares to provide a suitable edifice for the celebration of the public worship of the church; and that, in a colony which has been little more than five years in existence, such a building should have been erected. Should any of our readers take interest in the completion of the edifice, our Correspondent, as a Trustee of the Church, will be happy to afford them any information; and, on his return to the colony, in about two months, will take charge of any contributions which may be intrusted to him, and which shall be, immediately on his return, religiously appropriated to the purposes for which such aid was intended. The name and address of our Correspondent are left at our office.)

MUNIFICENCE OF THE EARL OF ELDON.—The Earl of Eldon has given £1000 to each of the following societies in connexion with the church in the counties where the noble Earl's estates are situate—the Salisbury Diocesan Church Building Association, the Gloucester and Bristol Diocesan Church Building Association, and the Durham Diocesan Society for the Employment of additional Curates. It is said, these splendid pecuniary gifts are as a "thanks-offering" for the birth of a son and heir to his title and family property.

WILL OF THE LATE MR. IRVING, M.P.—The will of the late John Irving, Esq., M.P. for Antrim, was proved, a few days ago, in London, by his nephew and sole executor, John Irving, Esq. It was made in August, 1845, and he therein confirms a testamentary disposition executed by him according to the law of Scotland, whereby he devised his estates at Newfield, in Dumfries, North Britain, to his brother-in-law, Alexander Currie, for life, and, at his decease, to John Irving Currie, the son of the said Alexander Currie, and his heirs. All other his estates in Scotland he leaves to his said nephew, John Irving, and appoints him residuary legatee, subject to a provision for the payment of certain annuities and legacies; and, amongst other bequests, he leaves to his nephew, J. Davidson, £300 a year, and a legacy of £500 to his children. To his nephew, W. Davidson, £200 a year; also several legacies of £500 to nephews and nieces. To his partners, Sir John Rae Reid, Bart., George Reid, and James Milligan, £100 each, and he has remembered other of his friends with similar bequests. The personal estate in England, within the province of Canterbury, was sworn under £300,000, which is independent of his property in Scotland and Ireland. The hon. member died at his residence, Richmond terrace, on the 10th ult., at the age of seventy eight.

NEW FRENCH PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

On Tuesday, this newly-erected edifice, in Bloomsbury-street (late Plumtree-street, (St. Giles's), was consecrated, with the accustomed ceremonies, by the Lord Bishop of London. This church was originally established by King Charles II., in the year 1661, in the Savoy Palace, Strand; has been re-constructed on its present site by the descendants of French Protestant refugees, the ground being granted for that purpose by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

The new church has been built from the designs of Mr. Ambrose Poynter: it is in the early English style: the principal front has a large and lofty window, flanked by two smaller ones; and the gable is surmounted by an enriched cross. At the opposite end of the edifice is a low campanile, or bell-tower. The premises adjoining are in corresponding style; and have a pierced Gothic parapet, &c.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN CRIPPLEGATE.

A very pleasing celebration of the season was given by the London Mission Society, at the Temperance Hall, in Milton-street, City. It is the aim of this Association not so much to relieve want by alms, as by sound and kind advice and interest, to keep alive that good understanding between the different and much separated classes of society; in furtherance of which the Society maintain schools, promote meetings for mutual instruction, give popular lectures, &c. They have, this season, besides their usual places of meeting, in Spicer-street and Half-moon Alley, engaged the spacious Hall in Milton street, Cripplegate, for religious service on Sunday evenings, and lectures on Wednesdays. It is part also of the plan to give treats occasionally to children in the summer, by excursions into the country; and in winter, by evening meetings, with singing, the exhibition of the magic lantern, &c.

On Christmas Eve as many as 400 children assembled in the Hall, with their teachers and friends; and, whoever saw their happy little faces, and heard their shouts, needs no further proof of their enjoyment, which was crowned especially by the exhibition of a German Christmas Tree, or Tree of Love, which was erected upon the stage of the Hall. This is the usual mode of celebrating the Eve of the birth of Christ, in Germany and on the Continent. In almost every family, is set up this pleasing figure, having the resemblance of a growing tree, loaded with a profusion of fruits and flowers; and, upon its branches, the different members of the family suspend the little presents which they intend for those they love best; and on the exhibition of the Tree, the presents are claimed by the donors, and handed, with compliments, to their friends.

On Wednesday evening, the children of the Mission hung a load of oranges and other fruit on their Christmas Tree, besides hundreds of other presents; the whole being illuminated with a myriad of candles. As they were successively handed to the children by the guardians of the Tree, they presented the gifts to their friends and schoolfellows. We were much pleased to notice that the first present was made by a pretty little girl to the venerable senior Missionary, the Rev. R. K. Philp, who presided over the festival.

CHRISTMAS TREE.

Before and after the exhibition of the Tree, the magic lantern was shown; and the amusements were enlivened by some pleasing singing. Then the children were addressed by the Missionaries; by Mr. W. Wansey, the Treasurer of the Society; by Dr. Bateman, the Secretary; and by several of the Teachers of the different Schools. The fruit was then taken from the Tree, and distributed amongst the delighted children; and thus terminated this simple celebration of Christmas Eve in Cripplegate.

LITERATURE.

THE HISTORY AND ANTIQUITIES OF BRENTFORD, EALING, AND CHISWICK. By THOMAS FAULKNER. Simpkin and Co.

The veteran author of this work had previously produced the histories of Chelsea, Fulham, Kensington, and Hammersmith; so that he has contributed largely to the topography of the Metropolitan County. He has been labouring some forty or fifty years in the vineyard, wherein he has, for the most part, resided; and the fruits of his toil may be received as careful record made in the precise localities.

CHISWICK CHURCH.

The present volume bears ample instance of the topographer's industry and method, notwithstanding his great age; and it is plain that his book is not a mere labour of the library; for, he has evidently collected his materials in the "highways and by-ways" of his district. To the resident clergy he expresses his obligations for their aid in the parochial history: he thanks others for their contribution of original accounts of eminent persons; and specially those gentlemen who have granted him access to the Records in the Tower, and elsewhere a mass of materials which has already thrown so much new light on the ancient state and succession of property in this country.

Probably, no portion of our metropolitan environs is more abundant in interest than that section of the valley of the Thames wherein lie Brentford, Ealing, and Chiswick. We do not refer so much to historical events as to the interest which the district has acquired from its having been the birth-place and abode of many persons of varied eminence. Brentford was the scene of fierce religious fires in the reign of Queen Mary; "the Battail at Branford," in 1642, between Prince Rupert and the Parliamentarians, is matter of "old pamphlet" notoriety, and the documents fill several pages in Mr. Faulkner's volume; where, too, we have a list of the County Members of Parliament, since the date of their first election at Brentford in 1700-1, previous to which, elections for Middlesex were held on Hampstead Heath. Among the curious extracts from the Parish Books at Brentford, are details of the Hobby Horse, Robin Hood, Maid Marian, and other May games; Hocking at Whitsuntide; Scholars Begging by License; King James's famous Book of Sports; Expenses of "Conveying away Witches;" Keeping the Parish Armour; all interesting traits of manners and times long past. Then, the celebrity of Brentford Butts, and its archery scenes are not forgotten; we have a sort of anecdotic chronology of the Middlesex Elections; and there remain at Brentford the house of Sir William Noy, the great crack-up [illegible] the Duke of [illegible] Hyde Park Corner, and the [illegible] Brentford, too, lived Mr. Bingley, a [illegible] Ashton, which so delighted Dr. Johnson, that he presented her with a copy of his Rambler. Notwithstanding its numerous factories, Brentford is healthy, holding a middle place in salubrity between the metropolis and the agricultural districts.

At Ealing lived Mr. Orme, the historian of Hindostan, the friend of Sir Joshua Reynolds and Sir W. Jones; and the Manor House was tenanted by Dr. Dodd, a trio time of his arrest for forgery. At Ealing House lived William Roscoe, the classical author of "Pizzo Sorro's Letters." At Little Ealing lived Dr. W. King, General Dimsdurie's; Dr. Farrer, Bishop of Rochester; and Dr. John Owen, the independent Dean of Christchurch, and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford, who, "instead of being a grave example," went about in quarto, "with powdered hair, snake-bone bat strings, with very large tassels, lawn band, a large set of ribbands tied at his knees, and Spanish leather boots, with large lawn tops, and has hat mostly cocked."

Gunnersbury Manor (Ealing) was once the property of the celebrated Sergeant Maynard, the best old book lawyer of his time, who practised at the bar more than sixty years, and nearly outlived this law itself. The Manor House, built by Webbe, son-in-law to Inigo Jones, was pulled down in 1800 or 1801, having been for many years the summer residence of the Princess Amelia: it was a fine old place, with a profusion of gilding and marbles, carvings, and polished oak floors, pavilions and temples, gardens laid out by Kent, planted with goodly cedars, &c.

On Castlebar Hill, about a mile from Ealing, was the seat of the late Duke of Kent, which his Royal Highness quitted in 1812; and about two years after, the premises were sold piecemeal by auction: we are not surprised at this, for the situation is but moderately inviting. In one of the villas on Castlebar Hill, resided the gallant defender of Gibraltar, General Elliot, afterwards Lord Heathfield. At Pitt's Hanger lived Thomas Edwards, the friend and friend of Richardson, the novelist; and at Fordhood, at the eastern extremity of Ealing, Fielding, "The Cervantes of England," sojourned during the last mournful year of his life. In Hanger-lane, Charles Dibdin wrote many of his best songs, in a house now occupied by Sir Francis Sykes Chiswick is traditionally said to be named from a large fair for cheese, annually held in the field called the "Cheese Downs," nearly opposite the Duke of Devonshire's; and in ancient writings, the name is spelt Cheswick, or Cheswick. Dr. Stukeley shows the great Roman Road from Regnum (now Chichester) to Pontes, (now Staines) to have passed through Chiswick; and Mr. Faulkner confirms the finding of the old Roman Causeway in 1834, in what is now Gold Hawke-road. Our veteran author dated the civil wars at Chiswick, and the Parliamentary Army at Turnham Green. But this medieval brevity, Reading, and Acton excepted, we suspect Turnham Green to be better known by Goldsmith's witticism of sending sale peas to the locality. College House, Chiswick, appears to have been a sort of nurseries for Westminster boys and their masters. Busby lived there, with some of his scholars, in 1657: and the names of the celebrated Earl of Halifax, and John Dryden, were once to be traced on the walls of the school-room. Ralph, who is damned in the Dunciad, translated this macabre, which is now Mr. Whittingham's printing-office. In Chiswick Lane, too, lived Dr. Rose, almost the only bottlehman whom Dr. Johnson loved and respected. Dr. Rose, in conjunction with his kinsman, Dr. Griffiths, established the Monthly Review. Among Rose's visitors were were Johnson and Rousseau; the two Misses Berry, to whom Walpole bequeathed a little Strawberry Hill; Moore, the author of the Gamester; and the elegant Arthur Murphy. Faulkner's description of Dr. Rose is a pleasant piece of literary gossip, throughout. Here, too, died Viscount Macartney, who is buried in Chiswick churchyard. Sir Stephen Fox built a large mansion here, which no daughter, King William the Third, that he said, on visiting it, "this place is perfectly fine; I could live here five days;" and he paid Burlley no higher compliment. The garden was improved by Evelyn, who oddly remarks, that the orchards were "mean, hilly and thick." This fine old place was pulled down in 1812, and the grounds added to Chiswick House Gardens. Mr. Faulkner gives us a memoir of Sir Stephen Fox, and his portrait, as a frontispiece: among his boys was the parish, or a sage parlia round-house), a pair of stocks, and a whipping post. At Walpole House, on Chiswick Mall, some 60 years since, Daniel O'Connell was studying hard for the bar. There have been, in more than 80 years past, two capital breweries at Chiswick, and some of its "gentlemen's tokens" are treasured in the British Museum.

Chiswick House—the Duke of Devonshire's Palladian villa—occupies the site of an Elizabethan mansion, which was mortgaged by Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, to mean up his daughter's marriage-portion. The present Chiswick House was built by the Earl of Burlington, from a villa by Palladio, near Vicenza, and, like all the Earl of the century, so that Lord Harvey's remark, that the house is too small to inhabit, and too large to hang one's watch," is not merely a piece of humour. Fox and Canning died in the former in a small tapestried room, in which hangs a portrait of Pope; the latter in a dissolute back apartment. Mr. Faulkner has judiciously devoted an entire chapter to the description of this unique villa and its treasures of art; and the grounds and gardens, the [illegible] productions.

In the lane leading from the town to the Horticultural Society's [illegible] Pond lies Hogarth's the mansion, "Hogarth's House," remains, as Walpole's engraving of the painting moralise: he sleeps at Chiswick churchyard. Holland, the architect, lives at the corner of Burlington-lane; his father was a baker, which occasioned Foote to say, pointing, on his return from Holland's tomb, at Chiswick, that he had been to see "poor Holland pushed into the family oven."

Chiswick Church is described by Mr. Faulkner very minutely: he gives many pages of ancient inventories and inscriptions, epitaphs, monumental and benefactions. The living is a vicarage, the present vicar being the Rev. T. F. Bowerbank, M.A. We quote Mr. Faulkner's details of the church, to accompany our illustration, from a recent sketch:—

"This church is dedicated to St. Nicholas, who was believed by our Norman ancestors to be propitious to mariners, merchants, and [illegible] men, and hence many sacred edifices upon the sea coast adjoining great rivers, put under his protection. The general style appears to have consisted originally only of a Nave and Chancel, and was built probably about the beginning of the fifteenth century, at which time the tower was erected at the charge of W. Bordes, Lord of Chiswick, who died in 1447. This is evident from an inscription on a label placed against the west wall of the Nave of the church. There are six bells in the tower of which bear date anno 1650. The tower, which is built of stone and flint, is eighty feet high, and is surmounted by a lofty twenty-eight feet high and is crowned with a figure of St. Nicholas, the patron saint. The Chancel is the only part of the ancient church now remaining, and is built with stone and flint. The interior of the church presents a handsome and uniform appearance, as all the last general repairs in the year 1818, the galleries were enlarged, and the whole was painted to resemble wainscot. The pulpit is judiciously placed against the east wall of the Nave, and is handsome and painted uniform. The chancel is covered with crimson velvet and gold fringe. The church is lighted by twelve windows, placed in the north and south walls, and at the west and east ends of the Nave. The body of the church is fifty-eight feet long from east to west, and sixty-five feet wide from north to south. The chancel is lighted by a large Gothic window at the east end, one circular headed window on the south side, and two on the north side: it projects directly from the body of the church to which it is connected by a Gothic arch. It is thirty feet long, by fifteen feet wide. On the north side is the Duke of Devonshire's family pew, which he occupies. Over the Master of Burlington, the Duke's organ was first opened on Sunday, the 9th, 1797, with the overture and chorus from Solomon, which was sung by Mr. Braham."

In the church, in the Earl of Burlington's vault, is interred the illustrious Kent, a painter, architect, and the father of modern gardening.

In the churchyard was De Loutherbourg, the Royal Academician; here too, is Hogarth's tomb, and the monument to Jacob Tonson and Garrick; and an elegant and elaborate tomb erected by Lord Burlington, to the memory of his favourite dog, Trimmer. Here, also, rest Ugo Foscolo, the Italian poet; Bittler, the marine engraver; &c.

The closing chapter of Mr. Faulkner's volume is occupied by details of Turnham-Green, wherein he points to the southern side as the spot upon which "the army of Essex, after the fight at Brentford, marched to Turnham-Green, which succeeded the battle of Brentford."

At Heathfield House—demanded in 1837 lived Sir Brownlow Cust, the Duchess of Devonshire, Lady Cavendish, and Lord Heathfield: but only a few fragments of the mansion remain, and the grounds are now a wilderness. Of other fine old places, and their distinguished tenants, we find some pleasant anecdotic sketches; together with a brief description of the Horticultural Society's Gardens.

We trust that we have said and quoted enough to show that Mr. Faulkner's is a very amusing work, and highly deserving encouragement. He announces it as the slave-taking of his antiquarian studies; and we are happy to see the subscription-list headed by the Royal Library, Prince Albert, and the Duchess of Gloucester.

THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH. A Tale of Fairy Home. By Charles Dickens.

As a part of the impression of our Journal of last week, we presented to our readers some delightful preliminary sketches from the new creation of Mr. Dickens's genius. The book has since passed, by thousands, into the public hand, and its main story is rightly enacted to a closely-packed audience; so that its merits have already been pretty accurately estimated; which will supersede our saying much upon the ma[illegible] beyond our last week's appetizer, by way of [illegible].

It is story, then, is not "a mangled yarn," but a thread of extreme simplicity. The characters move in humble and middle life, and the incident is a mistake which, for a time, ruffles the peace of a contented circle, but is eventually cleared up to the satisfaction of [illegible].

The characters [illegible], a Carrier, a good-hearted man, who, by the way, [illegible] and, at other times, shrinks from a joke: then, we have [illegible]'s wife, a [illegible] bustling, active little body, much younger than her husband, but very fond of him, and as proud. Their maid-of-all-work, Tilly Slowboy's business, is to nurse the infant Fanny Ringle; she is a foundling, but not a foundling; and her character, though only a[illegible] in the book, is, perhaps, the most original. There are two other remarkable [illegible] agencies, a Carrier's establishment; Boxer, the cart-dog, and a Cricket, [illegible] name to the story, and, in the [illegible] of its tuneful [illegible] supplies the slight machinery of the [illegible].

Indeed, a sweet domestic superstition. Tilly is, likewise, a pleasant [illegible] pathos and drollery; and the jargon in which she talks to the infant is broad in print, and somewhat of the Gampish order; and will be co-extensively relished.

The Carrier has a neighbour, Old Tackleton, a curmudgeon-like toymaker, who vents his misanthropy in hideous toys, "to rear the tender mind" to disagreeable notions of its species: this, too, is a quaint conceit, with a lesson in every line. As a set-off, we have a benevolent old fellow, Caleb Plummer, Tackleton's foreman, who has a blind daughter, Bertha. The other characters may be mentioned incidentally.

The work is written in three "Chirps." It opens with a Shandean scene—a sort of match, or trial of skill, between a [illegible] Kettle and the chirping Cricket. We are then introduced to the Carrier's wife, Tilly, and baby: home [illegible] Carrier, bringing with him a strange passenger, disguised as an old [illegible].

He, however, proves to be Edward Plummer, supposed to be dead, who has assumed this disguise to watch May Fielding, his early love, about to be married to Tackleton, a man blinded by the splendour of a fortune, rather than personal identity. Dot, the Carrier's wife, is in Edward's secret; the mischief [illegible] possess circumstances which lead the Carrier to suspect his wife. Also, in an agony of jealousy, he is about to shoot the stranger (Edward) in bed-room, but is checked by "The Cricket on the Hearth," who [illegible] up a vision of Dot's domestic virtues, and thus exposes the Carrier's wrath. He is further satisfied by Edward appearing with May, whom he has rescued from out of Tackleton's clutches, whilst Edward is welcomed by Caleb as his son from "the golden mines of South America," long supposed to have been dead. Caleb, and his daughter, Bertha, create a sort of episodal interest: he is a poetering, distraught old soul: his affection for his daughter is so intense that he almost creates a world for the poor blind girl, and so conceals from her his miserable situation, as to make her believe Tackleton to be the reverse of what he is—a benevolent man; and so far has this deceit succeeded, that poor Bertha falls in love with the kind benefactor. The scenes between the fond father and the credulous child, are touchingly beautiful. But, the mastery of the tale lies in the struggles between the Carrier and his wife, which abound with strong domestic feeling, such as has never been surpassed in any of [illegible] English worth. Dot is throughout an impersonation of the [illegible] the Carrier merely "lumbering, slow, and honest," but [illegible]; and the commonplace ennobled by the [illegible]. Yet, with this poetic creation alternate the old familiar phases of [illegible] the domestic miseries of the fertile-filling and boiling, and [illegible], so to speak, are as perfect of their kind as any member of [illegible] Ethnological Society could desire.

As a whole, the present work falls somewhat short of the author's "Christmas Carol," but is very superior in tone and feeling to his volume of last year. He has selected the verse, which would estrange rich and poor, though it affects to aim at bringing both together. We are heartily glad of Mr. Dickens's rejection of this troubled and troubling spirit, and we think it is a judicious step; his popularity was founded in pourtraying the amenities of life, and it will not be extended by sharpening its asperities or exaggerating its enormities.

The story is inscribed to Lord Jeffrey. It is liberally illustrated, and among the artists are Mr. Leech and Mr. Stanfield: we have scarcely think the usual English frontis[illegible] and title-page appropriate to a story of an English home.

Spirit of German Poetry. By Joseph Gostick. Smith's Standard Library.

This is an admirable addition to this valuable and well-selected series of works. It is a collection of specimens of the German poets of all ages, from the days of the Nibelungenlied and the Minnesingers, down to the present period. The introduction is fairly written; and throughout the work we are pleased to note the absence of that exaggerated admiration which some have expressed for the poetry of the Germans. The biographical notices are short, and the analyses given of the style of each writer are clear and intelligible. The more elaborate notices of Goethe and Schiller are exceedingly well executed. In the extracts throughout the book, the labours of some former translators have been appropriated, but the great bulk of them are by the author. A few specimens of the modern political poetry would have given a completeness to the "Spirit" of German Song; but altogether the book is the best, as it is certainly the cheapest, work on the subject that has ever appeared.

The European Library. D. Bogue.

The excellent "beginning" of this series has been well followed up by a new translation of Guizot's History of the English Revolution of 1640, which, "previous to the French Revolution, was the greatest event which Europe had to narrate." Still the work is better characterised as the history of the reign of Charles I., from his accession to his death; and, even considering the multitude of books written upon this eventful period, M. Guizot's work is a truly valuable contribution to history, and by its lucid comprehensiveness is especially adapted for a Series of Books for popular reading. The translation, by Mrs. Hazlitt, is stated to be as nearly as possible in the author's own style. The quotations from Rushworth's Collections are given by the author, and a copious index, denote the translator's editorial diligence. The volume is illustrated with an engraving of Charles I., from Vandyke's portrait in the Pembroke collection.

POLICE.

THE ALLEGED MURDERS ON BOARD THE SHIP "TORY."—COMMITTAL OF CAPTAIN JOHNSTONE.

On Tuesday, at the Thames Police Court, George Johnstone, the captain of the ship Tory, was once more examined, charged with the murder of Rambert, Reason, and Mars, and also of attempting to murder and wounding the crew.

Several witnesses were heard, who deposed to facts which for the most part are known.

John Lavie, surgeon of the Westminster House of Correction, gave evidence as to the state of the crew when the Tory arrived. He said he examined, on the night of the men being committed to prison, Nelson, Guy, and Barton. This was on the evening of the 17th. The others, of whom he had the names on a paper before him, he examined next day. The three first men appeared scarcely human; their wounds had not been dressed or washed for several days; their hair matted and clotted, and they were in pain. By his orders they were put into the infirmary. The next morning he made a particular examination of all the men. The witness then read a paper which he drew up at the time, and signed. It stated that Nelson had an incised wound on the scalp, and another on the collar bone and back of the neck. The side of the neck and face was burned and disfigured as if by gunpowder. There were several contusions on other parts of the body. Guy was the worst wounded, having his head scored in several directions with wounds. His face was much disfigured with gunpowder, and he had several wounds on his shoulder. There were about twelve other of the crew who were wounded, some of them very extensively, but the two named were the severest cases. Allison had a severe wound, by which his ear was almost separated. The wounds had, however, healed very readily, and might be considered more extensive than severe. This was the substance of the written paper. The witness continued, and said he examined the captain after he was taken into custody. Witness found a punctured wound on the back of the leg. Since then it had been attended with severe erysipelas inflammation. The captain was much depressed when he was taken, and in a bad state of body which might have been the cause of the inflammation. The prisoner had no symptoms of recent drinking. The wound named was the only one.

Alexander Sinclair, the carpenter, next called, was examined respecting the origin of the transactions on board the ship and relating to the death of Rambert.

Other witnesses confirmed the statements already given.

Beresford, Curtis, Tucker, Blackdon, Spence, Glover, and Allison, being the remaining portion of the crew that had not been examined on the fourth charge, were then called in custody. Mr. Hayward confined the examination to the actual injuries each had received from the captain, without going into the general case on which evidence had already been fully taken. Beresford said he had got two cuts over the head, and one on the wrist, and was made to kiss the sole of the captain's foot. Curtis stated that he had been cut in several places about the head and body with a cutlass, all hands being down in the cabin at the time. Tucker deposed that on the evening of the 9th of November, he had been called down to the cabin, and ordered on his knees, and that, while in that position, he was fired at by French, through order of the captain, on the face, the captain standing at the time, with a cutlass over his head. He was afterwards cut and fired at while on deck. The statements of Spence, Blackdon, Glover, and Allison, were of a similar character.

Mr. Broderip, then addressing the prisoner, informed him that, after a long and careful examination, it was his painful duty to commit him for trial at the ensuing session of the Central Criminal Court, on three separate charges of murdering William Rambert, chief mate of the ship Tory, Thomas Reason, second mate, and William Mars, common sailor; and also on the charge of feloniously cutting and wounding the crew of the same ship.

A Dashing Swindler.—On Monday, an unusual degree of interest was created at Marylebone office, in consequence of it having been the day appointed for the re examination of Frederick William Kelly, alias Captain Kelly, who is charged with having obtained fraudulently a sum of money from Mrs. Oakley, a dressmaker, residing at No. 76, Lisson grove North. There is a probability that, on a future day, full and complete proof will be given, that, through the instrumentality of a dashing equipage, and a lady [illegible] whom he was accompanied in his rides and drives, he has succeeded in carrying on a system of plunder to a very considerable extent. On Monday a great many new charges of swindling were preferred and substantiated, and one of the victims was a young and interesting lady, who was introduced to leave her parents, and live with him as his wife, though she is very young, and he is a man fully 60 years of age. He was again remanded till Monday next, that other parties may have an opportunity of coming forward. He was, at first, very confident in his manner; but when he saw the mass of evidence against him, his spirits failed him.

Fire at Liverpool.—A dreadful fire broke out at an early hour on Monday morning in the extensive iron foundery of Messrs. Shaw, Wilson, and Wiley, in Liverpool. The alarm was first given about three o'clock; the flames spread rapidly, and all efforts to arrest their progress were assertive until the roofs had fallen in, and the first floor burned through. The building is completely gutted, and at present only the four outer walls are standing. About 300 workmen are thrown out of employment by this catastrophe. The damage is estimated at nearly £30,000. Many valuable patterns were destroyed and all the machinery. The insurance is said to amount to only £3000 in the West of England office.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

In the month of December—and, as it were, on the threshold of another prosperous year—we are again enabled to make one of those joyous announcements to our readers, which are ever sources of pleasure to ourselves in the proportion in which their fulfilment tends to the profit and enjoyment of the Public, "for whom we live"—or, at least, of that portion of it with whom we are in weekly and friendly communion.

The perfect honesty of principle and purpose with which this Journal has continued its career, has maintained for it the undeviating confidence of those who placed reliance upon its early promise, and have had no reason to regret their trust. This is our boast; and it will be seen that we uphold our right to it.

It was in this spirit that—destined little to profit, but much to please—we prepared those magnificent commemorations of our early patronages, and afterwards confirmed prosperity—the Grand View of London—and superb Panorama of the Thames—presented, at fitting intervals, to our readers.

It is in the same spirit that now—towards the close of our Seventh Volume, and another year—with foot firm in the stirrup—gratitude inspiring, and confidence insured—we announce our intention to present our readers with Noble Pressents, in appropriate form, and with the best genius and illustration that modern art can afford, and without a thought of expense,

MAGNIFICENT PICTURES

OF THE

PRINCIPAL CITIES OF EUROPE.

It is not more our determination that their production shall surprise all who receive them, than that the faithful Illustrations themselves shall become so many records and monuments of what the good-will and hearty friendship of the public enabled the first Illustrated Newspaper in the Nineteenth Century to achieve. Edinburgh and Dublin put forth their sister claims with London; and we may well aspire to reflect on a grand scale, the Chiefest Cities of Europe, when not Europe, nor any territory short of the whole known world, is able to affix a limit to our circulation.

The whole details of our plan, in presenting these Magnificent Pictures to our Subscribers, will be immediately placed at their disposal. For the present, we are glad to believe that there is not one of them who will not feel confidence and pleasure in its plain ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Number of our Journal, with the Presentation Print, price 6d. No extra charge will be made. The first Print, a View of the City or Dublin, will be presented early in the ensuing year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber," co. Wexford.—The number of subscribers to the London Art Union is uncertain. We beg to repeat our reply to a Correspondent last week.—In answer to our Correspondent and several other Subscribers, respecting the chance or legality of a Sham Lottery, put forward by an obscure weekly journal, we are induced to offer one or two observations, to put thoughtless people on their guard against parting with their money. As to the plan of numbering receipts, and appearing to issue them to the public four every it would be to give "a fiction!" many thousands of these receipts; and, in case of any one of such receipts being the number entitled to a prize, of course the public would not know the actual position of the holder! From beginning to end, the scheme is illegal; and no one claiming a prize could recover it. The whole is, therefore, "a delusion, a mockery, and a snare!"

"Argentus."—See No. 176 of our Journal.

"J. L.," Peckham.—"Czerny's Exercises" are published by Cocks, and may may be had of any music-seller for 8s.

"A Son of Erin."—Dr. Crotch's Lectures "are published in ten volumes, at 15s. per volume, and one supplementary book for 6s

"Kenmelise," Guildford.—The Hon. Mrs. Norton is the authoress of the words of "We Have Loved and Losed Together," and the music is arranged from a sonata by Herz.

"Pudsey."—If our Correspondent dislikes the Jew's harp, let him try the Trionic Cymbals, or Drum, which latter is chosen by the Barrel Organ; others, the Flute. It is rarely difficult to point out "what musical instrument may be acquired without the aid of a master." so much depending on the aptitude of the person to learn. To begin with a Penny Trumpet may turn out a Harper, but we can, at all events, recommend "Pudsey" to take Dr. Johnson's advice, and not try the Violin, which the learned lexicographer declared to be the arena of sin.

"A Constant Reader."—1. Tickell is the author of the stanza quoted. 2. The mistake of Scott is accounted for by Mallett having written a poem on the same subject of "Edwin and Mary." Both were founded on old ballads. 3. The poetry of "The Nation" has been published in a separate form. 4. The best modern maps are those of the Useful Knowledge Society. 5. We are not aware of a detached pronoun. Montgomery Martin's Colonial Library contains information for the colonies separately.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1845.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE CONSERVATIVE MINISTRY.

Our readers will recollect that some time since we intimated the probability that Lord Ellenborough would accept office under the administration of Sir Robert Peel. Such an event, we have reason to believe, will now take place very shortly. We also mentioned that Mr. Gladstone would return to the Ministry in a more important position than he had before occupied. This statement has proved to be perfectly correct; for, as will be seen by an announcement elsewhere, Mr. Gladstone is now Colonial Secretary, in the room of Lord Stanley. The Ministry is completely re-established, and, although we do not affect to know the exact proposal which will be submitted to Parliament respecting the Corn-laws, we have heard from a well-informed source, that the principle of the commercial policy to be pursued will be to repeal all protective duties. We believe that Sir Robert Peel will take a general review of the whole fiscal system, and preserve only those duties which are necessary for the purposes of Revenue.

The Correspondent from whom we derive this information assures us, that no proposal for a total repeal of the Corn-laws at once, will be made; but that the duty will be gradually lessened for five years, and will then totally cease. There are reports that some compensation will be made to the Landed Interest, for any supposed loss from the repeal of the Corn-laws, but it is, however, that this compensation will be made, not in money, but in the shape of relief from burthens. For instance, that the county rates will be charged on the Consolidated Fund, and some other concessions made, to decrease the burthens of which the Agriculturists complain. One great feature of the plan, we believe, will be the repeal of the Malt-tax.

Though offences must needs come—and causes of them particularly abound in the intercourse of nations and states—we are always glad when one is escaped which was thought inevitable. From the tone of President Polk's Inaugural Address, it was thought that his first Message to Congress would have been an intemperately worded document; the anxiety respecting it was somewhat increased by the unsettled state of political affairs here at the time it was expected. In both respects, circumstances have proved more favourable than was anticipated;—the Ministry is formed, and the Message itself is moderate in its language, though firm enough in the substance of the demand on the point on which the greatest anxiety was excited. But nations are more apt to be offended with the manner in which a demand is made, than with the substance of it; and, at all events, when no bad feelings have been roused, the demand itself can be better considered. Altogether, the President's Message is better than most of those written by his predecessors; its style is remarkably clear, flowing, and easy, without either obscurity or verbiage. It includes explanations and statements on numerous questions, two of which, Oregon and the Tariff, are of the utmost importance here. The annexation of Texas is treated as an event of the past, and a warning is given to all European Governments not to interfere with the increase of the American territory by any of their old or new colonial notions. To a certain extent we agree with Mr. Polk, that any interference with the development of the Republic of the Great Western Continent, would be uncalled for, as it would not affect either the peace or the interests of Europe. But when an European State has a territory that may be absorbed in the process of that development, she is bound to interfere for the preservation of her own power; unless, like Mexico, she is too weak to do more than protest, or has suffered her territory to become American to all intents and purposes by neglect. The case between England and America on account of Oregon, is one of territory—perhaps a very worthless one—but not the less capable of being made the subject of war: it is no meddling or uncalled for interference, which would be the case if any other state unconcerned in the matter took part in the dispute. The proposition of Mr. Polk is to terminate the present convention by a year's notice, and then, apparently, trust to the influence of American occupancy and American law; but this will be unsatisfactory on both sides, and we cannot but believe that two nations so remarkable for the possession of clear common sense will be able to effect an honourable compromise. The value of the whole territory in fee simple would not be worth the expense of one year's war; a quarrel, too, about territory is worthy only of a barbarous age. We can understand that between civilised nations such a thing as a war may spring from invasion; Europe, Christian as it is, may yet see a war of principles; but to kill and slay about boundaries and landmarks at this time of day, would be indeed to retrograde. We hope to see this dispute settled by another Ashburton Treaty, and so we trust do many on the other side the Atlantic. The other part of the Message most interesting to us is that relating to the Tariff, and Revenue, and Protective Duties. In the discrimination he makes between these kinds of duties, Mr. Polk appears to great advantage. His remarks might be read with profits by statesmen nearer home.

POSTSCRIPT.

SHIPWRECKS AND LOSS OF LIFE.

The fearful gales from the N.W. and N.E. that have prevailed for the last week, have occasioned the most distressing casualties off all parts of the coast. We regret to announce that intelligence has been received of the loss of upwards of thirty coasting vessels, as also many homeward bound foreign ones, with valuable cargoes.

In the Channel the effects of the gales were truly frightful. At Ilfeford, on Friday night, two vessels were totally lost; within sight of the shore; and both crews, with the exception of one man, perished. One was a brigantine, named the Adon, belonging to Brixham, laden with iron; and the other's name, at present, has not been ascertained. Her loss took place on the Braunton Sands. In the vicinity of the coast of Strumble Head and Cardigan Bay, the casualties were of a most fearful character, up wards of forty lives having, it is supposed, perished on board one vessel.

A disastrous and total wreck took place on the rocks in Cemaes Bay on the north east coast of Anglesey. She was barque rigged, about 400 tons burthen, and called the Frankland, Captain E. C. Friend, master, laden with hides, sugar, cottom, and other merchandise, and was lost within a few hours sail of her destination (Liverpool) after a favourable passage from Bahia. It is reported that the amount of the loss of the ship and cargo will exceed £20 000.

Along the same coast, off Pwllheli, Aberystwith, and Portrudlem, a number of other casualties happened, though not of so melancholy a character.

A collier was lost on Friday (last week), near Bowcastle, and is supposed to have been from Bideford. Her unhappy crew acted bravely to save her, but it was utterly impossible; and, at ten o'clock at night her cables snapped, and she was carried amongst the rocks, where she soon became a wreck. All belonging to her, excepting one man, met with a watery grave. The poor fellow remains in such a state as to be unable to furnish any facts concerning her loss.

The effect of the gale on the north eastern coast, from the mouth of the Thames to Scotland, appears to have been as disastrous as in the Channel

At Redcar for three days it blew with terrific violence, and on Sunday evening a vessel, supposed to be the brig Commerce, of Stockton, Mr. Lister master, foundered in the southward of the Huntcliff, and every soul of her crew perished. A vessel, seeing her go down, bore down to her in the hope of picking up some of the unfortunate creatures, but none were to be seen. She had sailed from the Tees on the previous Wednesday, for Aberdee, laden with coals, and the inference is that the captain, finding the gale continuing, endeavoured to return, and in doing so met with her unfortunate loss.

On the Dutch coast, near Norden, where the gale was fearful, another wreck, of an appalling character, occurred, viz., the total loss of an English vessel, supposed to be the Sedona, from Jersey. The number believed to have perished is fourteen or sixteen.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has most graciously condescended to intimate her intention of patronising a Grand Fancy Fair and Bazaar, which will be held on the occasion of the Opening of the New Hospital for the Relief and Diseases of the Chest, the foundation stone of which was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert in June, 1844. The Bazaar will take place early in the forthcoming spring.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The Gazette of last night contains a proclamation calling upon Parliament to assemble on Thursday, the 22nd of January.

DEATH OF SIGNOR GIUBILEI.—We are sorry to announce that Signor Giubilei, the vocalist, formerly of the Opera House and Drury-lane Theatre, died lately at Naples, where he had gone, in hopes of improving his health, but, in consequence of a second operation for the dropsy, he sunk under it, at the residence of his sister. Madame Giubilei (the clever dancer) has been left (in London) to lament the loss of a kind and affectionate husband

FUNERAL OF LORD WHARNCLIFFE.—The remains of the late President of the Council were removed yesterday (Friday) morning, at the early hour of five o'clock, from Cuzon-street, May fair, to the terminus of the Birmingham Railway, Euston-square, for interment in the family vault, near Worsley Hall, Yorkshire. The procession to the terminus consisted simply of the hearse and two mourning coaches.

RATING OF PRINCE ALBERT'S FARM AT WINDSOR.—A paragraph appeared in our impression of the 13th inst. on the subject of the rating of the farm held by his Royal Highness Prince Albert in the parish of Windsor. Mr. Melvill, solicitor, of Windsor, having been professionally employed by the overseers and churchwardens of the parish to endeavour to obtain from his Royal Highness the payment of arrears of Poor rates, amounting to nearly £240, and not having succeeded, after a correspondence with Mr. G. E. Anson, the Prince's private secretary, on the subject, the parochial authorities determined to memorialise the Prince himself on the matter in dispute. Accordingly, a memorial was drawn up, couched in the most respectful terms, to his Royal highness, pointing out the great losses which had been sustained by the parish, during the past twelve or fourteen years, in consequence of the vast number of property that had been occupied by the crown and churchwardens of the parish to endeavour to obtain from his Royal Highness the payment of arrears of Poor rates, amounting to nearly £240, and not having succeeded, after a correspondence with Mr. G. E. Anson, the Prince's private secretary, on the subject, the parochial authorities determined to memorialise the Prince himself on the matter in dispute. Accordingly, a memorial was drawn up, couched in the most respectful terms, to his Royal highness, pointing out the great losses which had been sustained by the parish, during the past twelve or fourteen years, in consequence of the vast number of property that had been occupied by the crown which had been purchased by the Crown, and, consequently, now unrated; and, showing, at the same time, in the opinion of the inhabitants in vestry assembled, that his Royal Highness, instead of being a benefactor to the parish Farm, was about to be rated to the relief of the poor equally with those who were compelled to pay the Poor's rate upon property adjoining that occupied by the Prince. A memorial has just been received by Mr. Darvil, written by Mr. G. E. Anson, by command of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in which it is stated, in effect, that the Prince still declines to make a quality of the matter by Prince Consort, and adverse to the expectations of the parishioners. A Vestry Meeting will be immediately called for the purpose of laying the case and the opinion of the law officers before them, as well as the correspondence which has passed between Mr. Anson, on the part of the Prince, and Mr. Darvil, on behalf of the parochial authorities; in order that they may come to some final decision on a subject which has created great excitement throughout the borough.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—The annual general meeting of the governors of this useful charity was held on Monday at the Dispensary. Resolutions were passed thanking the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, the King of the Belgians, and other branches of the Royal Family, for their support and patronage; also to the surgeon and directors; Mr. Curtis, for his attention to the patients under his care. Mr. Curtis briefly returned thanks, and afterwards exhibited a variety of new and useful preparations with which he became acquainted while visiting the French and German Hospitals, and which he has found very useful in cases of chronic and lingering asthma.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—The latest Paris papers all agree in the expression of their satisfaction at the inability of Lord John Russell to form an Administration. The Journal des Débats publishes a Royal Ordinance abolishing the octroi of Lyons and flour through Fos, St. Beat, St. Mamet, and Bagneres, in the department of the Upper Garonne, and through Arreau Genest, Arreguinet, Gavarnie, Cauterets, Argeles, Vielle, Gedre, Luz, and Argeles, Prince Albert announces the sale of the Hazebrouck and the Pampoux line of Railroad to the Great Northern Company. This arrangement is said to be very advantageous to the latter Company. The opening of the Chambers is looked forward to with great interest. Letters from Algiers of the 17th state that the troublesome Bou Maza has at length been killed. He is said to have been surrounded by a French column, and cut to pieces.

THE UNITED STATES.—The packet ship Europe, Captain Forbes, which left New York on the 5th inst., and the Boston packet ship Concordia, which left on that date, arrived at Liverpool on Thursday morning. The papers received, however, contain no news of interest.

"LUNAR RAINBOW."

(To the Editor.

I noticed, in the last number of your valuable Journal, a few remarks respecting the appearance of a "Lunar Rainbow," on the night of Dec. 3rd last. With all due deference to your Northwich Correspondent, he errs in his judgment with regard to its being a lunar phenomenon; the setting moon, at that time, occupying an oblique position, to an imaginary line drawn from the two extremities of the arc.

I subjoin the following from my own observation in this city (Norwich). The day preceding the appearance was very stormy; between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, some very dark clouds arose from the south west, accompanied with heavy showers of rain, and loud thunder. At about half past eight in the evening, two streams of whitish light were observed, one from the E.N.E., another from the W.S.W., which soon began to form a regular arc above the horizon, at an elevation of 60 deg., like a rainbow, having its centre in the direction of the magnetic meridian. I did not appear to be the result of decomposed light, no trace of colour being visible; but, to be connected with the Aurora Borealis, at that time, spreading its luminous radiations above the northern horizon. The arc possessed all the brilliancy, as well as transparency, of that species of electric light, and continued, without doubt, its connection therewith. It began to disappear at a quarter past nine, gradually growing fainter, till it vanished entirely at about half-past nine.

A SUBSCRIBER, &c. &c.

[We have also received a corrective communication on the above subject form T. H., Great Malvern; and from E. B., Wotton, describing it as a display of the Aurora Borealis.]

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

RAILWAY MANŒUVRES.—In the Court of EXCHEQUER, on Tuesday, a case was tried, Lemort v. Heath, in which the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant the sum of £429 10s., paid by him to the defendant on the purchase of 280 scrip certificates of the Kentish Coast Railway Company, and which disclosed facts of a somewhat unusual character. It appears that in the month of November, 1844, a company under the title of the Kentish Coast Railway Company, for making a railroad from Dover, Deal, Walmer, and Sandwich, to Herne Bay, with a branch to Ramsgate, was projected by Mr. John Curling, solicitor, of Waterloo-place. Several gentlemen of respectability were induced to become provisional directors of the proposed scheme, on the distinct understanding that they were not to be called upon for any portion of the preliminary expenses. In due time offices were taken in New Broad street, and a prospectus was issued detailing the advantages of the undertaking. In the February of this year the allotment of shares took place. There were to have been 16,000 shares, at £25 each, the deposit on each being £1 7s. 6d. Some time afterwards the Board of Trade published a report unfavourable to the project, in consequence of which the parties who had obtained shares did not seem over anxious to pay in their deposits; these deposits were paid only on 533, for which scrip certificates, issued at the Company's offices, were given The scrip deposits were signed by two of the directors, and countersigned by a Mr. Richard Edwards, who had been appointed secretary by Mr. Curling. The whole amount of the deposits did not exceed £7625, while the sum that should have been paid to bring the Company within the terms of the act of Parliament and enable it to proceed was £16 000. Upon that the directors came to a resolution not to proceed further with the scheme, and not to issue any more scrip. But, notwithstanding that resolution of the directors, the Kentish Coast Railway scrip appeared in the market at a considerable premium. The plaintiff, through his brokers, who were persons of great respectability, purchased some time in April 280 shares, for which he paid £432 10s., the sum now sought to be recovered from the defendant, who was the seller of the shares. Upon the winding-up of the affairs of the Company, the directors agreed to pay back £1 per share to those who had paid in their deposits, reserving 7s 6d. per share for the preliminary proceedings. The plaintiff soon discovered that the shares he had purchased did not entitle him to any return, no deposits having been ever paid upon them, and the directors repaying them as aforesaid. Upon inquiry it turned out that Mr. Curling and Mr. Richards, without the knowledge or sanction of the directors, had the engraved plates, from which the scrip certificates were struck, altered; so that it required only to be signed by the secretary; and not, as before, by the secretary and two directors. The scrip thus altered found its way into the market, and was sold at a premium; and it was scrip of this spurious character upon which no deposit was ever paid, or, if any were paid, none was received by the Company, that was sold to the plaintiff as the scrip and shares of the Kentish Railway Company. The purchase was made in June, and it appeared that the defendant, who was a broker of respectability in the City, was himself ignorant of the kind of scrip he sold, he thinking at the time that he was dealing with the genuine article. It was under these circumstances that the plaintiff now sought to recover back the amount of money so paid. It was contended for on the part of the defendant, that the directors of the Company were bound by the acts of Curling and Richards, and that the scrip, though not signed by the directors, was really that of the Company. It was also contended for, that a party selling scrip in the market cannot be understood as guaranteeing it in any sense of the term. Such a construction would be ruinous to thousands.—The Lord Chief Baron, in summing up, told the jury that jobbers in scrip were in the same condition as dealers in any other article. The thing contracted for must be the thing delivered, or else the seller will be liable for the purchase-money. Here, if the defendant agreed to sell 280 scrip in the Kentish Coast Railway Company, and delivered that which, in fact, was not the scrip of that Company, he would be responsible for the amount received in the transaction to the purchaser. The question for the consideration of the jury in this case was, whether the scrip sold by the defendant to the plaintiff was the scrip of the Company, or of Curling and Richards? If the scrip were that conceded by Curling and Richards, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover; but if the defendant did not perform his contract, he must have entered the article that had been contracted for by the plaintiff.—The jury not being able to agree, retired, and having remained in till nearly the rising of the Court, returned with a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount, £432 10s.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The France announces its receipt of a letter communicating the news of the death of the Shah of Persia, Mouhammed Mirza, who succeeded to the throne of his grandfather in 1834. He was the son of Abbas Mirza, who died in 1833. The France adds, that a civil war had broken out after the death of this sovereign, as there were not less than five claimants to the throne; but the capital is said to have been tranquil, a regency having been organised under the influence of the Russian and French Ambassadors.

The Feuille du Commerce de Port-au-Prince contains an official notification of the transfer of the seat of Government from Port-au-Prince to Cape Haitien.

The King of Bavaria has issued a decree abolishing the custom of compelling his Protestant soldiers to kneel on the passing of the host, and declaring that, on the occasion of the procession outside the church, on the day of the Fête Dieu, none but Catholic soldiers shall attend.

A letter from M. Rondot, one of the commercial delegates, to M. Lagrené, dated Canton, September 5, contains the following: "Arsenic is known here in all its shapes. It is used in agriculture, for killing the worm which destroys the young shoots of the rice plant. The Chinese Pharmacopœa has also its Brucillers. Four days ago, on the beach of Canton, near Tchoukiang, a Chinese girl, between eighteen and twenty years of age, was arrested for poisoning, with arsenic, her father, and her mother, and sister-in law. This unfortunate creature was literaly dissected alive. They began by cutting off her breasts; then, in succession, her nose, her eyelids, her ears, and so on, the other parts of her body."

A Cornwall (Jamaica) paper announces the rather sudden death of the Rev. William Knibb, so universally known as the head of the Baptist Western Union, and as the leading member of that persuasion in that part of the world.

Constantinople letters assert that the Turkish Ambassador to England will probably be Halil Pacha, but that, at all events, Chekib Effendi cannot receive one in his appointment, being disqualified by his conge in the Lebanon from holding so honourable a post

A letter from Berlin, of the 13th, states, that the King of Prussia has authorised the building of a second Catholic church in the capital, and permitted a collection to be made for the purpose in all the Catholic churches in the kingdom, without prejudice to the sum which his Majesty intends to give privately.

A letter from Vienna of the 18th says that the Duke de Bordeaux had arrived in that city a few days before, and dined at the Court. On the following day he returned to Frohsdorf. The Duchess d'Angoulême was passing a few days at the Court, and had been present at the opera of Don Sebastien in the Royal box with the Empress-Mother.

Accounts have been received from Tahiti to the middle of August. Admiral Seymour had arrived at Papeiti, in the Collingwood, and saluted the flag of the Protectorate.

The celebrated Belgian violinist, Vieuxtemps, solemnly renounced the other day the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, and became a Lutheran. The solemnity took place in one of the churches of Frankfort.

Letters from Monte Video, of the 31st Oct., state that Oribe then retained its position, but it was supposed that he would not be suffered to occupy it much longer. Paraguay, it is said, has declared war against Rosas

The Viceroy of Egypt is about to found at Cairo a school of the Fine Arts. The chief object in creating this institution is, it is said, to diseminate amongst his suiects a taste for the study of all things relating to Egyptian architecture. It is reported that M. Garnaud, a French architect, is to be placed at the head of this institution.

The Augsburg Gazette states that a revolutionary plot has been discovered in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, whose object was the seduction of a whole battalion of Tuscan troops, in order to invade the Roman States. Twenty men of this battalion have fled.

Accounts have been received by the Admiralty of the Polar expedition under Sir John Franklin, up to the 16th August, when they were on the South Coast of Greenland, above Gilbert's Sound. They would probably winter near this spot, or at the Arctic Islands, the wintering place of Parry, amongst the Esquimaux; as the state of the ice and the advancing season, would prevent much further progress being made this year.

The Diario da Roma of the 13th instant, announces the arrival of the Emperor of Russia at Rome, on the preceding day. His Majesty alighted at the Palace Gustiniani, the resi. ence of the Russian Legation. The Emperor remained for the title of General Romanoff.

Letters from Palermo state, that the Emperor Nicholas had received from the Imperial Crown Prince a despatch, expressive of the most serious apprehensions for the internal peace of the empire. The system of vigorous persecution and proselytism practised of late by the special direction of the autocrat had created universal discontent, not only in Poland, but also in every province of Russia. The Emperor, after reading that despatch, threw up an ukase, which he immediately forwarded to St. Petersburgh, directing that the operation of that system of intolerance and persecution be suspended for six months.

The German papers state that Ronge returned to Breslau on the 3rd inst. When he left Dresden a dense crowd surrounded the carriage; matrons and young girls showered nosegays and garlands upon him profusely, and he was repeatedly obliged to stop to shake hands with one and another of his admiring friends. Professor Wigand sat in the carriage with the Reformer, and a cavalcade of carriages conveyed him for some distance on his homeward way.

THE POULTRY PALACE.

Why here at Christmas time of year
They hang out game for luck O,
For—like unto a new built house—
It is all over stuck O.

And yet it is not ev'ry house
That's stucco'd in this manner,
For there are skins enough outside
To satisfy a tanner!

It seems that ingenuity
Has stretch'd its every nerve,
For game is here hung out a leap
Just like a game-preser e.

And yet they are hung out to sell—
"Ah! look upon that front, Sir;
'Tis there—'tis there—you catch your hare,
And hav'n't long to hunt, Sir!"

Then as for birds—you look and long,
As if to say, "Have at you!"
You shoot your gold—the birds are sold,
And there's your Christmas bolt'ue;

Come, fill your bag—from roof to flag
The poultry things are pending;
Ewill you play, this Christmas Day
The game of money-spending!

Down Holborn Hill the 'bus rolls fast,
Protected by its drag, then;
But at its foot you cry avast,
And there your game you bag then.

You see a house—where geese and grouse
Are thick as any clover;
You cry—my eye—it is all up,
And so it is all over!

NEWGATE MARKET.

In olden time, the mode sublime
Of giving men a treat,
Was much, I think, to make them drink,
Which was consider'd meet!

But Temp'rance now has changed, I vow,
All Alcohol and Yeast;
And those who once would buy a butt,
Now go and buy a beast!

So meat—yes, meat—instead of drink
Being very much adored,
It takes its Christmas lodging now
Upon the festive board!

So, evermore as Christmas comes,
Men like it and they lark it;
And, just to practise their new gait,
They go to Newgate Market!

Well, here it is—with grease enough
The kingdom to anoint
Ha! who can say, this Christmas day
The Times are out of Joint!

Joint! Joint! why here are joints enough,
Without a single ache,
To make to-do, all Christmas through,
With Boil, and Roast, and Bake!

All nations truly, I do think,
In this Meat market join
See Frenchmen stir, and pas loin, Sir,
From buying a Sirloin!

POULTERER'S SHOP, HOLBORN-HILL.

Ribs, ribs by thousands, every kind
Of British beef is there
A lady buys a monstrous round,
To send to Russell square!

Mutton—Ah, yes, in every form
Upon the light it drops;
The horseman eyes his saddle, and
The beggar smacks his chops!

And though even crippled pensioners
Stick fast to wooden pegs;
The reckless butchers in this mart
Are selling their last legs.

Fat runs to law—that is to say,
With legal eyes men view it;
And lawyers, as they pass that way,
Keep running in to sue it!

Veal, veal, Oh, veal, we leave to Peel
The common weal or woe;
But isn't it sweet to see the meat
Adorned with mistletoe!

And doesn't it look, hung high on hook,
Quite greaseful near the holly,
And when we pay, oh doesn't the tray
That bears it home look jolly.

By day or night this mart is light,
Oh let no mortal dark it;
For in Christmas time it seems sublime,
To buy at Newgate Market!

THE NORFOLK COACH.

Ah! coaches once were all the go,
With passengers a top;
Now, that would not be safe—because
The nation's let them drop!

They used to roll so very fast,
Like suicides, I deem;
The horses didn't know the risk
Of getting up the steam!

But now the steam has got them down,
And Science has proved trickey,
For that which once was all a coach,
Has now become all dickey!

Nor friends nor folk—the Norfolk Coach
Could drive from its abode
That may arrive in London, for
It's still upon the road!

It is a Christmas coach, I vow,
And whirls along in pride;
For all its outside passengers
Are food for the inside.

Turkey and pullet ride and tie
Game, poultry, cheek by jowl;
I wonder who was geese to pay
The fare for so much fowl!

But only think when they're at home,
Admired, pluck'd, and spitted,
On tables free, how they will be
To highest ranks admitted.

With bottles broach—"the Norfolk coach,"
As good a toast as heard is,
And long live they who feast to-day
Upon its Christmas "birdies!"

NEWGATE MARKET, ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

C H R I S T M A S .

THE SONG OF LEADENHALL MARKET.

What ho! for a Christmas marked
For selling of good cheer—
If such you want, my merry friend,
I'd have you mark it here!

A noble character it has—
No better could befal—
And, certes, it must have great weight,
For it is Leaden hall!

To Grub street once did poets roam
To spend their little "duc,"
But this is the more honoured home
Of all the people's grub!

Ha! whither wend you, traveller,
As City-wards you bie?
I dare to guess you're going to Change?
"You're wrong, I'm going to—buy!"

The market wide of Leadenhall
I seek as I m a sinner,
Where people make a Christmas din
In buying Christmas dinner.

Why all the City I declare
Has thither swept its tide,
Behold its Poultry and the crowd
That walk on its Cheap side!

Come buy! buy! buy! the tradesfolk cry
With emphasis quite clever,
Oh bi! bye! bie! by! boi! bi! buy!
Ma'am now's your time or never!

Alive, aloud, the cheerful crowd
The merry tradesman hear,
Nor will his joke the fair provoke
"It's very cheap my dear!"

Chirp! chirp, chirp, chirp, my destin'd birds,
Of chirping there's no death;
Not Dickens' self will more produce
From "Cricket on the Hearth."

Fat fowls! although in basket now,
And so behind a wicket,
Your's going near the hearth, I trow,
For any thing but Cricket!

Long rows of ducks! eternal ducks,
That half the market fill;
Tho' Arthur Dux hath giv'n the word
Of "No more ducks on drill."*

Geese! geese! fat geese of every hue,
Brown, green, grey, black, and murky;
With din dons that might well dine dons;
Oh most tremendous Turkey!

Hare, pheasant, plover, pullet, pig—
Pig makes the mouth look smile-ish,
Fresh from the sty—in every eye—
And looking rather sty-lish!

Well, here's enough our frames to stuff—
Enough in rhyme and reason;
Get great and small, from Leadenhall,
Prime seasoning for the season.

* The Duke has issued an order this week against the wearing of ducks by soldiers.

NORFOLK COACH.

And as your Christmas fare you buy,
And hear the seller boast it,
That best of cheer may rule the roast,
Why take it home and roast it.

And when your buying's spread, and fed
Your friends, where you're a dweller,
Then ring and make your DINING-ROOM
At once receive your CELLAR!

"Our Artist has most picturesquely portrayed four of the characteristics of a London Christmas; or, rather, of its hospitable indications of abundance of good cheer. Here we have the great Newgate Meat Market, where is sold large proportion of the million and a half of sheep, and two hundred thousand head of cattle, which are annually consumed in this vast metropolis. Next is a scene from Leadenhall Market, the great place for poultry, game, and rabbits; the returns for which, in one year, equal half a million of money. Leadenhall is, likewise a large meat market. It is related that Don Pedro de Ronquillo once said to Charles II., that he believed there to be more meat sold in Leadenhall Market alone in one week, than in all the kingdom of Spain in a year.

The Poulterer's Shop, on Holborn-hill, a few doors from Farringdon-street, is another of London's wonders at this festal season, when the whole house front is covered with poultry, game, and rabbits.

The Norfolk Coach may almost be termed a relic of other days, so nearly has the railway locomotive superseded the stage coach. There are many of these vehicles to spare for such purposes as that shown in our Illustration; where geese are inside passengers.

A GOSSIP OF CHRISTMAS.

"Why, gentlemen, do you know what you do Ha! would you have kept me out? CHRISTMAS!—Old Christmas—Christmas of London, and Captain Christmas! Pray you let me be brought before my Lord Chamberlain; I'll not be answered else. "'Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all." I have seen the time you have wished for me, for a merry Christmas, and now you have me, they would not let me in: I must come another time! A good jest—as if I could come more than once a year. Why, I am no dangerous person, and so I told my friends of the guard. I am old Gregory Christmas, still; and, though I come out of Pope's Head-alley, as good a Protestant as any in my parish." So "Rare Old Ben" ushers in Father Christmas in his Masque, "as it was presented at Court in 1616. 1616! The year of Shakspeare's death, and of Oliver Cromwell's entry at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. And after Old Father Christmas, in his round hose long stockings, close doublet, high-crowned hat, with a brooch, long, thin beard, truncheon, little ruff, white shoes, with his scarfs and garters tied cross, and his drum beaten before him," follows the merry motley train of his sons and daughters, Misrule, and Carol and Minced pie, and Gambol and Wassail and New Year's Gift. And there sits the old pedant of a King, and laughs heartily, for he loves a jest, and has a peculiar weakness for Ben's Masques, tho' at times a shade comes across his face, for his favourite, Ker, Earl of Somerset, and my lady of Essex, were found guilty of atrocious poisoning only last year, and there is a foul secret connected theretherewith, and the King's name has been bandied about somewhat irreverently. But still it must have been a merry night at Whitehall, that Christmas night. We can fancy the blank dismay of the Court of Queen Victoria, whom, God preserve, were Prince Albert to take it into his head to revive old customs, and have a Christmas masque at Buckingham Palace, with the contributors of Punch to write it and Mr. Planché to superintend the costume. The pen is not so much under the control of the sceptre as it was in James's day, and unwelcome truths and hard facts would be peeping out from under the Vizard, which not all the Lord Chamberlains in Christendom could quite put down. Masquing himself from the Court to find a popular asylum in the theatre, and the broad jests of the Pantomime have superseded the classical conceits of the Elizabethan play wright.

LEADENHALL MARKET ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

The outward glory of Christmas has departed. The Lord of Misrule no longer makes his appearance; "the grand Captain of Mischief," as Philip Stubbs, the Puritanical anatomizer of abuses, calls him. "This King," says the manichæal worthy, "cometh forth verie gorgious, forty, threescore, or an hundred lusty guts, like to himself, to wait upon his lordly Majesty, and to guard his noble person. Then every one of these men he inviteth with his liveries of green, yellow, or some other light wanton colour; and, as though they were not gaudy enough, they bedeck themselves with scarfs, ribbons, and laces, hanged all over with gold rings, precious stones, and other jewels. This done, they bring about either leg twenty or forty bells, with rich handkerchiefs in their hands, and sometimes laid across over their shoulders and necks, borrowed, for the most part, of their pretty Mopsies and their loving Besses. Thus, all things set in order, then have they their hobby horses, their dragons, and other antiques, together with their pipers and thundering drummers to strike up the devil's dance withal." And as the pious but narrow hearted Puritan goes on in his description he waxes warm in zeal, until, at last, he drops into downright abuse, very edifying no doubt to all well disposed minds of the time. "Another sort of these fantastical fools bring to these hell hounds, the Lord of Misrule and his accomplices, some bread, some good ale, some new cheese, some old cheese, some custards, some crackenels, some cakes, some flawns, some tarts, some cream, some meat, some one thing, and some another." Only let Mr. Philip Stubbs's friends get the upper hand and away go these tomfooleries, and Oliver made short work of them. Yet still they lingered long amongst our remoter villages. Strong in the old feeling that hallowed the time with the blessing of home gatherings and family love feasts, Christmas held his Court, spite of Protector and Parliament, and the North still boasts its Yule-clog, and its Yule cake, and its hobby horse. Honour to old Christmas! He is like his own consecrated holly green still—green with the freshness of that perpetual youth which springs from the fountains of hearth and home.

If ever a man felt our old English feelings warmly, and expressed them beautifully, it is Herrick, the jolly parson of the times of the civil wars. It is refreshing to contrast the ringing and cheery flow of his dancing verse with the sour indignation of Master Stubbs. Hearken to Herrick:—

Come, bring with a noise,
My merry merry boys.
The Christmas log to the firing;
While my good dame, she
Bids ye all be free,
And drink to your heart's desiring.

With the last year's brand
Light the new block, and
For good success in his spending
On your psalteries play,
That sweet luck may
Come while the log is a-tending.

Drink now the strong beer,
Cut the white loaf here,
The while the meat is a-shredding;
For the rare mince pie,
And the plums stand by,
To fill the paste that's a-kneading.

Nor, while he sung the merriments of Christmas-tide, with as much unction as the fowls and frumenty of Mary Ann, was he unmindful of the more solemn feeling of the time. His Christmas Carol, "sung to the King in the presence at Whitehall," is a sweet and solemn lyric.

What sweeter music can we bring,
Than a carol for to sing
The birth of this our Heavenly King?
Awake the voice, awake the string!
Heart, ear, and eye, and everything
Awake! the while the active finger
Runs division with the singer.

From the flourish they came to the song.

1. Dark and dull night, fly hence away,
And give the honour to this day,
That sees December turned to May.

2. If we may ask the reason, say,
The why and wherefore all things here
Seem like the spring-time of the year?

3. Why does the chilling winter's morn
Smile like a field beset with corne?
Or smell like to a mead oushorne,
Trim with sudden spring?
The cause why things thus fragrant be.
'Tis He is borne, whose quickening birth
Gives life and lustre, public mirth
To heaven and the under earth.

Chor. We see Him come, and know Him ours,
Who with His sunshine and His showers,
Turns all the patient ground to flowers.

1. The Darling of the World is come,
And it is we find a room
To welcome Him. The nobler part
Of all the house here is the heart.

Chor. Which we will give Him, and bequeath
The holly and the ivy wreath,
To do Him honour, who's our King
And Lord of all this reveling.

The Christmas Carol is still heard in the north, and probably in other simple mannered parts of England. We have often listened to it, in childhood, when it sounded through the dark, sweetly and solemnly, though riddly sung, and we fancied there was something mysterious in the music, as it was borne on the windy gusts over the silence of the snow. We have had to thank the unpretending Waits here, in unromantic London, for much pleasure, albeit they waked us from pleasant sleep at untimely hours, but we miss the country carol.

The waits smack of Julien's concerts and the lamps—the country carol had a lingering beauty of the old worship about it. The grace that clings to the idea of "Mary Mild," the "Sweet Mother of Mercy," was still rife in these old world songs, and they helped to blend the larger sense of human, Christian brotherhood with the narrower brotherhood that hallows the family hearth. We fear that, though the latter is still strong at the season, the former wants quickening. There is nothing gives such a zest to a Christmas dinner at your own table as the feeling that you have helped to cover that of your poorer neighbours—no sauce to a roast turkey like that. It is better than burnt brandy to your plum pudding. But enough of the gravities. Next week we shall have to gossip of pantomime.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

A jovial Carol for Christmas time,
Merrily, merrily sung—
Cheering the dwellings of Rich and Poor—
Spurring Old and Young!
Into the well of the world's deep heart
Pouring a stream of joy,
And bidding it fresh as a fountain start,
To bathe the jolly Old Boy.
For as sparkling Christmas comes,
Rosed as his front is fine;
He chaseth tears from the hurrying years,
And ordereth Wassail Wine!

A Christmas Carol for good Roast Beef—
The Britons' rare old boast—
On every table in English homes—
Plenty for guest and host!
Enough to crown the feast.
With a solid comfort cheer;
A foaming flask from the old ale cask,
And a tankard brimm'd with beer!
For when sparkling Christmas comes,
Smart, with his whir of cold,
He scattereth grief—like a brave old Chief—
And calls for his ancient cup!

A Christmas Lay to a subject gay,
Plum pudding on the board!
Rioting free round circles of glee,
With never a stint or hoard!
Fast and fragrant steam,
To add to the pudding's pride;
Steeping the soul in a pleasant dream
Of brandy sauce beside.
For when hungry Christmas comes,
He snorts like a fiery horse;
And shouteth come—be quick with plum
Pudding and brandy sauce.

Oh! a festive lay for Christmas Day,
And it ought to reach the skies,
In thanking sounds that set no bounds
To mirth or to——mince pies!
And when mince pies are cut and gone,
Then rouse each well-fed soul,
Bring here bring here—our gold cheer—
Punch, Wine, and Wassail Bowl!
Yes—when Old Christmas comes,
He sings without control!
D'ye hear?—bring here my jolly cheer—
Punch, Wine, and Wassail Bowl!

Punch, Wine, and Wassail Bowl!
Our jovial Carol claim.
But CHRISTMAS morning, hath other song
For singing in his name!
Song for the holly green,
Undaring still and fair,
That weaves his crown of old renown,
And decks his palace rare
So when King Christmas comes,
His burly hands are seen
Stre'ched forth to claim his
His jolly holly green!

Another Carol of Christmas time,
Lustily carol'd now,
Must trip from tongue of old and young,
The tongue—he kissing bough!
Ho, ho! ho, ho! for the mistletoe
That hangeth by the wall,
And smileth bliss over every kiss,
And tokeneth joy to all;
For when dear Christmas comes,
He still not hear of woe;
"But glad," cries he, "you all must be 'Neath the merry mistletoe."

So this is our Carol of Christmas time—
Merrily sung—
Cheering the dwellings of Rich and Poor—
Spurring Old and Young!
Into the well of the world's deep heart
Pouring a stream of joy,
And bidding fresh as a fountain start,
To bathe the Old Boy
For as sparkling Christmas comes,
Robed in his frost so fine,
He daubeth tears from the hurrying years,
And ordereth Wassail Wine!

THE LATE SIR MATTHEW TIERNEY.—The late Sir Matthew John Tierney, M.D., left behind him personal property estimated at £30,000. He died without issue, but by his will he has bequeathed to his niece, Mary Tierney (the daughter of his brother Thomas Tierney, late paymaster of the 43rd Regiment of Light Infantry), who resided with him, a legacy of £8000, for her absolute use. To his brother, now Sir Edward Tierney, Bart., a legacy of £10,000; and to his niece, Harriet Mary, daughter of Sir Edward, he leaves £5000. The residue of his property, real and personal, he has given to his nephew, Matthew Edward Tierney, of the Coldstream Guards, son of Sir Edward; and appointed the said brother, Sir Edward, and nephew, Matthew E. Tierney, Esq., his executors. The latter alone obtained probate on the 18th inst. The will was made in January, 1843, and a codicil last September, a month before death.

THE MINIATURE JOHN BULL.—A companion, or, in some respects, rival to "General Tom Thumb," has just appeared at the Exhibition Rooms of the Society of British Artists, in Fall Mall East. He was born at Kitesford, near Taunton, Somerset, his age is 16 years; height, 34 inches. He is of symmetrical proportions, and is really a very ingenious dwarf. He performs an entertainment in six scenes—John Bull; the British Sailor; Napoleon; Shaw, the Life Guardsman; a Poacher; and "the Old English Gentleman;" all in costume, with songs and dances. In his old English dress, he is a miniature Sir Roger de Coverley. The performance is, we assure our readers, very interesting; and, as one of the miniature world, he will prove one of the Lobby sights of the ensuing week.

HARVEST IN DECEMBER.—On Monday, the 1st instant, Mr. Morgan John, farmer, near Pant y Ialdron, two miles east of Cowbridge, Herefordshire, reaped a field of wheat. The produce, as might have been expected, was not very abundant, nor of a very superior quality.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY OF BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.—Yesterday (Friday), at BOW-STREET, Charles Wood, Charles Bowen, George Lake, and John Hancock were finally examined and committed for trial on suspicion of stealing £150 in Bank of England Notes, the property of the Rev. Mr Lewis, of Cardiff, at the Trafalgar Hotel, Charing Cross, on the 28th ult. Upwards of £70 has been traced.

Letters from Reikiavik of Oct. 28 and 29, state that Mount Hecla has commenced again its eruptions with renewed violence. The volumes of smoke ascended as high as 1200 fathoms. It is said that the mountain has lately disclosed several fissures. The fields have been covered with ashes, and a number of sheep have been slaughtered, as no provisions existed for them. The lava had not attained any human dwelling, nor had any lives been lost.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"Welcome the coming speed the parting guest."

With the present notice ends our weekly glance at the games and pastimes of the year '45. It was a season memorable for many of its passages of kindness—the Sovereign setting an example of good will and good fellowship that, let us hope, was but a type of things to come. It was, beyond most that have preceded it, rife with holyday occasions, and pregnant with promise for the lovers of the noble popular sports of the land. The national games of Greece and Rome were the fruits of peace—and well is it for those to whom such a harvest is vouchsafed. What strong hands and honest hearts the labourers in such pleasant vineyards furnish for the service of the state. Wellington's aphorism about fox-hunting shall descend to posterity as a proverb; and some future Philip will begin to train his Alexander with twenty minutes best pace over the Vale of Belvoir. It has ever been the policy, as well of the statesman as the parish, to countenance and promote systems of public holidays and anniversary merrymakings. If we lived in the days of such subtle logicians as Socrates and Zeno, we should be shown for how much of her political repose France is indebted to the prevalence of the "Folks." We live in days of homely, household, common sense, however,—and let the few who still cling to their grandmamma's prejudices look abroad at the characters of social life elsewhere (as we may be personal, fiercely as our fingers itch to be at it)—and my whether the manly spirit of our popular sports might not, in the abstract, afford a lesson that some of our neighbours might learn with advantage to their morals as well as their manners. In the social history of nations we almost always find them lapsing into effeminacy in the degree they advance in refinement. Surely, without egotism, the Englishman may claim for his country the glory of exception from this rule. From the earliest ages the games and woodcraft of Britain were celebrated for their hardy, robust character. While the sons and daughters of "the sweet South" welcomed the hours allotted from the toil of life, or selected from its leisure, with graceful measure, "to the lascivious pleasing of a lute"—our stalwart, sturdy islanders were at their trysts, as rural gladiators; or were "hunting the hart in forest green." At length "grim-visaged war smoothed his wrinkled front," and the era arrived so dangerous to manly tastes and impulses—thirty years ago there was a mighty peace established among men. With the absence of the desperate feeds of war grew the necessity for the enlargement of the circle of our recreations. In that season—so fatally favourable to the growth of idle and effeminate fancies—what fashion of diversion did the taste of the youth of Britain strike out? Some downy device of one of those numberless modes of luxury? No sooner was our chivalry released from duty on the wooden walls of England, than each set up his own floating pavilion; and with the peace of 1815 arose that most eminently national of all our National Sports—Yachting.

It is said that the truest test of the popular character is afforded by the popular sports of a nation. The logic of common sense leads, certainly, to such a conclusion; but, whether cause or effect, the social condition of Great Britain owes a debt of gratitude to her system of social recreations. They influence for good the propensities of her citizens—they are essentially wholesome, morally as well as physically—and they promote as well as foster her resources. If the day should ever come when once more must be unfurled against the foe—

"The flag that brav'd a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze," our pleasure marine will furnish fitting recruits for our fleet—and our life for it, the result will shew, that deer-stalking in Blair Athol and a winter at Malta, were better exercises in gymnastics than the "Cachucha Waltz." Everywhere, during the past season, the pursuit of manly, gentlemanly sports, was followed with good taste, and right vigour. The catalogue retained no leaven of the reproach that once defiled it. Let it be written in the urns of 1845, that these were the Twelve Golden Rules of the season—Racing, Hunting Steeple-chasing, Yachting, Rowing, Coursing, Deer-stalking, Shooting, Fishing, Cricketing, Hawking, and Golfing.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A shade of improvement was perceptible in the amount of business transacted this afternoon, and two or three of the Derby nags showed a tendency upwards. Thus, 7 to 1 was not to be got about Sting, and 16 to 1, although taken to about £80 about Brocardo, was more than the layers would concede at the close. 35 to 1 was taken in hundreds about The Traverser, and 40 to 1 would have been tested about Fancy Boy. 40 to 1, in fifties, were betted against Hoorrah, and 1000 to 15 against Sheraton. For the Oaks, Vanish, Mendicant, and Sister to Flambeau, were in request; their prices will be seen below; at least, the prices taken for the backers of Vanish and Mendicant were in a decided majority. The only Chester Cup bet was 2000 to 30 against Nereus.

A NEW PLANET.

We quote the following from the Times of Wednesday —

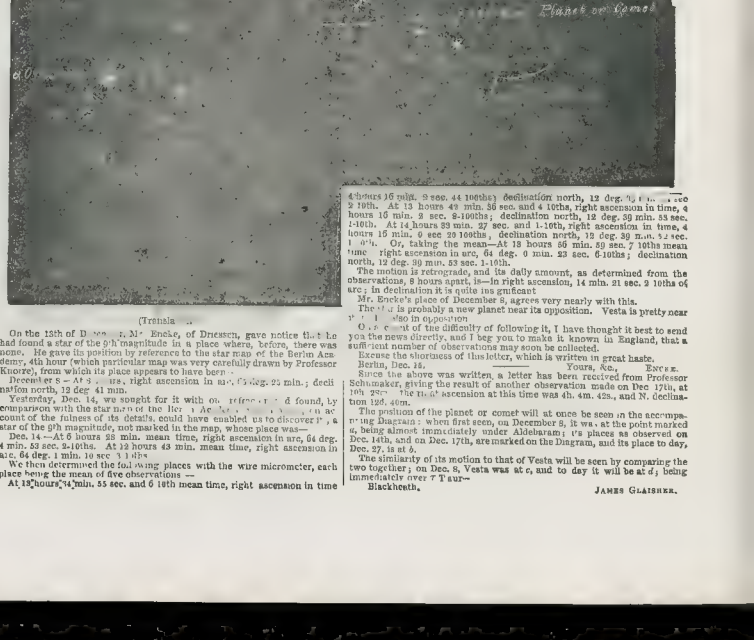
(TO THE EDITOR.)

SIR,—I have this day received from Professor Encke, of Berlin, a letter, of which I subjoin a translation. There appears to be no reasonable doubt that the object to which it relates is a new planet. As it is highly important that observations should be made with the least possible delay, I request that you will have the goodness immediately to publish this in your paper.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
G. B. AIRY.
Royal Observatory, Greenwich, Dec. 22.



(Translation.)

On the 13th of December, Mr. Encke, of Dresden, gave notice that he had found a star of the 9th magnitude in a place where, before, there was none. He gave its position by reference to the star map of the Berlin Academy, 4th hour (which particular map was very carefully drawn by Professor Knorre), from which its place appears to have been—

December 8—At 8 hours, right ascension in mean time, 22 min.; declination north, 12 deg 41 min.

Yesterday, Dec. 14, we sought for it with our refractor, and found, by comparison with the star map of the Berlin Academy, no account of the fulness of its details, could have enabled us to discover it, a star of the 9th magnitude, not marked in the map, whose place was—

Dec. 14.—At 8 hours 28 min. mean time, right ascension in arc, 64 deg. 4 min. 53 sec. 2-10ths. At 12 hours 43 min. mean time, right ascension in arc, 64 deg. 1 min. 10 sec. 1-10th.

We then determined the following places with the wire micrometer, each place being the mean of five observations —

At 13 hours 34 min. 55 sec. and 6 10th mean time, right ascension in time 4 hours 16 min. 9 sec. 44 10ths; declination north, 12 deg. 39 min. 55 sec. 2 10ths. At 13 hours 49 min. 36 sec. and 4 10ths, right ascension in time, 4 hours 16 min. 9 sec. 8-10ths; declination north, 12 deg. 39 min. 53 sec. 1-10th. At 14 hours 23 min. 27 sec. and 1 10th, right ascension in time, 4 hours 15 min. 9 sec. 29 100ths; declination north, 12 deg. 39 min. 52 sec. 1 10th. Or, taking the mean—At 13 hours 36 min. 39 sec. 7 10ths mean time right ascension in arc, 64 deg. 0 min. 23 sec. 6 10ths; declination north, 12 deg. 39 min. 53 sec. 1-10th.

The motion is retrograde, and its daily amount, as determined from the observations, 3 hours apart, is—In right ascension, 14 min. 21 sec. 2 10ths of arc; in declination it is quite insignificant.

Mr. Encke's place of December 8, agrees very nearly with this.

The object is probably a new planet near its opposition. Vesta is pretty near its opposition.

Of course it is difficult of following it, I have thought it best to send you the news directly, and I beg you to make it known in England, that a sufficient number of observations may soon be collected.

Because the shortness of this letter, which is written in great haste.

Berlin, Dec. 18. Yours, &c., ENCKE.

Since the above was written, a letter has been received from Professor Schumacker, giving the result of another observation made on Dec 17th, at 10h 27m 7s Berlin mean time, the right ascension at this time was 4h. 4m. 42s., and N. declination 12d. 46m.

The position of the planet or comet will at once be seen on the accompanying Diagram: when first seen, on December 8, it was at the point marked a, being almost immediately under Aldebaran; its places as observed on Dec. 14th, and on Dec. 17th, are marked on the Diagram, and its place to day, Dec. 27, is at b.

The similarity of its motion to that of Vesta will be seen by comparing the two together; on Dec. 8, Vesta was at c, and to day it will be at d; being immediately over "Taur—

MUSIC.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.

Beethoven's first Mass in C was executed at the second meeting on Monday last. The great production is numbered 86, and comes within the second epoch of the musical career of this mastermind. It is dated 1807, and like Mass in D, Op. 123, has yet to be given in an entire form in this country, and we would strongly urge the Choral harmonists to make the attempt, and thus to steal a march on the "slow coaches" at Exeter Hall. The Mass in C is not attended with the great difficulties of Beethoven's last work, but it is not the less distinguished by his full invention. We trace in its workings that mysticism which characterises his latter inspirations. The Morning Hymn of Adam and Eve, from Milton's "Paradise Lost" (Book 5, line 153), was another attractive item in the scheme. It was composed by Gallard, a German musician, a pupil of Marchal, Farinelli, and Steffani Gallard came to England with Prince George of Denmark, and was appointed chapel master He wrote a Te Deum Jubilate &c., for St Paul's, to celebrate the victories of his epoch, and produced the opera of "Calypso and Telemachus," "Cephus," &c. He died in 1740. Dr. Benjamin Cooke, the glee and madrigal writer, and master of the boys of Westminster Abbey, arranged Gallard's Hymn, and, as we believe, added accompaniments to the score. The solo were sung by Miss Lockey, Mr Lockey, and Mr A. Novello We were some unfortunate hitches, arising from the wind instruments and other causes. The selection from Beethoven's opera of "King Stephen" was much better done. The chorus, "Sea with Flowers," was encored. Cherubini's offertorium, "Laudate Dominum," G. Cross's madrigal, "Cynthia, thy song and country," Schubert's supreme air and chorus from "Fierabras," and Spohr's tenor, air and chorus from "Faust," were included in this classical programme. Miss Cubitt, it must be specially mentioned, deserved the rapturous encore she obtained in Kücken's beautiful air, "The Mother's Song." The room was quite full. The next meeting is on the 19th of January.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The sixth and last Chamber Concert of the season opened with Spohr's Noretta Op. 3., for violin (Thirlwall), tenor (Hill), violoncello (Lucas), double bass (Pratten), flute (Clinton), oboe (Calcott), clarinet (Lazarus), horn (Nicholson), and bassoon (Cocking). The instrumental piece, with Mr. Kiesewetter, first violin, was sung by Miss Rainforth, were the only foreign works in the scheme, which, in the remaining portion, was English—as it ought entirely to be, in fact. The MS. Quartet Op. 3, by C. E. Horsley, for pianoforte, violin, tenor, and violoncello, was fondly applauded; there were some very happy thoughts, but the length of the first movement injured the effect of the rest. In the Andante, a quaint air was heard, in the style of some of the old English madrigals. The Scherzo was accompanied and original, and the finale contained a pretty theme, well carried out. It was well performed by the author and his confrères, Messrs. Thirlwall, Hill, and Lucas. A clever MS Sonata in F, for piano and flute, by Henry Westrop, was performed for the first time, Miss Day being the pianist, and Mr. Clinton the flutist. The latter was quite overpowered by the too impetuous Miss Day. Clinton might have exclaimed, "O, Day! O, Nay!" for he was quite eclipsed. Miss H. Groom sang a ballad—"Rhoda"—artistically, accompanied by Mr. C. Stephens, the happy composer and author. Dr. Calcott's Prize Glee, "Go, idle boy," was very well sung by Miss H. Groom, Messrs. Howe, Burdus, and W. H. Seguin, the lady taking the alto. Mr. Howe sang in chaste style Mr. W. L. Phillips's Canzonet, "If sometimes, in the haunts of men." A song, "The Maiden's Petition," by Mr. E. Wylde, jun., given by Mr. Burdus, and Mr. W. Beale's Glee, "What Ho!" completed the vocal gleanings. Mr. H. B. Richards's spirited Quartet in D, for two violins, tenor and violoncello, summed up the instrumental gems. Mr. R. Barnett was accompanyist, and Mr. G. E. Stephens the director. We are glad to announce that the Society gives four Concerts, with full orchestra, at the Hanover-square Rooms—Feb. 9, 23, March 9, 23. We shall then be enabled to hear Symphonies, Overtures, Concertos, and concerted pieces, the new productions of British musicians, and amateurs will be enabled to judge of their progress in high art.

EVENINGS WITH THE GREAT COMPOSERS.

Mr. Lincoln, on Tuesday night, at the Western Institution, treated the Metaphysicians to a very agreeable review of the powers of that great master, on whom the mantle of Beethoven will probably descend. To the remarks of the admirers of the Leipsick "Maestro," the remarks of the lecturer communicated nothing new; but in the remarks on Mr. Lincoln's assertions are chiefly attended, there was much information as well as amusement. His lecture is a little monotonous, but his manner is easy and unaffected. We were not startled by any novel theories, but we were fed at the intellectual enthusiasm and his judicious mode of illustration. Two of those charming songs "without words, that Mendelssohn has rendered so popular by his ingenious treatment, were so exquisitely played by Mas George and Mr. Lincoln, that both one encored encore. Miss Lincoln and Miss Cubitt and Mr. Lockey, were the vocalists. Miss Cubitt sang the air from "Faust."—"The Lord is mindful of his own," most deliciously; and she likewise was the vocalist in the concerted piece, a monk's chorus, in the dramatic scale, arpeggios, double stops, &c., he lacks certainty of intonation and delicacy; but his general tone is good, and he is essentially a poetical player, without pretension or exaggeration. He was rapturously applauded. The scheme comprised gleanings from the "Walpurgis Night," "Midsummer Night's Dream," the 95th Psalm; but Mr Lincoln had a refractory chorus to deal with, and we gained alms for his pains by agony when there was a hitch. He encored with excellent discretion and feeling, and deserves every success for his laudable exertions to promote the cultivation of a refined taste.

"L' ETOILE DE SEVILLE," BY BALFE

We have received two letters from Paris, describing the reception given to Balfe's new opera in four acts, the libretto by M. Hypolite Lucas, represented for the first time, Dec. 17, at the Académie Royale de Musique. Our correspondents differ in their accounts of the performance, the one declaring it to be most triumphant, the other affirming it to be equivocal. The truth we take to be between the two extreme, and there can be little doubt that our native composer may fairly boast of a legitimate success. The drama is adapted from Lope de Vega's "La Estrella de Sevilla." The plot is interesting. Estrella is beloved both by the King of Spain and Don Sanchez, the Cid of Andalusia. The Monarch, in his dishonourable attempt to see the heroine, is struck by Bustos, her father, whom he challenges at the instigation of the Cid. The latter, however, to protect his King, fights Bustos, and kills him. He is arrested for the murder, and ascertains that he has fought the father of his beloved. Estrella is equally unaware, having taken advantage for the punishment of her father's slayer. Evidently, just as the lovers are about to die together, Estrella discovered that she is daughter of Bustos, but the King's natural sister. Of course the hands of the Cid and the "star of Seville" are then united by the repentant Monarch. Madame Stolle enacted Estrella, and on all hands we learn that on the two acts were sustained by her energy and feeling Gardoni, the tenor, was the Cid; baroilher the King, Mdlle. Nau, Zaida, a Moorish slave; and Bremond, the lover, Bustos The mise en scène was superb, and the decorations strikingly attractive. Gardoni and Barroilher have pleasing airs in the first and second acts Mdlle. Nau has a pretty melody. A trio, duets between Gardoni and Barroilher, Stoltz and Gardoni, are highly spoken of. It is stated that Mr. Balfe has been engaged at for Drury-lane Theatre, with Madame Thillon in the principal part. It is not generally known that this singer made her début in Paris in Donizetti's "Lucia," and that her tragic powers were as much admired as her subsequent efforts in the "Opera Comique."

OPERAS AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Mr. Macfarren's opera of "Don Quixote" is in rehearsal. Allen will be the tenor, and Miss Rainforth the prima donna Mr Stretton is to enact Sancho Panza, and Mr Weiss Don Quixote. It will be brought out early in January We regret to learn that Mr. Macfarren has experienced great difficulties in the production of his new opera of "The Crusaders," arising from the pretensions of the singers. The cast was intended to include the entire strength of the establishment, and it may be feared that the superfluity of two prime donne, no tenors, and three bass, were not to be easily satisfied. As pieces has been restored, we shall not enter on the details that have reached us, but we strongly advise the recollect that in Paris pony ambitions and jealousies of primes are not allowed to disturb a manager in efficiently casting an opera. Even the colossal Labloche, the greatest singer in the world, has not his voice to take subordinate parts to render an ensemble perfect. Genius does never bear degradation by this course, it is the impostor who calls out for extraordinary indulgences. The character, forsooth, must make him, and he must not make the character,

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's "Messiah" was repeated at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday night, the vocalists, as usual, being Grisi and Mdme. Caradori Allan. There were no novelties in the oratorio went better. Mrs. Sunda-land evinced improvement in her style of singing. Mr. Phillips sang splendidly. Miss M. B. Hawes was labouring and severe indisposition, but her artistical skill carried her through successfully.

MUSICAL REVIEW.

"England, the Land of the Free, and a new Christmas Song. Written and Composed by George Tolhurst. Blackman.

Where the Flowery Knolls invite, new Fairy Glee. Composed by J. Sims. Williams.

These patriotic and seasonable effusions—the latter in two flats three four time, and the former two sharps six four measure—are chiefly remarkable, as regards the combination of poet and composer, but neither the words nor the music rise above the average quality of such inspirations. As first productions they are creditable. The glee is written in a Catch Club style, and is good, the second movement particularly, which is a flowing cantabile The alto part, being florid, would require a good singer. The composer is organist to Tottenham Church.

The Musical Bijou. D'Almaine and Co.

So far as decorative art, this work may be pronounced to be perfect. It is, indeed, a most elegant present for the fairer portion of the creation. The illuminated frontispiece, border and subject, copied from "Le Roman de la Rose," Harl, 4425, is an extraordinary specimen of printing in colours, Mr. Ede Gard having drawn and lithographed the illustration. The title, border and subject, are also illuminated, and from the same source, "Le Roman de la Rose," the joint poetical production of Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Mehun. He must be a fine penman who will dare inscribe the name in the elegant presentation plate; but, as "Each heart never won a fair lady," there will not be wanting "bold captains" to advance beyond the flourishing "To."

The splendours of the Harleian collection have been marvellously re-produced in the illuminated volume: but, without we thus render full justice to the magnificence of the ornamen al portion, we wish we could conscientiously commend the musical contents of this costly work. There are fifty vocal and sixteen instrumental pieces; but although we find the names of Sir H. R. Bishop, Mr E. J. Loder, Linley, Rodwell, S. Nelson, Crouch, Hatton, A. Lee, Knight, Fitzwilliam, Hewitt, &c., amongst the composers in the former category, there seems to be a general lack of inspiration, as if La veuve de Nanteuil had been under the withering influence of basilmasters Writing to order is not the best incentive to genius amongst musicians Many of these vocal morceaux come under the denomination of "pretty" but, to speak frankly we find nothing to quote in melody—the vein and the common-place abounding in undue proportion. A real bijou is, however, Sir H. R. Bishop's ballad, "The birds which sang so sweetly," in four flats. There is exquisite pathos in the melodious inspiration worthy of the fame of the writer. The "Death of Dermot," by Crouch, is calculated for popularity, albeit not an original conception. Mr Hatton's song of "My first love and my last," will delight the sentimental young ladies who believe in that doubtful theory. The poetry, in some instances, is quite awful; we dare not quote, for the cases are too numerous and desperate. We forgive the want of imagination and the hoeled nonsense, but we have the right to bargain for grammar. The instrumental department is decidedly better. Musard, Auber, and Czerny are always safe. Mr. Wallace contributes "La Desnada Valse" and "Les Fariès"—sparkling themes. Lover is poetical in public, Chalmers has a good time without words, and Charles Glover has a smart arrangement of one of Pacini's motevi. There is no doubt that the "Musical Bijou" will have its place in the elegant drawing-room redolent of seasonable sweets.

Goodban's Musical Games. J. A. Novello.

This invention is most ingenious. Let the clever author explain his own intention:—"Deeply impressed," he says, "with the idea that if a species of amusement could be contrived, particularly for young persons, as an auxiliary to the study of so important a branch of musical knowledge, its utility might become apparent in the creating a more genuine taste for the beautiful and sublime productions of the great masters of the art, the author, nearly twenty years ago, made the attempt, but, becoming perplexed in the formation of the cards, so as to make them sufficiently simple for general application, it was then abandoned, and the MS. laid by. A recent discovery of this MS. has, however, induced him to make a fresh attempt, and the present plan—having for its principal object that of enabling all those who do not consider themselves adepts in the art, to join in an agreeable pastime for mutual edification, the result."

The pack consists of 52 cards,—two each of the three Cs; three each of the six Scales, D, E, F, G, A, B, upper octave; four each of ditto lower octave; with four diagrams numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4. There are seven amusing as well as instructive games, to be played with this pack, as invented by Mr. Goodban, namely, a Musical game of Notation; one for Keys or Scales. third of Diatonic Intervals for two or three tricks; a fourth (a round game of Time or Value of Notes and Rests; one of 2 or 4 tricks, for Harmony or Fundamental Chords; one of Fundamental Sounds, for two by tricks; and finally, the Rule of the Octave, for two or four by tricks. Mr. Goodban, of Canterbury, is known as the author of Violin and Pianoforte Instruction Books, and other musical works. He has a high reputation in London, who is a Violoncello performer, and a composer. The rules and directions of Mr. Goodban are lucid and terse, and his introductory explanation of the principles of Music is well written. Altogether, these games are admirably calculated to achieve their object—instruction, as well as amusement; and we entertain no doubt that the plan, as Mr. Goodban states, is suggestive of many additions and extensions.

The Musical Treasury. Dawson.

The volume for 1845, consisting of 224 pages beautifully got up, with an embossed title page, is now before us. It would be a most elegant present for Christmas or the New Year. There are twenty-five pieces, including four overtures, with vocal pieces by the best masters of the ancient and modern school. Tact, taste, and judgment have been displayed in the various gleanings.

"GENERAL TOM THUMB."

This renowned Dwarf, or, as he is termed, "the American Man in Miniature," has just returned from France, to give "a few Farewell Levees," before quitting this country for New York. We are sorry to learn that he was so unwell as to be unable to appear at his usual place of exhibition, the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, on Wednesday last. We then paid him a visit, and found him suffering from a severe cold, from which he has since recovered.

Scarcely any exhibition within our memory has excited such interest amongst all circles, as "The General," Charles S Stratton. He was born at Bridgeport, Connecticut, U. S., Jan. 11, 1832; and is, consequently, now very nearly in his 14th year old. He is 26 inches high, and weighs only 15 pounds. His head scarcely reaches to the upper of a person of ordinary stature, and is about on a level with the seat of a common chair. He has a light complexion, light hair, fresh coloured cheeks, dark eyes, well developed forehead, good mouth, and great variety of expression.

"The General" first exhibited at Barnum's Old American Museum, in New York, where he is stated to have been visited by 30,000 persons. gentlemen of distinction invited "the General" to dine with him, ladies came in their carriages to see him, bringing valuable presents; and he was, for six weeks, the lion of New York. He next visited Philadelphia; and, in fine, made the tour of the States.

On Jan. 19, 1844, he left New York for England, and was escorted to the ship Yorkshire, in which he sailed, by 10,000 persons. Immediately on his arrival in London, "the General" called at our office; and the first portrait of him, taken in this country, will be found in our Journal for Feb 24, 1844; together with a notice of his performances at the Princess' Theatre

On Saturday morning, March 23, "the General," accompanied by his guardian, Mr Barnum, had the honour of attending at Buckingham Palace, and afforded much entertainment to her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the Royal Household, by his extraordinary intellectual display. His quick replies to the various questions put to him by the Queen elicited great astonishment.

On Tuesday evening, April 2, "the General" repeated his performances before her Majesty, when also were present the Queen of the Belgians, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and Princess Alice, their respective suites, and a distinguished party. At the conclusion of the entertainment, her Majesty the Queen presented to "the General" a superb assortment of mother-of pearl, set with rubies, and bearing the crown and the Royal initials, "V. R." In addition to this splendid gift, the Queen subsequently presented "the General" with a gold repeating watch, and complimented Mr. Barnum, h s guardian, on the aptness of his pupil.

On Tuesday, April 16, "the General" had the honour of appearing, for the second time, before her Majesty Queen Adelaide; his Grace the Duke of Cumberide, the Duchess of Gloucester, and other distinguished visitors, at Marlborough House. Her Majesty was gracious.y pleased to present "the General" with an elegant watch and chain.

"The General" had the honour of appearing before the Queen, at Buckingham Palace, for the third time, on Friday, April 19. He was dressed in a full Court Suit, and elicited the approbation of Her Majesty and Prince Albert, also of their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, Prince Leiningen, and other distinguished visitors

On these occasions, the little fellow sang a comic song, written by Mr. James Morgan, of the Imperial Hotel, introducing the Royal personages, to the natural American air of "Yankee Doodle."

In the autumn of last year, "the General" appeared in London, in an elegant Dress Chariot, built for him: the entire equipage will be found engraved in No. 122 of our Journal. In February of the present year, "the General" visited Paris, and his little equipage appeared at Longchamps, in the great procession at the Champs Elysées. "The General" was soon summoned to the Tuileries, repeated his visits, and received many costly presents from the Duke Nemours, the Queen, Princess Adelaide the Comte de Paris, &c. He engaged the elegant Salle des Concerts, Rue Vivienne, and his Levees for four successive months were crowded. After his Evening Levee, he appeared for several successive nights in a play, called "Petit Poucet," written expressly for "the Little General," and in which he was very successful.

"The General" afterwards made the tour of France and Belgium; and, while at Bordeaux, made a dash into Spain, and had the honour of appearing before Queen Isabella, the Queen Mother, and Court, then assembled at Pampeluna. At the great Ball fight there, "the General" appeared in the Royal box, with the Queen.

On his return to Paris, in November last, he appeared again before the

GENERAL TOM THUMB, AS FREDERICK THE GREAT

King, Queen, and Royal Family, at the Palace of St. Cloud, and again wrought away sterling testimonials of the Royal favour.

We may here mention, by way of explanation, that the story of "the General," having been stolen by brigands (which appeared in the French newspapers some time since) was, altogether, a mistake, originating in "the General's" luggage being stolen from behind his carriage, while travelling between the towns of Quimper and L'Orient.

The performances of this extraordinary little person have repeatedly been noticed in our Journal. Among these entertainments are "the Grecian Statues," "Cupid with wings and quiver," "Samson carrying off the gates of Gaza," the "Fighting Gladiator," "The Slave Wheeling his Knife," "Ajax," "Discobulus," "Cincinnatus," "Hercules with the Nemean Lion," &c. His imitation of "Napoleon," in his manner, gait, "taking snuff," and several of his well known attitudes, is good. Another of his favourite characters is that of "Frederick the Great," in which our artist has represented him.

We understand that "the General" will leave London for the North, on Monday; and, after a tour through Scotland and Ireland, will return to New York.

THE LATE EXPLOSION AT BOLTON.

We have received from a Correspondent at Bolton, the following details of this frightful catastrophe. Our Correspondent adds: "many erroneous statements have appeared in the papers; but I vouch for the correctness of what I send you, as an eye-witness.")

It is only a few months ago since this town was thrown into the utmost state of consternation by the explosion of a boiler at Mr. Brooks's linen-mill; but that occurrence was trifling as to the fatal effects produced by it, when contrasted with what took place here on Monday last, at the cotton factory of Messrs. Rothwell and Kitts, adjoining the station of the Bolton and Leigh Railway, in Black Horse-street. Under the west end of the mill were three steam-boilers—the centre one a low-pressure boiler, and the other two were high-pressure; one of the latter was not working at the time, in consequence of undergoing repairs. Exactly at ten minutes past one o'clock, the centre boiler exploded, and blew up the whole of the building, four stories high, over the boilers. The noise occasioned by explosion was not very loud, but the expansion of air occasioned by it, caused such a concussion and vibration, that every house in the neighbourhood was shaken, the windows broken, and a boy, in a house opposite to the boiler, was scalded to death. At Mr. Lowe's, the Flag Inn, which is upwards of three hundred yards distant, the spirit-sample bottles were thrown out of the window; and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood generally were so alarmed, in consequence of the shaking of their dwellings, and the overthrow of various articles, that they imagined it was an earthquake, and ran into the streets in the utmost state of alarm. The workpeople employed in the mill amounted to about ninety, and the majority were in it at the time. They were seen rushing towards the windows, and breaking them and the frames to effect their escape; and, at the same time, mothers, fathers, and relatives were running in the greatest state of agony and despair towards the scene of destruction.

After the consternation had subsided a little, Mr. Edward Rothwell (nephew of the late Mr. Rothwell) was found dead, a portion of the building having fallen upon him: and Mr. Kitts, one of the partners, was taken out of the engine-house, much scalded. Mr. Peter Greenbough, the manager of the mill, who has left a wife and eleven children, seven of whom are unable to provide for themselves, was also discovered dead in the engine-house. Mr. Frederick Hoskin, a young gentleman who was learning the business, was found under the ruins alive, and, when taken out, it was found that he was much injured on one of his legs, by a stone falling upon him. The feelings of the populace on the spot were raised to the highest pitch by the cries of several poor creatures who were under the flooring, which had fallen, fortunately, against the opposite building; but as it was covered with such an immense heap of bricks and other rubbish, it was evident that some hours must elapse before they could rescue the whole of them. Every effort was now made by all present; and about four o'clock they had so far succeeded as to enable them to give relief to a youth, who for some time had been crying out for tea or water, and at six o'clock he was taken out of the ruins; a female was also rescued soon afterwards.

Up to Wednesday morning the bodies of the following ten individuals, were taken out of the ruins:—Mr. Edward Rothwell, Mr. P. Greenhough (Manager), Alice Edge, Thomas Mort, Alice Hampson, Priscilla Scholes, Eliza Coulston and Agnes Coulston (sisters), Mary Allen, and Mark Winder. Nine other individuals received injuries of various kinds; but, we are happy to say, that they are all likely to recover.

An inquest was held before John Taylor, Esq., the Coroner, in the Borough Court, on Wednesday morning. A highly-respectable body of gentlemen were upon the jury; and, after the necessary evidence, to prove the identity of the deceased parties, had been gone through, the Coroner adjourned the Court to afford time to produce the evidence of Mr. Fairburn, of Manchester, and other scientific gentlemen, as to the cause of the accidents, and to bring up witnesses that are injured.

When the Jury met again, the opinion of Mr. Fairbairn was taken, and, after some other evidence had been given, the Jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Thomas Kitts, one of the partners in the concern. Since the day of the accident four other persons have died of the injuries they received, so that the total number killed is, up to this time, 14.

It is with pleasure we state that it was announced by the Coroner at the inquest, that the Mayor of Bolton, Stephen Blair, Esq., and numerous other gentlemen, had resolved upon making a subscription for the immediate relief of the widows and orphans of the unfortunate sufferers. We give a sketch of the scene, after the explosion, executed by Mr. Robston.

SCENE AT BOLTON, AFTER THE LATE STEAM-BOILER EXPLOSION.

FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

The costumes for this season of the year, though necessarily sombre and somewhat heavy in appearance, are nevertheless perhaps more becoming than those of any other time to the fair wearer; for the dark colours and thick materials which are alone appropriate in the midst of frost and snow, by contrast heighten their charms, and give an air of increased delicacy to the complexion and to the figure; and the fashion which now prevails for furs may be traceable to their knowledge of this effect. Velvet and cashmere, also highly in vogue, are perhaps of all others the most advantageous materials for a lady's dress. The latter in plain colours, is, and always will be, highly elegant. These dresses are trimmed with buttons of steel or marcasaite, or embroidered. Silk is still worn for morning dresses; but it must be of rich texture and deep full colour. Those with a pattern are the most recherché. Trimmings of velvet, gimp, or buttons are indispensable; the latter, however, at present carry the palm.

FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

Brocaded silks are much in vogue for evening wear, and justly, for they are equally splendid and becoming; no trimming is usually employed for these dresses, which are made with full corsages and rounded points. This style of bodice is now almost universally adopted for morning and evening dresses; berthes of the same material as the dress, trimmed with effilés, are, however, also much in favour. For net or tartatane dresses, the body is often made with pleats laid on, and surrounding the top of the dress; the sleeves are made with epaulettes, trimmed with bouffons of tulle. Double shirts are universally abandoned; but the dress for evening wear is frequently made to open in front, disclosing the silk or satin shirt beneath, and looped at the side with bouquets and long ends of ribbon. The shirts are worn very full. Velvet dresses still maintain their ground for evening wear; they are trimmed in front with bows of ribbon, and silk or steel buttons.

FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

For out-of-door covering, furs, as we have before said, are universally adopted. The accompanying plate gives a specimen of the ermine capes now in vogue, which, when worn over a silk or cashmere dress, have a highly elegant effect; a muff, in the same fur, being almost indispensable. The mantelet, in dark satin, trimmed with a deep border of sable, and a cape of the same, is also highly elegant as well as becoming. We wish we could say that the reign of the paletots was completely past. They appear again in new shapes and forms, but preserving that type which is so essentially inelegant and unbecoming. They are now made longer than formerly, with pockets towards the front of the skirt, much in the fashion of the vestment of the same name worn by the ruder half of the human creation; they are embroidered in braid, or trimmed with gimp. Burnous, in velvet, wadded, and trimmed with fur, gimp, or lace, are much in vogue, as well as the large clouks in satin, trimmed with ermine or velvet, which are the most appropriate, and, therefore, the most really elegant garments for out-of-door wear.

As to bonnets, since we published our last bulletin of fashions, there is nothing new to mention, but that the so much abused Pamela is gradually coming more and more into vogue. The favourite material is velvet, or velours epinglé, and the ornaments chiefly consist of feathers, large flowers in dark colours, or thick rosettes in velvet and black lace.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

On Saturday evening, a version of Mr. Dickens's new Christmas book, "The Cricket on the Hearth," dramatised by Mr. Albert Smith, from early proofs of the work, furnished to him by the author, was acted for the first time, and with the most complete success; indeed, it is long since we have witnessed such enthusiasm as that evinced by the audience upon the fall of the curtain.

Long before this notice comes into the hands of our readers, the greater part of them will, we expect, have read the delightful little book in question; or, if they have not, the plot may be found in another part of our Journal. It is not, therefore, necessary for us here to repeat it, but merely to notice the manner in which its various characters were represented by the members of the Lyceum company, to which corps its dramatis personæ were admirably adapted. Indeed, it would almost appear, as the Times remarked, that Mr. Dickens had in representation at this house in his eye when he wrote the work. The cast was as follows:—John Peerybingle, Mr. Emery; Tackleton (the toy merchant), Mr. Meadows: Caleb Plummer, Mr. Keeley, The Stranger, Mr. F. Vining; Dot, Mrs. Keeley; Bertha, Miss Mary Keeley (her first appearance on any stage); Tilly Slowboy, Miss Turner; Mrs. Fielding, Mrs. Wooledge; May, Miss Howard; and the Fairy Cricket, Miss Dawson. The acting of everybody concerned was so admirable, that it is difficult to say of whom we ought first to speak; in gallantry, however, we will commence with the ladies. Miss Mary Keeley, the débutante, is a young lady of fifteen; and, from the favourable impression she created on Saturday, will, we augur, become a star of no ordinary magnitude. Her features are extremely pleasing and expressive; and when, at the conclusion of the piece, upon being called before the curtain, we were permitted to see her eyes, which she had kept closed whilst playing the part of blind Bertha, we found them as bright and intelligent as her mother's, and this is the highest compliment that we can pay to them. Her voice is sweet, and capable of nice modulation; and she betrayed throughout her personation of the part a perception and stage tact which could hardly have been looked for in one so young. Mrs. Keeley's Dot was perfection: we never saw her in a part in which she appeared to be so completely at home. Her busy, bustling, affectionate manner in the first "chirp" or act, and her anxiety in the last one—the little pantomime scene in which she comes and seats herself on her little stool at the feet of her husband, who has been sitting up all night at his dreary hearth—and the volubility and earnest haste with which she pours forth the explanation of her apparently equivocal conduct, as soon as she finds herself at liberty to do so—were inimitable. We are convinced, in these points, there is no actress now upon the stage who can approach her. Miss Turner deserves great praise for her clever impersonation of the foundling, Tilly Slowboy. She looked the character of the foundling handmaiden to the life, and quite acted up to her appearance. Her "Ow if you please don't!" convulsed the and once with laughter every time she uttered the phrase. The speech of the Cricket from the hearth was a very graceful piece of declamation by Miss Dawson, for which she was warmly applauded. Mr. Emery's Peerybingle fairly took the house by surprise by its excellence. His powerful acting never degenerated into rant, but was throughout intense and judicious; and, in the interview with Tackleton, wherein he explains his intentions with regard to his wife, he was frequently compelled to wait until the plaudits of the audience had subsided. Mr. Keeley played with much pathos and truthfulness as Caleb Plummer, and Mr. Meadows was as gruff and uncomfortable as Tackleton could possibly be supposed to be. Mr. Frederick Vining had not a very great deal to do, but what he did assisted much towards forming a perfect ensemble. The curtain fell amidst loud and prolonged cheering, and when the principal characters appeared before it, a shower of bouquets were flung to the fair young débutante. Then the audience set up a cry for Mr. Dickens and Mr. Albert Smith. The former gentleman was stated not to be in the house, but the latter bowed his acknowledgments from a private box: and then, we believe, in their enthusiastic excitement, they would have had everybody on over again had they had breath enough to call for them. As it was, the impression in the house was that "The Cricket on the Hearth" will prove the greatest hit yet made by this fortunate management. The house was completely crowded, and every box occupied.

MR. KEELEY AS CALEB, AND MISS M. KEELEY AS BERTHA.

FRENCH PLAYS

The favourite artiste, M. Lafont, took his benefit at the St. James's Theatre, on Wednesday last. The performances consisted of "Clementine," "La Hocket Cume Coquette," "Pere et Fille," and a play, performed for the first time at this theatre, entitled "Jean, ou le Mauvais Sujet," being a painful though faithful portraiture of the mishaps of a young scamp, and his subsequent reformation. There has been no greater favourite with the habitués of this house than M. Lafont, whose performances we have had occasion so often to notice. He is, we believe, to remain in London until the engagement of Madame Albert, in order to unite his talents with those of that charming actress.

ADELPHI.

An admirable translation, by Mr. Charles Selby, of an effective French drama, "Un Changement de Main," was brought out here, on Tuesday evening, under the title of "The Lioness of the North," and achieved a perfect success. By the "Lioness" is meant the Empress Elizabeth of Russia; and upon situations rising out of her tyranny and somewhat questionable temperament the plot of the piece is founded. It is, in every respect, an "Adelphi" piece par excellence, and was listened to with intense interest by a very crowded audience, who were most liberal in their applause, both during the piece and at the conclusion, when it was announced for repetition every evening, amidst renewed cheering. It was well played by Madame Celeste, Messrs. Webster and Wright, and Miss Ellen Chaplin, and promises to enjoy a fair run, especially with the forthcoming novelties to back it up. The original drama was performed in Paris, if we mistake not, at the Gymnase Dramatique.

THE CHRISTMAS PIECES.

Last evening nearly every theatre in the metropolis produced its pantomime or burlesque entertainment. By the courtesy of the authors and artists of five of the pieces, we have engraved a scene from each, sketched from the rehearsals.

DRURY LANE.

The adventures of Mr. Lemuel Gulliver form the subject for the Christmas entertainment at this house, done from the popular chronicle by Mr. Morton. The subject has been once or twice dramatised, but it has reappeared under an entirely different form. And when we say that the important part of Gulliver was entrusted to the hands of Mr. W. H Payne, some idea may be formed that it was very funny. The first scene is the interior of Guildhall, and we have a dispute between General Tom Thumb and Gog and Magog, which is settled by the Genius of Pantomime, who brings forward the subject of her entertainment, and discovers Gulliver (Mr. W. H Payne) high and dry upon a rock, having been shipwrecked. His wife, Mrs Gulliver (Mr. Hance), is in the same predicament. The Flying Island, represented in our Engraving, now appears, and takes Mrs. Gulliver up, whilst her spouse goes down, and at low water is found by the astonished Lilliputians. Meanwhile, Mrs. Gulliver arrives at the Palace of Laputa; and, in the Hall of Science, becomes acquainted with the King of Laputa (Mr. T. Matthews) and the Lord High Chancellor Parallelogram (Mr. Howell). She tells them how she has lost her husband, and the Flying Island is forthwith placed at her disposal to find him with. During this interview, Gulliver has made himself quite at home with the Lilliputians; and all the most remarkable events that characterised his stay in that remarkable country are vividly represented, even to his dinner, at which the little people were so much astonished, and his towing in the Blefuscadian Fleet. The action then passes on to Brobdignag, with all its monster wonders, including babies, birds, prize pigs, and kittens; and finally Mrs. Gulliver, in the Flying Island, finds out her husband, and leaps therefrom into his arms. The Genius of Pantomime then appears, and the transformations take place, the Harlequinade being supported by Mr. Wieland as Harlequin, Mr. T. Matthews as Clown, Mr. Howell as Pantaloon, and Miss Hicks and Miss Lonsdale for Columbines. And then the excitement begins in Coventry-street, Piccadilly; after which we have a Railway Steeplechase to the Board of Trade, with all sorts of wonderful adventures in grocers', fishmongers', wine-merchants', tinmans', and glass shops; until all eyes are directed to the City of Cologne, as it appeared on her Majesty's arrival, with a grand tableau of which the pantomime concludes.

SCENE FROM "THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

The pantomime was quite successful, although it will require curtailment. The opening is the funniest we ever witnessed—so funny, that it militated seriously against the "comic" business.

After the transformations, Payne, as Gulliver, was glorious. The scene of the evolutions of the Lilliputian army drew down thunders of applause, especially when Payne stood on the two sentry boxes and allowed the troops to march under his legs. The Laputa geometry was not so quaint as Dean Swift has made it, and the introduction of Mrs. Gulliver is by no means an improvement on the history. The palace on fire, and the taking of the fleet, were well contrived, and the children worked like Trojans. The Brobdignag nursery caused one continued explosion of hilarity. The opening scene, with Gog and Magog's dispute with Tom Thumb as to the respective attractions of giants and dwarfs, also obtained much cheering. The stretching of the Ocean's body to an inordinate length, and his being tossed in a blanket, told uncommonly well. The Railroad Crash, displayed by the raising of an entire scene, and discovering a mass of ruins, "kicked" up a real dust, for the audience were almost suffocated. The Scrip, Stags, &c., came, of course, into derision.

The crowning joke was a bill, on which was inscribed "What to Eat, Drink, and Avoid." This, by the wand of Harlequin, was changed to Roast Beef and Triple X, to eat and drink, and the words, "Avoid Norfolk Curry." There was too much of the hackneyed matter of pantomimes in the latter portion; but, with judicious pruning, the fun will tell better. The last scene was magnificent. It was the City of Cologne illuminated, copied, apparently, from our illustration of that fairy event. Wieland as Harlequin, T. Matthews as Clown, and Howell as Pantaloon, exerted themselves strenuously. Matthews had to sing "Hot Codlins" and "Tipety witchet" on the call of the galleries. The house was crammed to excess, and the episodes of one or two fights and a merry criticism on the opera of "Mavitana," were not wanting—in fact, the fun before the curtain sometimes rivalled that of the stage. With Payne's Gulliver and the Lilliputians, the Pantomime will be a hit.

LYCEUM.

The story of Prince Firouz, Schah of Persia, and his flying steed, from the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," has furnished Messrs. A. Smith and Kenney with the groundwork of their new burlesque at this house; and they have also availed themselves of some situations from the following story of "Prince Bahman and Prince Purves," combining both in "The Enchanted Horse." The piece opens with the halt of a caravan of Persian literati in the Great Desert, on its way to the Schiraz Association for the Advancement of Science. Whilst the savans are asleep, I-wish-you-may-get-it, an Ojibbeway Indian, or, the Downey Bird (Mr. Keeley), who is travelling with a show, tries to get up an audience, but fails, and, in his desperation, beats in his drum, which releases the Afrit (Mr. Collyer), a Djinn, or evil spirit, who has been imprisoned therein by Solomon. He tells the Indian that, if he can find a maiden as a sacrifice, he shall get his freedom, and presents him with the Enchanted Horse, to assist him in his search. The Indian strikes a bargain, and departs for Schiraz, where the Persian Association is being held, for the Advancement of Science in general, and gastronomy in particular. Here, the President, Prince Firouz Schah (Mrs. Keeley), comes in, in great state, driving a young locomotive, and proceeds to exhibit all the wonders of the Exposition to his father, Babbah Schah (Mr. F. Matthews), his sister, Mamouna (Miss Villars), and his visitor, Dost Cheroot, King of Bengal (Mr. Turner). The Indian arrives with his horse, and wants to "chop" it for the Princess; but Firouz learns the secret of making it go up, by turning a peg behind its ear, and, jumping on it, is carried up and away, to the astonishment of everybody. We next find him in the heavens, at night, and alone. Here he meets the Lost Pleiad, and an Irish agitating constellation, O'Rion (Miss Howard and Mr. Silver); and finally discovers the peg that will get the horse down again, which he has hitherto been unable to find. The horse shoes, and Firouz tumbles through a skylight, in the palace of the Princess Chassurah (Miss Hodson), who is about to be married to Shawl Sing (Mr. Wigan), King of Cashmere, whom she does not like. A case of love at first sight is accomplished; and, whilst the Cashmerian King, who is musically inclined, is about to serenade his mistress with a monster concert, Firouz flies off with her upon the horse; and the first act concludes. In the second, we find Babbah Shah mourning for his lost son, of whom he has heard no news since he flew away. He condemns the Indian to be tied to a tree, and devoured by wild beasts. This is accordingly done, when he is released by the Afrit, who contrives to steal away Chassurah, when she arrives with Firouz, and conveys her to "Castle Perilous." The adventures of the Prince, his Sister, and Shawl-Sing, to recover the Princess of Bengal, form the business of the act; and she is ultimately recovered, through the aid of the Peri Queen (Miss Arden); and all are made happy.

The piece is got up on a scale of great splendour, and written in verse, filled with jokes and allusions to passing topics. Our Illustration shows the Prince in his rapid act of air-oss-tation through the heavens.

A want of previous arrangement was, however, visible in the stage business, and, from the actors feeling embarrassed on this point, they did not give the jokes with that emphasis which is necessary to make them tell with the house. The piece also will bear freely cutting, but this is easily done. Mrs. Keeley was evidently suffering from over-work, but played with astonishing spirit. Her description of the various wonders at the meeting of the Association was loudly applauded. Keeley was very droll as the Indian. He nearly met with an accident in the last scene; when he was coming up a trap with two of the corps de ballet the ropes below gave way and he was let suddenly down. He, however, reappeared immediately afterwards unhurt, and was warmly cheered. Mr. Collier as an Afrit or Sprite, and also as a Monkey, displayed great activity, and the horse was a capital piece of mechanism. A beautiful phantasmagoric effect of the enchanted courser bearing off the Prince and Princess at the conclusion of the first act got a hearty round of approbation, and the curtain fell lately fell amidst applause, not alloyed by any rounds less agreeable to the dramatist. The house was densely crowded.

PRINCESS'.

A pantomime was produced at this theatre on boxing night, for the first time, the Christmas entertainments having always been a burlesque hitherto. The bill says, "The story is taken from the unknown tale of the ponderous k—, that fitted the ponderous lock, that locked the ponderous gates of the great capital of the capital great kingdom of the king Great Gampton, monarch of the imaginary Isles of Skyaria." After this negative information, all research as to the earth-cradles from which the tale is derived is entirely useless; but there is nevertheless, great promise of adventures and disasters—of perilous escapes, and courses of true love running anything but smoothly, to satisfy the most inordinate gourmand of pantomimic fare. The whole of the scenery in the opening is by Mr. W. Beverley; one of the scenes, "The Enchanted Grotto of the Fairy Blue Bell," is said to be very beautiful. This gentleman has also painted the last scene—"The Fairy Home" and the remainder is by Mr. Nicholls. Mr. W. H. Harvey is the Harlequin, Mr. Flexmore the Clown, Miss Bullen the Columbine, and Mr. T. Hill the Pantaloon. Of course the railway jokes and allusions come as thick as blackberries; and, in addition, we have a trip to Boulogne, the Great Perch, and White Horse Cellar, the Park as it is and what it will be, and the usual complement of shops and railways.

The harlequinade portion of the pantomime went off tolerably well; but not glibly. There was little novelty in the tricks; but the jokes were received by a crowded audience; a comic polka was excellently danced by the Clown (Flexmore).

HAYMARKET.

From the graceful stories of the repertoire of the Countess D'Aunois, Mr. Planché, in whom the sole right of burlesquely dramatising those charming tales seems to be vested, has selected "The Bee and the Orange Flower" for the Christmas extravaganza. The story is not so generally known as some of the others. King Crib has some time ago lost his daughter Amy (Miss Julia Bennett) at sea; and he sends an embassy to his brother, King Block (Mr. Tilbury), to request his assistance in gaining some news of the manner in which she was lost. Prince Amiable (Mr Hudson) goes in search of these tidings. But the Princess Amy is not dead, never having been drowned at all, but picked up from the wreck, and kept as servant of all work in the family of an Ogre, Hamgio (Mr. J. Bland). The fairies who befriend the Prince and Princess give them four wishes, two of which are soon gone, in a hope to escape one with the other; and when they find the Ogre coming after them they expend the remaining two, the Princess in wishing that she was a bee, and the Prince that he was a box. They are immediately transformed, and placed in the garden of the Princess Linda (Miss P. Horton), "an independent locomotive sovereign." After many perils the unfortunate lovers are at length released from their enchantment, through the agency of the Fairy Truffo (Mrs. L. S. Buckingham), who is a director of the Grand Atmospheric Fairy Land, and Theatre Royal Haymarket Junction, and they are made very happy, and hold a grand magic levee after the opening of the door in line to the "Bee and Orange Station" in the fairy bower.

The extravaganza was, as it deserved to be, entirely successful. The dialogue is piquant and witty, and well set with pointed allusions to the follies of the day, more especially to the Railway Mania, the jokes on which, notwithstanding all that has been sung and said on the subject, were new. Mr. Bland's curse song is a capital piece of humbug. There is an abundance of excellent music throughout the piece. The scenery and appointment are clever and picturesque; the costumes classical and splendid; and the curtain fell amidst the enthusiasm of the audience.

ADELPHI.

A very numerous and excited audience assembled last night, to enjoy the pantomimic repast offered to them at this house. It has the euphonious title of "Harlequin Poonahwinkwongdi.liberdeefiobberdee buskebong, the King of the Cannibal Islands," and, as may be supposed, the leading features of the introduction turn upon the history of Hok. Poki, which is too well known to need more than a passing word.

Some British sailors are wrecked in the Tom-Tit, near the Bay of Buskee Bong, and, getting to court, play the very what's-his-name (as Hox writes in the "Cricket,") with the establishment of his Cannibal Majesty (Mr. C. J. Smith). At the court of his savage dignitary we are treated to a grand fête, including a real war dance, "arranged for one drum," and this certainly beats anything we have seen for a long time.

The ladies who dance the "Pas de Half-dozen" totally eclipse Taglioni, Fanny Elsler, Carlotta Grisi, or Lucille Grahn, and put them out of the field. Their dancing is certainly very much above par; and it is, therefore, only fair in the management to put forth this "Pas de half-dozen" as a great attraction. In the course of the fête there is a capital procession; and, in short, the whole of the incidents connected with the Court of the King of the Cannibal Islands are affording and imposing in the extreme. The ghost has been introduced, even to the State Back Bedroom in Bamboo Castle. Here the Monarch attempts to rest, but it would appear that he has mustered "sleep, the innocent sleep," for his dreams are disturbed, and a most startling ghost is produced by the scenic representation of the lovely moveable faces of his poor murdered spouses. This scene, of course, excited the audience to the top of their bent. The harrowed feelings, however, are relieved by a pleasant representation of the Blue Bell Railway, and the harlequinade commences with this cast:—Harlequin, Mr. T. Ireland; Clown, Mr. C. J. Smith; Pantaloon, Mr. Jones; and Columbine, Miss Fleming: and then we have the Wenham Lake Ice Company's Waredouse, and the exterior of the British Museum, the Egyptian Hall, the Agricultural Exhibition, Hungerford Market, another series of Railway jokes, and an animated tableau of the Thames Tunnel.

In the course of these scenes, there is an average quantity of transformations, which, allowing for the oddity of a Cannibal representation, were of excellent quality. No expense seems to have been spared in getting up this pantomime—the scenery and appointments are beautiful, and some of the gas times exceedingly quaint and funny. There a few gags in the old style, and shades of the dark and, altogether, this attempt to convey a just idea of the King of the Cannibal Islands and his territory, is likely to receive the patronage from the frequenters of the Adelphi.

SADLER'S WELLS

"Harlequin and the Steam king" is the title of the pantomime at this theatre. On the curtain rising, we obtained a glimpse of what the bills call "the Grand Laboratory and Observatory, in the realms of Science;" protruding fagas, comic dresses, &c., made up the chief portion of the opening. We are then introduced to Messrs. Stilt and Grampard, as Clowns; Mr. Hartsend, Pantaloon; Mr Fenton, Harlequin; and the Misses Wright, Goodall, and Trickett, transformation then follow each other in rapid succession, Mr. Stilt distinguishing himself in various feats. Curry-powder, razzways, and all the principal subjects of the past year, furnished food for fun, and the evening was accomplished with more rapidity and precision than is usually the case on a first night. The house was crowded to suffocation

OLYMPIC.

"Fortunatus; or, the Magic Cap," is the title of the Pantomime selected for this celebrated resort for Christmas frolic and fun: and, judging, from the first performance, the attractions offered by the host in the form of managers are certainly of the best class, and strengthen the long-established claim of producing one of the best pantomimes of the season. The manager of "Hot Codlins" and "Tippywivetkin," we regret to say, were somewhat disappointed from the indisposition of the Clown. We should add, that there is a marked improvement in the details of the getting-up of the Pantomime. The house was densely crowded.

ST'REFY.

The Pantomime produced here is of Elizabethan origin; it being founded on the legend of the "Old Woman who lived in the reign of Queen Bess of good Queen Bess. The audience were so impatient for the commencement of the harlequinade as scarcely to listen to the first piece, the "Mendicant's Son." The story is taken from Peter Parley's Tales; the cottage drop-scene is the usual one, and transformations are not numerous, but the bits at popular tunes are relished. It would be injustice not to commend the three children, (Lauk), who performed in a giant's kitchen, the best scene of the piece.

QUEEN'S.

"Little Tommy Tucker;" or, Harlequin and Mother Redcap," was the Pantomime produced here. It is from the practised pen of Mr. Nelson Lee, and was deservedly successful; the story being of the right nursery stock. The scenery, dresses, and appointments are excellent: a Diorama of the Queen's Visit to Germany, painted by Mr. James, the scene, we received with enthusiasm.

CITY OF LONDON

The popular story of "King Lud, of Ludgate," supplied the opening story of the Pantomime produced here. It is from the pen of Mr. Fenton, and has been got up by Mr. Horner, the spirited lessee, regardless of cost. The mechanical transformations are many, and the whole of the splendid scenery and dresses, and capital stage effects, the Pantomime will, doubtless, become a favourite.

THE BAL MASQUE.

The Bal Masqué given at Covent Garden Theatre, on Monday evening, by M Jullien, was immeasurably the best thing of the kind ever yet done in England, surpassing the previous ones in brilliancy, being better attended, and character-ised by order and general good temper on the part of the visitors. The theatre was beautifully fitted up for the occasion, and when all the company had arrived, presented the most magnificent coup d'œil we ever remember to have seen, every available corner in the auditory, and every private box being occupied. The dresses were really elegant, but the favourite one appeared to be Last of the Mohicans, a costume gaining favour rapidly in England. The old conventional disguises of Greeks, Scotchmen, Turks, sailors, &c., are fast disappearing; and those more elegant and original are taking their place. M. Jullien was in his glory. He conducted his band with undying energy, and treated his visitors with all the quadrilles, waltzes, and polkas which have been most popular at his concerts. The merit is certainly his of effecting the first improvement upon those scenes of dirty brutality which masquerades have hitherto been in London. Altogether, the Bal Masqué was a great "hit," so much so, indeed, that M. Jullien intends giving another on the 2d February, when we doubt not that the same success will attend his spirited enterprise.

The winter season set in with great severity at Dresden on the 12th instant. Much snow had fallen during the three following days, and there were considerable quantities of drifting ice in the Elbe.

The Journal des Débats states that the iron suspension-bridge in construction at Chaussin (Jura) had been entirely carried away on the 9th of December by the extraordinary rise of the waters.

EVENING MELODIES.

THE APOLOGY.

Oh! deem not that this heart
Must needs be cold, and dull,
Unfit for a sy pat
In scenes that's beautiful,
Because you pass me by
A musical tie dy tarning,
When mirth is on my tongue,
And wit on every tongue,
And though this spirit does not gleam
Round or ups bright and gay,
You must I never seem
So foul of joy as they!

For I so not say what thought
Intrudes at times like these,
What inward fear, unsought,
Wars all such revelries;
That mind is free from guile,
And when you turn and view
On every side a smile,
You think ours quite as true!
And still, while yet you may,
Try on fruit fe ve of
While dreams like these can stay,
Oh! who would wish them gone?

But tyre me when such scenes
Of brilliant joy are o'er,
What time our slaves scenes
A reverie more dear,
And inough the m
That leaves those by
My soul to the so bright,
'Tis far more lovely yet
On some dear mental eve,
'Neath Heav'n's own quiet blue,
Oh, let me come and weave
A wreath of flowers for you!

And should the tearful sight
Of tears for grief come on,
And they whose smiles were bright,
Whose words were wit, be gone,—
Should hours of festive glee
To others dawn again,
Yet canst no more to the—
Oh, let me, by me then
Bet deem not that the heart
Must needs be cold and dull,
Unfit for any part
In scenes that's beautiful!

According to a report lately made to the Agricultural Society of St. Petersburg, the Crimea contains 1,500,000 of vines. Those which have thriven best in the last twenty years were brought from Burgundy and Malaga, naturalised in the Crimea, by M. Rouvier, a Frenchman, who has also introduced into the country the race of Merino sheep, whose wool forms one of the most important branches of commerce and wealth.
